

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

The Clerk having announced that a quorum of the House was present, said that he had received a letter from the Hon. HENRY CLAY, late

Speaker of this House, which, with the leave of the House, he read as follows:

LEXINGTON, Ky., October 28, 1820.

SIR: I will thank you to communicate to the House of Representatives, that, owing to imperious circumstances, I shall not be able to attend upon it until after the Christmas holidays, and to respectfully ask it to allow me to resign the office of its Speaker, which I have the honor to hold, and to consider this as the act of my resignation. I beg the House also to permit me to reiterate the expression of my sincere acknowledgments and unaffected gratitude for the distinguished consideration which it has uniformly manifested for me.

I have the honor to be, with great esteem, your faithful and obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

THOMAS DOUGHERTY, Esq.

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the letter was ordered to lie on the table, and to be inserted in the Journal of the House.

On motion of Mr. N., the House then proceeded to the election of a Speaker.

The Clerk declared that, as this was an election to be made from amongst members of the House, no previous nomination was necessary. No nomination, therefore, was made.

Messrs. NEWTON and MOSLEY being appointed a committee to count the ballots, reported that the votes were—For John W. Taylor 40; for William Lowndes 34; for Samuel Smith 27; for John Sergeant 18; for Hugh Nelson 10; scattering 8.

Sixty-seven votes being necessary to a choice, and no member having the requisite majority, a second ballot took place; when the votes were thus reported: For Mr. Taylor 49; for Mr. Lowndes 44; for Mr. Smith 25; for Mr. Sergeant 18; scattering 1.

No choice being yet made, the House proceeded to a further ballot, when the votes given in were as follows: For Mr. Lowndes 56; for Mr. Taylor 50; for Mr. Smith 16; for Mr. Sergeant 11; scattering 1.

No choice having been yet made, the House proceeded to ballot a fourth time, when the following result was reported: For Mr. Lowndes 61; for Mr. Taylor 60; for Mr. Smith 11; scattering 3.

No one having yet a majority of all the votes, a fifth ballot took place, which resulted as follows: For Mr. Taylor 65; for Mr. Lowndes 63; for Mr. Smith 8; scattering 2.

A motion was then made that the House do now adjourn; and the question thereon being put by the Clerk, it was decided in the negative.

The House then proceeded to ballot a sixth time; and the votes, being counted, stood thus: For Mr. Taylor 67; for Mr. Lowndes 61; for Mr. Smith 7; scattering 1.

No election having yet taken place, another motion was then made to adjourn, and the vote thereon was—for adjourning 65, against it 68.

So the House refused to adjourn, and another ballot was held, which resulted as follows:

For Mr. Taylor 62; for Mr. Lowndes 57; for Mr. Smith 15; scattering 1.

No choice having yet been made, a motion was made to adjourn, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 71. And the Clerk adjourned the House to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, November 14.

Several other members appeared and took their seats, to wit:

From New Hampshire, ARTHUR LIVERMORE; from Massachusetts, MARTIN KINSLEY; from New Jersey, HENRY SOUTHARD; from Pennsylvania, CHRISTIAN TARR; from Maryland, RAPHAEL NEALE; from Virginia, WILLIAM LEE BALL, PHILIP P. BARBOUR, and WILLIAM MCCOY; from South Carolina, ELIAS EARLE; from Tennessee, JOHN COCKE; and from Ohio, THOMAS R. ROSS.

The House then proceeded forthwith to ballot again for a Speaker of the House, in the place of Mr. CLAY, resigned. The votes having been counted, Mr. NEWTON reported, that the whole number of votes was 149; of which 75 were necessary to a choice; that the votes were: For Mr. Taylor 64; for Mr. Lowndes 54; for Mr. Smith 33; scattering 1.

No one having a majority of all the votes, the House proceeded to ballot the ninth time; when it appeared that the votes were: For Mr. Taylor 66; for Mr. Lowndes 47; for Mr. Smith 33; scattering 1.

No election having yet taken place, the House proceeded to ballot for the tenth time; and the result was declared as follows: For Mr. Taylor 64; for Mr. Smith 50; for Mr. Lowndes 25; scattering 1.

No election having yet taken place, the House proceeded to ballot for the eleventh time; when the following result was pronounced: For Mr. Taylor 61; for Mr. Smith 50; for Mr. Lowndes 31; for Mr. Sergeant 5; scattering 1.

No election having yet taken place, the House proceeded to ballot for the twelfth time; and the result was as follows: For Mr. Smith 53; for Mr. Taylor 47; for Mr. Lowndes 23; for Mr. Sergeant 19; for Mr. Tomlinson 8; scattering 3.

The thirteenth ballot resulted as follows: For Mr. Smith 48; for Mr. Taylor 32; for Mr. Sergeant 32; for Mr. Lowndes 30; scattering 3.

The fourteenth ballot resulted as follows: For Mr. Smith 42; for Mr. Lowndes 37; for Mr. Sergeant 35; for Mr. Taylor 27; scattering 3.

The fifteenth ballot resulted as follows: For Mr. Lowndes 55; for Mr. Sergeant 32; for Mr. Smith 27; for Mr. Taylor 26; scattering 6.

No one yet having a majority of the votes, a further ballot was declared necessary; when (it being half-past 3 o'clock),

A motion was made to adjourn, and negatived.

The sixteenth ballot then took place, and was as follows: For Mr. Lowndes 68; for Mr. Taylor 80; for Mr. Sergeant 24; for Mr. Smith 23.

Proceedings.

[H. OF R.]

This ballot having been also ineffectual; another motion was made to adjourn, but without success.

The House then proceeded to the seventeenth ballot, which resulted as follows—73 necessary to a choice: For Mr. Lowndes 72; for Mr. Taylor 44; for Mr. Smith 17; for Mr. Sergeant 11.

No election being made, the House went into the eighteenth ballot, when the following result was announced—73 necessary to a choice: For Mr. Lowndes 66; for Mr. Taylor 55; for Mr. Smith 21; for Mr. Sergeant 2.

No one having yet a majority of the votes, the House proceeded to the nineteenth ballot, which resulted as follows—73 necessary to a choice: For Mr. Taylor 66; for Mr. Lowndes 65; for Mr. Smith 14.

This ballot being also ineffectual; a motion was made to adjourn, which motion prevailed, ayes 76—and, about five o'clock, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 15.

Several other members appeared, and took their seats, to wit:

From Vermont, CHARLES RICH; from Pennsylvania, GEORGE DENNISON; from Maryland, THOMAS BAYLY; from North Carolina, CHARLES FISHER; and from South Carolina, ELDEED SIMKINS.

Election of Speaker.

The House, having been called to order at twelve o'clock, proceeded to ballot, the twentieth time, for a Speaker, in the place of Mr. Clay, resigned.

The votes having been counted, it appeared that the number of votes given in was 141—necessary to a choice 71. Of which there were: For Mr. Taylor 67; for Mr. Lowndes 65; for Mr. Smith 8; scattering 1.

No choice having been made, the House proceeded to ballot the twenty-first time; when the result was declared as follows: Whole number of votes 147—necessary to a choice 74. Of which there were: For Mr. Taylor 73; for Mr. Lowndes 49; for Mr. Smith 32.

No choice having yet been made, the House was about to ballot again; when

Mr. LITTLE rose, and, remarking on the extraordinary aspect of the present proceedings of the House; the necessity for choosing a Speaker; the uncertainty, under present appearances, when a choice would be made; and the weariness of the House at these repeated ballotings, &c.—moved, that the House do come to a resolution, that the lowest on each ballot should be dropped at the succeeding ballot, and that any votes given for such lowest person should not be taken into account.

The CLERK of the House, after reading the resolve, expressed doubts of the power of the House to pass such a resolution, consistently with the rules established for its government.

Mr. RANDOLPH made it a point of order whether the Clerk had any right to express to the House his opinion of their powers, or to decide for them what was, or was not, in order.

The CLERK declared, that, under the rules of the House, which prescribe the mode of election by ballot, he could not receive this motion.

Some brief debate took place on the point of order, Mr. RANDOLPH protesting against what he pronounced an assumption of power on the part of the Clerk, and asserting the right of any member to propound any question to the House through the Clerk, the Speaker's Chair being vacant, or from himself, if he thought proper.

Other gentlemen, Mr. STORES, Mr. LITTLE, Mr. SERGEANT, Mr. MERCER, and Mr. LIVERMORE, expressed their opinions, and the following rule of the House was read:

"In all other cases of ballot than for committees, a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election; and, when there shall not be such a majority on the first ballot, the ballot shall be repeated until a majority be obtained."

Mr. LITTLE, asserting his right to make the motion, yet, not desiring to prolong discussion in regard to it, waived the moving of it himself.

The House then proceeded to ballot the twenty-second time. The whole number of votes was 148—75 necessary to a choice. The votes were—For Mr. Taylor 76; for Mr. Lowndes 44; for Mr. Smith 27; scattering 1.

So JOHN W. TAYLOR, Esq., a Representative from the State of New York, was elected Speaker; and, having been conducted to the Chair by Mr. NEWTON and Mr. MOSELY, addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen: I approach the station to which your favor invites me, greatly distrustful my ability to fulfil your just expectations. Although the duties of the Chair have become less arduous by improvements in its practice during the administration of my distinguished predecessor, I should not venture to assume their responsibilities without a firm reliance on your indulgent support. In all deliberative assemblies, the preservation of order must depend in a greater degree upon the members at large than upon any efforts of a presiding officer. The forbearance and decorum which characterized this House in its former session, at a period of peculiar excitement, afford of their continued exercise a happy anticipation. For the confidence with which you have honored me, be pleased to accept my profound acknowledgments. In my best endeavors to merit your approbation, which shall not be intermitted, I can promise nothing more than diligence, and a constant aim at impartiality. I can hope for nothing greater than that these endeavors may not prove altogether unavailing.

The new members having been sworn in—

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that a quorum thereof was formed, and that they were ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, a similar message was returned to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, also, a committee was appointed, jointly with such committee as should be appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him of the organization of the two Houses, and of their readiness to receive any communication he may have to make to them.

THURSDAY, November 16.

Several other members appeared and took their seats, to wit:

From Massachusetts, WALTER FOLGER, Jr.; from North Carolina, HUTCHINS G. BURTON; and from Georgia, JOEL CRAWFORD and ROBERT RAYMOND REID.

Constitution of Missouri.

Mr. SCOTT laid before the House a manuscript attested copy of the constitution formed on the 19th day of July, 1820, by the convention assembled at St. Louis, in the Territory of Missouri, for the government of the contemplated State of that name; which was referred to a select committee, and Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. SERGEANT, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, were appointed the said committee.

MONDAY, November 20.

Several other members appeared and took their seats, to wit:

From Virginia, JOHN FLOYD and SEVERN E. PARKER; and from Tennessee, HENRY H. BRYAN and ROBERT ALLEN.

SOLOMON SIBLEY appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat as a delegate from the Territory of Michigan, in the room of William W. Woodbridge, resigned.

WEDNESDAY, November 22.

Another member, to wit, from South Carolina, CHARLES PINCKNEY, appeared, and took his seat.

Reduction of Expenditures.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, presented to the Chair the following series of propositions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient that the annual expenses of the Government should be reduced; that, for the accomplishment of this object, it is further

2. Resolved, That such offices as are not immediately necessary for the transaction of public business, and the abolition of which would not be detrimental to the public interest, shall be abolished.

3. Resolved, That the salaries of all civil officers whose compensation has been increased since the year 1809 shall be reduced to what they were at that period.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce the Army to the number of six thousand non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, preserving such part of the corps of engineers, without regard to that number, as may be required by the public interest; and including such reduction of the general staff as may be required by the state of the Army when reduced as herein proposed.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient that the appropriations for the erection of fortifications shall be so made as to require a less sum annually, by extending the time within which they shall be completed.

6. Resolved, That the act making an appropriation of one million of dollars per annum for the increase of the Navy, be so amended as to extend the time within which such increase shall be made, and to reduce the annual appropriation to the sum of five hundred thousand dollars.

7. Resolved, That it is expedient to recall from active service one-half the naval force now employed, and to place the same in ordinary.

8th Resolution refers the subjects of the preceding resolves to the proper standing and select committees, to bring in bills pursuant thereto.

The House having agreed to consider these resolutions—

Mr. COBB said, he had no intention to bring on the discussion of them at this time, having presented them by way of notice to members, that they might be prepared to discuss and decide on them when called up. He was not even himself prepared at this moment to give his views of the subjects embraced in these resolutions; nor did he know that the House ought to proceed to act on them, until it should have received, first, the annual report of the Treasury, and, secondly, a report from the Secretary of War, required by a resolution of the House at the last session, of a plan whereupon a reduction of the Army might be advantageously made. To place these resolves in a situation which would enable him to call them up at any time, he moved their reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Which motion was agreed to.

THURSDAY, November 23.

Missouri State Constitution—Citizenship of Free Colored Persons.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the select committee to whom was referred the constitution formed for their government by the people of Missouri, delivered in the following report:

The committee to whom has been referred the constitution of the State of Missouri respectfully report:

That they have not supposed themselves bound to inquire whether the provisions of the constitution referred to them be wise or liberal. The grave and difficult question as to the restraints which should be imposed upon the power of Missouri to form a constitution for itself was decided by the act of the last session, and the committee have had only to examine whether the provisions of the act have been complied with. In the opinion of the committee, they have been. The propositions, too, which were offered in the same act to the free acceptance or rejection of the people of Missouri, have all been accepted by them. But there remains a question too important to be overlooked.

We know that cases must often arise in which there may be a doubt whether the laws or constitution of a State do not transcend the line (sometimes the obscure line) which separates the powers of the different governments of our complex system. It appears to the committee, that, in general, it must be unwise in Congress to anticipate judicial decisions by the exposition of an equivocal phrase, and that it would be yet more objectionable, by deciding on the powers of a State just emerged from territorial dependence, that it should give the weight of its authority to an opinion which might condemn the laws and constitutions of old, as well as sovereign States. The committee are not unaware that a part of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution of Missouri, by which the Legislature of the State has been directed to pass laws "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, the State," has been construed to apply to such of that class as are citizens of the United States, and that their exclusion has been deemed repugnant to the Federal Constitution. The words which are objected to are to be found in the laws of at least one of the Middle States, (Delaware,) and a careful examination of the clause might perhaps countenance the opinion that it applies to the large class of free negroes and mulattoes who cannot be considered as the citizens of any State. But, of all the articles in our constitution, there is probably not one more difficult to construe well, than that which gives to the citizens of each State the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States; there is not one, an attention to whose spirit is more necessary to the convenient and beneficial connection of the States; nor one of which too large a construction would more completely break down their defensive power, and lead more directly to their consolidation. This much, indeed, seems to be settled by the established constitutions of States in every section of the Union; that a State has a right to discriminate between the white and the black man, both in respect to political and civil privileges, though both be citizens of another State; to give to the one, for instance, the right of voting and of serving on juries, which it refuses to the other. How far this discrimination may be carried, is obviously a matter of nice and difficult inquiry. The committee do not propose to engage in it. They believe it best, whenever a case occurs which must necessarily involve the decision of it, that it should be remitted to judicial cognizance.

In this view (which narrows their inquiries and duties) the committee are confirmed, by a consideration of the embarrassments and disasters which a different course of proceeding might sometimes produce. When a people are authorized to form a State, and do so, the trammels of their territorial condition fall off. They have performed the act which makes them sovereign and independent. If they pass an unconstitutional law, and we leave it, as we should that of another State, to the decision of a judicial tribunal, the illegal act is divested of its force by the operation of a system with which we are familiar. The control of the General Government is exercised in each particular case, in support of individual right, and the State retains the condition which it has just acquired, and would not easily renounce. But a decision by Congress against the constitutionality of a law passed by a State which it had authorized the establishment, could not operate directly by vacating the law; nor is it believed that it could reduce the State to the dependence of a Territory. In these circumstances, to refuse admission into the Union to such a State, is to refuse to extend over it that judicial authority which might vacate the obnoxious law, and to expose all the interests of the Government within the territory of that State, to a Legislature and a Judiciary, the only checks on which have been abandoned. On the other hand, if Congress shall determine neither to expound clauses which are obscure, nor to decide constitutional questions which must be difficult and perplexing, equally interesting to old States, whom our construction could not, as to the new, whom it ought not to coerce, the rights and duties of Missouri will be left to the determination of the same temperate and impartial tribunal which has decided the conflicting claims, and received the confidence, of the other States.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

This report having been read by the Clerk, the resolution therein referred to was read, as follows:

Whereas, in pursuance of an act of Congress passed on the sixth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories," the people of said Territory did, on the nineteenth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty, by a convention called for the purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution and State government, so formed, is republican, and in conformity to the provisions of the said act:

Be it therefore resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Missouri shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and is admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

The resolution was then read a second time.

Mr. LOWMEYER moved to refer the resolution to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which would put it in the power of the House to act upon it at any time it thought proper. He need not say, that there was no disposition to act upon this subject without full notice to all parties concerned; and if no other person did, he should himself, when proposing to call for the consideration of the report, give a day or two notice of his intention to do so. Whilst up, he took occasion to say, that this report, as indeed all reports of committees, must be considered as the act of a majority of the committee, and not as expressing the sentiments of every individual of the committee.

The reference was agreed to.

FRIDAY, November 24.

Two members appeared and took their seats, viz: from Maryland, THOMAS CULBRETH, and from Virginia, JOHN TYLER.

MONDAY, November 27.

Another member, to wit, from Mississippi, CHRISTOPHER RANKIN, appeared, and took his seat.

A new member, to wit, from Massachusetts, BENJAMIN GORHAM, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Jonathan Mason, also appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

TUESDAY, November 28.

Another member, to wit, from New York, JAMES GUYON, junior, appeared, and took his seat.

FRIDAY, December 1.

Another member, to wit, from North Carolina, WILLIAM DAVIDSON, appeared, and took his seat.

Vaccine Institution.

The engrossed bill to incorporate the Managers of the National Vaccine Institution, was read the third time; and, on the question of its passage—

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, moved to recommit the bill, so as to allow of its being amended in one particular, and thus obviating the only objection which he had to its passage. His object was to incorporate in the bill the words "within the District of Columbia." There was not a general agreement of opinion as to the power of Congress to establish corporations to pervade the United States; but there was no doubt of its power within the District, to which therefore he wished expressly to limit the corporate authority proposed to be conferred by this bill.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said, he saw no unconstitutional feature in the bill, which he hoped, therefore, would be permitted to pass as it stood. The object of the bill was to aid in the eradication of the small-pox from our country—an object which all must admit to be not only innocent but laudable. The gentleman who had been most earnest in asking from Congress the passage of this bill, had devoted himself to this object with a perseverance seldom exceeded, and with desirable success. To enable those who took an interest in this matter, to avail themselves of the donations of charitable persons in all parts of the United States, it was necessary that a company should be incorporated, with power to erect the necessary buildings.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland, said, the gentleman from New Hampshire appeared to be under some misapprehension in relation to the bill first read. By its provisions, said Mr. K., the National Vaccine Institution is to be established here, and this provision renders unnecessary the gentleman's proposition. It will be recollected by the House that, some years past, the appointment of an agent for vaccination was authorized by law, with the privilege of franking his letters; and, although this measure gave some facility in the transmission of vaccine matter to the different parts of the country, yet it was found too limited in its effects for the accomplishment of an object fraught with such incalculable benefits to the community. Hence, the citizens of several of the adjacent States were induced to accept of a proposition made by Dr. Smith, to establish an institution here in the capital of the country, from whence should issue gratuitously the vaccine matter to such States, counties, or towns, as should subscribe a certain amount for the establishment and encouragement of this institution; by which means every class in society, the poor as well as the rich, would receive the matter free of expense. In six of the adjacent States $26,000 were subscribed on the 1st day of January last, and no doubt a considerable addition has been made during the present year to that sum. These subscriptions have been made to Dr. Smith, who is the agent for vaccination; and, in the event of his death, without the passage of some such bill as the one before you, would be lost to those who made them with such benevolent views. The bill does not propose to take from the Treasury one dollar, its only object is to withdraw from the hands of Dr. Smith the whole amount of those subscriptions, and place them under the control and direction of six discreet, judicious managers, who are named in the bill, and whose successors are to be appointed by the President of the United States. It has been under the hope of the securing the full benefit of such liberal subscriptions, that I have been induced to advocate the bill, and now ask for the concurrence of the House in its passage.

Mr. BURWELL, of Virginia, was opposed to the recommitment, on different ground from that taken by other gentlemen. He adverted to a construction which had been recently put upon the powers of Congress within the States, (in the case of the lotteries authorized by Congress,) and said that he believed that construction was too absurd to be entertained by many men of sense in this country, and he regarded it as very unfortunate that such a construction had been sanctioned by the names of any men of sense and character. Believing that Congress had not the power to make this law operative within the States, and that inserting the words proposed might, by implication, give countenance to what he considered the most dangerous and absurd construction ever given to the constitution, he was opposed to limiting, by words in the bill, what he considered as already limited by the constitution.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he was as friendly to the object of this bill as any gentleman within these walls, and he had no desire to impede its passage. But, he said, Congress have a power within the District which they have not beyond it. They have here the power of exclusive legislation; beyond it, they have not that power. Within this District, he did not know that their power was any thing less than absolute. He did not know of any restraints upon it but reason and a sound discretion. It was a question whether Congress had the power to extend a corporate authority into the States; and he did not see that the remarks of gentlemen in favor of the bill had obviated the difficulty. A corporation inhabits a house not made by man; it inhabits all space—it is everywhere and nowhere. It has no body, as it is sometimes said to have no soul. For his part he wished this charter to be restricted to the District of Columbia, where almost every anomalous thing was to be found.

Mr. MERGER, of Virginia, opposed the recommitment of the bill, on the ground that such a course would have the effect to give it a quietus for the remainder of the session, especially after the notice this morning given by Mr. LOWNDES. Mr. M. said he concurred with his colleague in his view of the recent opinion of some gentlemen learned in the law, on the subject of the powers of Congress. He did not see, however, how, by possibility, the passage of this bill could countenance that opinion. Mr. M. referred to the nature of the bill, and its unobjectionable character, as arguments in favor of its passing the House, and without recommitment.

Mr. Cook suggested a modification of the question, so as to propose a recommitment of the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report the specific amendment suggested by Mr. LIVERMORE.

Mr. LIVERMORE having assented to putting the question in this shape—

It was so put and negatived.

And the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

MONDAY, December 4.

Another member, to wit, from Massachusetts, NATHANIEL SILSBEE, appeared, and took his seat.

Case of Matthew Lyon.

Mr. MCLEAN, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the memorial of Matthew Lyon, made a report thereon, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which, by leave of the House, was presented, read the first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The report is as follows:

The petitioner states that, in violation of that provision of the Constitution of the United States of America which says, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," Congress, in July, 1798, passed the act commonly called the sedition law; that, some time previous to the passage of this bill, there appeared in the Philadelphia Federal papers a violent attack upon his character, extracted from the Vermont Journal, charging him with many political enormities, particularly with the high crime of opposing the Executive; that he wrote a reply to this charge in Philadelphia, on the 20th of June, 1798, and on the same day put the letter, directed to the editor of the said Vermont Journal, into the post office at Philadelphia, twenty-four days before the passage of the sedition law. For the publication of this letter he was indicted in October following, in the circuit court of the United States in the Vermont district. In the same indictment, he was charged with publishing a copy of a letter from an American diplomatic character in France to a member of Congress in Philadelphia; also, for aiding, assisting, and abetting in the publication of said letter.

He states said letter was written by Joel Barlow to Abraham Baldwin, then a member of Congress. He denies that he printed said letter, or aided or abetted in the printing of it; but, on the contrary, that he used his endeavors to suppress it, by destroying the copies which came into his possession. He states that, owing to the political party zeal which prevailed in the United States at that time, much unfairness was used in the trial, both by the marshal in summoning the jury, and the judge who presided, in his instructions to them, and thereby a verdict of guilty was returned against him by the jury; and upon that verdict the court sentenced him to pay a fine of $1,000, the costs of suit, be imprisoned four calendar months, and until the fine and costs were paid. He states that, by virtue of said judgment, he was arrested and confined in a dungeon, the common receptacle of thieves and murderers, fifty miles distant from the place of his trial, although there was a decent, roomy jail in the county in which he lived, and in the town where the trial was had, which jail the Federal Government had the use of; that much severity was exercised towards him during his imprisonment; that he languished in the loathsome prison more than six weeks in the months of October, November, and December, in the cold climate of Vermont, without fire, before he was allowed, at his own expense, to introduce a small stove, or to put glass into the aperture which let in a small glimmer of light through the iron grate.

He states that he is poor, and asks Congress to refund to him $1,000, the fine which he has paid, the costs of suit, for one hundred and twenty-three days' pay as a member of Congress, while he was unconstitutionally detained from a seat in that body, reasonable damages for being suddenly deprived of his liberty, put to great expense, and disabled from paying that attention to his concerns which, in other circumstances, he would have been allowed to do, and such interest on those sums as public creditors are entitled to.

Your committee state that the prosecution against the said petitioner, the judgment, imprisonment, and payment of $1,000, the fine, and $60 96, the costs of suit, are proved by a copy of the record of proceedings in said cause, which is made a part of this report. The committee are of opinion that the law of Congress under which the said Matthew Lyon was prosecuted and punished was unconstitutional, and therefore he ought to have the money which has been paid by him refunded; but should they be mistaken as to the unconstitutionality of this law, yet they think there are peculiar circumstances of hardship attending this case which call for relief. Your committee, therefore, ask leave to report a bill.

State of the Finances.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report on the state of the Treasury; and, on motion of Mr. STORRS, three thousand copies thereof were ordered to be printed for the use of the House. The report is as follows:—

short estimated, and which has since been corrected by actual settlement.

Making - - - - $91,743,268 18

III. Of the Estimates of the Public Revenue, and Expenditures for the year 1821.

In forming an estimate of the receipts into the Treasury for the year 1821, the amount of revenue bonds outstanding on the 30th day of September last, the sum due for public land, the ability and disposition of the community to purchase, and especially the quantity and quality of the land intended to be exposed at public auction in the course of the year, present the data upon which the calculations must be made. As a portion of the duties which accrue in the fourth quarter of the present year, and in the first and second quarters of the next, form a part of the receipts into the Treasury for the latter year, the amount received will exceed or fall short of the estimate, by the difference between the duties which actually accrue in those quarters, and are payable within the year, and the amount at which they had been estimated.

The revenue bonds outstanding on the 30th of September last, are estimated at $18,770,000. Of this sum $3,130,000 are in suit, of which about $1,250,000 will not be collected on account of the insolvency of the debtors; leaving the amount of bonds outstanding, upon which collections are to be made, estimated at $17,520,000. The amount of duties secured during the first, second, and third quarters of the year 1820, is estimated at $13,350,000; and that of the whole year may be estimated at $16,500,000. The amount of debentures outstanding on the 30th of September last, and payable during the year 1821, is estimated at $1,162,114 16, which is subject to be increased by the amount issued in the present quarter, and during the whole of the ensuing year, chargeable upon the revenue of that year. The average annual amount of debentures, bounties, and allowances, and expenses of collection chargeable upon the revenue, has been ascertained to be nearly equal to fifteen per cent. of the average annual amount of the duties upon imports and tonnage, which accrued from the year 1815 to the year 1819, inclusive.

The receipts into the Treasury from the public land, during the first three quarters of the present year, are estimated at $1,124,645 32, and those of the entire year will probably not much exceed $1,600,000.

According to the foregoing data, the receipts into the Treasury for the ensuing year, may be estimated as follows, viz:

Customs - - - -	$14,000,000
Public lands, exclusive of Mississippi stock - - - -	1,600,000
Arrears of internal duties, direct tax, and incidental receipts - - -	100,000

Third instalment from the Bank of the United States - - -	500,000
Bank dividends which will accrue during the year, estimated at five per cent. - - - -	350,000

Making the aggregate amount of $16,550 000

The appropriations for the same period are estimated as follows, viz:

1. Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous, - - - -	$1,769,850 04
2. Military Department, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian department, military pensions, and arrearages prior to the 1st of January, 1817 - - - -	4,585,352 61
3. Naval Department - - - -	2,420,594 56

Making an aggregate of - $3,775,790 21

All which is respectfully submitted,
WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TUESDAY, December 5.
West Point Academy.

Mr. CANNON moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House, as soon as is practicable, a statement showing the aggregate amount that has been expended on the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, from the establishment of the same to the present time, in the erection of buildings, barracks, repairs, and materials for the same; also, the aggregate amount that has been expended in pay, subsistence, and clothing, of the teachers, officers, and cadets, that are or have been in said academy, up to the present time; also, the aggregate amount that has been expended on the quartermaster's department attached to said institution, for wood and distributing the same, forage, transportation, stationery, including articles used in the drawing department, books, mathematical instruments, printing, and all other contingencies, up to the present time; also, the number of cadets that have been educated in said academy, since the first establishment, from the District of Columbia, also the number from each State and Territory in the Union, also the number of cadets now in said academy from the District of Columbia and from each of the States and Territories respectively; also, the number who have received an education at said academy who are in the Army and Navy of the United States, the appointment each holds, and the District, State, or Territory, they are from; and also the number of orphans, if any, of those who have fallen in the defence of their country, or died in its service, who have been educated in said academy, or are now cadets in the same, and the District, State, or Territory, each is from.

Mr. LITTLE wished to correct the resolution in one particular, in which he conceived there was a misapprehension. The mover was certainly mistaken in supposing that the teachers or cadets of the Military Academy were clothed by the Government; the cadets, Mr. L. stated, received pay, out of which they clothed themselves, and as it was not the fact that either they or the teachers of the academy were clothed by the Government, he did not wish such an idea to go abroad. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would modify his resolution by omitting the call relative to clothing.

Mr. CANNON referred to a report of the Secretary of War, made at the last session, on the subject of the academy, to show that the Government was charged with clothing for it. An item of the report referred to, stated a disbursement of five hundred and some odd dollars for clothing furnished the establishment at West Point. If, however, the Government provided no clothing for that institution, the Secretary would report the fact to the House, so that the feature in the resolution which was objected to he conceived had better be retained. Mr. C. added a few remarks as to his motives in moving this resolution. Economy in the public disbursements was imperiously called for by the state of our finances, and, among the other national establishments, he wished to see if any retrenchment could be made in the Academy at West Point.

Mr. LITTLE replied, that there was a part of the corps of engineers employed at West Point, who were regularly enlisted, as other soldiers, and were in the same manner clothed by the Government; it was the clothing for these soldiers, no doubt, which formed the item in the report referred to. The resolution called for the expenses of clothing the teachers and cadets, and, he repeated, as no such expense existed, he wished the form of the resolution to correspond with the fact, and therefore moved that the feature he objected to should be stricken out.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said the resolution ought not to go forth in such a shape as to show ignorance of the facts on the part of the House, and, as there was certainly no such provision for the cadets as clothing, (for he presumed five hundred dollars would go very little way towards clothing two hundred and fifty cadets,) he hoped the motion of his colleague (Mr. LITTLE) would be agreed to, and the resolution be modified.

Mr. CANNON assented to the modification proposed by Mr. LITTLE; and thus amended, the resolution was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, December 6.

Another member, to wit, from Delaware, WILLARD HALL, appeared and took his seat.

Missouri State Constitution—Citizenship of Free Colored People.

The House having, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

The resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, having been read—

Mr. LOWNDES rose and delivered a speech of nearly two hours in length, of which the following is a brief sketch:

The first observations of Mr. L. were lost to the reporter, from the confusion arising from members changing their seats, &c.* When Mr. L.'s observations became audible, he was speaking of the difficulty under which he should labor, in what he had to say, from being obliged to direct his observations to arguments not yet urged, and in regard to which he must depend upon what he had heard in other quarters, and upon conjecture.

In the outset, he said, he was met by an objection of a general nature, applicable to other cases as well as that now presented to the House. He could not doubt, he said, from what he had heard, that there were members of the House who considered themselves bound by the same principles which influenced them

* To get near him, Mr. Lowndes being one of those so rare in every assembly, around whom members clustered when he rose to speak, that not a word should be lost, where every word was to be luminous with intelligence, and captivating with candor. This clustering around him, always the case with Mr. Lowndes, when he rose to speak, was more than usually eager on this occasion, from the circumstances under which he spoke—the circumstances of the Union verging to dissolution; and his own condition, verging to the grave. By his exertions, and those of other patriots, the Union was saved. No skill or care could stay his own march to that "undiscovered country, from whose bourne no traveller returns." He died prematurely, at the early age of —, this speech on the admission of the State of Missouri, being the last of the principal speeches ever delivered by him.

This debate—this branch of the extended and various debate, which grew out of the attempt to restrict the State of Missouri on the subject of slavery—although taking place near forty years ago, will have a fresh interest on account of its applicability to questions which now occupy the public mind. The citizenship of free people of color—the status or political condition of a Territory erected into a State, and asking admission into the Union, without being able to obtain it—and the delicacy of throwing upon the judiciary the decision of questions which affect the public feeling—are all questions of present, still more than of past interest; and it cannot be otherwise than pleasant and instructive to the men of this day to see what was said by others on the same points so long before them. With this view—with a view to give this pleasure and instruction—this branch of the old Missouri question endless debate is given more fully than usual, the two leading and opening speeches, one on each side, (those of Mr. Lowndes and Mr. Sergeant,) are retained in all their reported extent; while, in abridging the rest, enough is retained from every speaker to show his position, and the strength of it, on the debated points. These speakers were all eminent men, of weight in their day, and who will not be without it as long as their works shall be known; and not the less weighty because, conforming to the lot of all men in council, opinions are various, and Reason is called in to decide between them. The speakers on this occasion, after Mr. Lowndes and Mr. Sergeant, were: Mr. Henry M. Storrs, of New York; Messrs. William S. Archer, Alexander Smyth, and Philip P. Barbour, of Virginia; Mr. Hemphill, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Louis McLane, of Delaware; Mr. Mallory, of Vermont; Dr. Eustis, of Massachusetts.

Missouri State Constitution—Citizenship of Free Colored Persons.

at the last session, to vote at this session against the resolution declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union. On this point, he addressed himself to the moderation and good sense of the House—of those gentlemen particularly who believed the constitution framed by Missouri to be inconsistent with the principles of our Government, to say, whether it was not inconsistent with the character of our Government, and of all Governments, that questions once decided by the legitimate authority of the country should be considered as yet open, or inconclusive? Did not such a course of reasoning lead to the conclusion that all the acts of the Government were binding only on the majority who voted for them? That all compacts are void, for example, as to the minority which refuses to sanction them? Suppose, in regard to a debt incurred in carrying on a war, a party subsequently in power were to say—we did not vote for the debt; we did not support the war; we are not bound to pay the debt. Would such an argument be entitled to respect? Take, for example, the debt incurred in the late war with Great Britain: was it not essential to the character of the nation that that debt should be considered obligatory as well upon those who approved, as on those who disapproved, the purpose for which the debt was contracted? And were all the members of this and the other House not equally bound by the act of the last session respecting Missouri? Whether we ought or ought not to have given to the people of Missouri the power to form a constitution and State government, we have given it. Whether or not we individually wished Missouri to form a constitution, the authority to do so was given by Congress. The constitution was formed, and Congress were now asked to declare that it was so. For himself, Mr. L. went on to say, he believed that the law of the last session gave Missouri a right to form a constitution; and that, having done so, she is now a State.

If you look at the course which Congress has pursued hitherto, it will be found that, on elevating territories from the grade and dependence of a territorial government, Congress has done no more than emancipate them from its control. On doing this, said Mr. L., you have reserved nothing like an authority to remand them to their colonial condition. You have determined, in such case, by the act of allowing the territory to form a constitution, that, for certain purposes, she is an independent State. In the act of the last session, it would be found, on referring to it, there was no difference between the mode of legislation in Missouri, and that which had occurred in regard to the oldest of the States admitted into the Union. Comparing that act with other acts for the admission of States, it would be found to confer the same powers and impose the same restrictions. It was impossible to distinguish, in any manner, between the power which had been given to Missouri and that which had, in like circumstances, been granted to the oldest of the new States. Mr. L. went on to quote the cases of admission of States into the Union. He referred to that of Ohio. The act for her admission was couched in the broadest terms, requiring the convention, as usual, first to determine the question whether it was expedient to form a constitution. Although the mere act for the admission of a territory into the Union does not make her a State, inasmuch as her acceptance of the offer is required, yet, at the moment that she declares that it is expedient to form a constitution—at that precise moment she acquires all the rights of a State. The people of Missouri, as of every other admitted State, at that moment acquired rights which it is not competent for the legislature of this country—which it is not competent, upon the principles which we hold sacred, for any legislature under Heaven to divest them of.

Before he proceeded further to refer to the practice of former times, Mr. L. said he would notice an argument which he had heard suggested, which was in some degree a verbal one. It is said that the words of the law in regard to the admission of Missouri are prospective; that the constitution says that Congress may admit new States into the Union; that no authority but Congress can admit them; that Congress has not admitted Missouri into the Union; and that it is necessary she should now address Congress and obtain its consent to her coming into the Union. It is true, Mr. L. said, that the law provides that Missouri “shall” be admitted; that is, prospectively as to the date of the law. It is true, also, that new States can be admitted into the Union only by Congress. But that admission may be from the time the law passes, or on the performance of a condition, whatever that condition may be. There was nothing, Mr. L. argued, in the law of the last session, to show that the act of admission was not complete on the part of Congress when that law passed, although it did refer to a future time. That this was a just construction of the matter, he said, was obvious by a reference to former examples. In the case of Kentucky, for example, her admission into the Union was deferred, by the act of Congress authorizing it, he did not know how many months, but more than a year after the passage of the act. Nothing more was necessary, after the passage of the act for the admission of Missouri, than a lapse of time sufficient for the determination of the people to be ascertained, whether they chose to form a constitution or not.

But his strongest argument, Mr. L. said he was aware, must be derived from the course pursued by Congress in former times. He disclaimed any particular devotion to precedent; but, in a time when parties were as firmly marshalled as they were on this subject at the last session; when the true import of the constitution was contested by nearly equal parties on this floor; when geographical lines were observable in the division of opinion, it was wise, it was becoming, to look to what had been the practice in former times, when no causes existed so likely to disturb and mislead the sober judgment. Every man ought to examine the record of those days, and rather lean to a decision consistent with them.

Referring, then, for illustration, to the case of Ohio, after she had formed a constitution and State government, although no resolution had passed declaring her admission into the Union, it became necessary to pass a law to extend over her territory the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; and the preamble to that law recites that the people did, on a certain day, form a constitution and State government, and give a name, whereby the said State has become one of the United States—that is, by the act of forming a constitution. And such, Mr. L. said, was the principle on which the United States had always acted. But, he said, the preamble was interesting, not only because it confirmed his argument in the main, but also marked the time and circumstance which, in the opinion of Congress at that time, made a people a State, viz., the day on which a constitution is formed, and the act of forming it.

The proof afforded by other precedents, however, that a people became a State on forming a constitution under the authority of Congress, was still less equivocal than that which had been cited. In every instance, and, as far as he knew, without an attempt at resistance, whenever such a constitution has been formed by a Territory, they have not only been considered a State, but the elections which they have made under their constitution have been held to be good. If, by the act of forming a constitution, they have not become independent States, how has it happened that, without a single exception, they have elected their own governors, judges, &c., and their acts have been constitutional and valid? Can it be said of all these cases that Congress, knowing these territorial people had usurped the powers of States, would have silently submitted to it? Their having done so was the strongest proof that every one of these States had, in the opinion of Congress, of the State governments, and of the people, the powers which they exercised.

Mr. L. said he knew there were persons who believed that the people of Missouri Territory do not become a State until, by an act posterior to the formation of their constitution, Congress declares their admission. Mr. L. said he could not admit this. It was disproved by the uniform language of precedents. The acquiescence of Congress in their elections of Senators and Representatives to Congress disproved it. These elections held previous to the submission of their constitutions to Congress, had uniformly been held valid. Who are Senators? They are deputed by the States composing the Union to represent them in Congress. If States only can vote for Senators, the uniform practice of recognizing all such elections as are subsequent to the adoption of a constitution, is conclusive enough that they who choose them were already in the condition of States. In the case of Kentucky, indeed, without any declaratory resolution, without any thing like a formal acknowledgment of her being a State, but by virtue of an act declaring, prospectively, that when she had formed a constitution she should be a State, she was admitted without further legislation. In the case of Indiana, there was a yet more formal and authoritative exposition of the principle for which Mr. L. contended. In the case of Indiana, the practice of a declaration of admission first occurred, which had been since followed in other cases. Properly viewed, that declaration, Mr. L. said, was only a form of notification to the other States—a proclamation by Congress to the Union, of the admission of another State into the family. That such was the light in which it was viewed on this first occasion on which it was employed, was evident from the fact, that the resolution of declaration passed on the 11th December, 1816, and the representative from the State was admitted to his seat on the 2d December, nine days preceding; so that it was evident the declaratory resolution was then regarded as a matter of form and notification merely. But there was still stronger proof, in the case of Indiana, of his position. In counting the votes for President and Vice President a few days after the above date, those of Indiana given before the passage of the declaratory resolution, were received and counted. If a people may rightfully, and even without objection, elect a Governor, Legislature, and Judges—may elect and send to Congress Senators and Representative, and, finally, may vote for President and Vice President—upon what principle will it be said that a people, enjoying and exercising all these rights, are not a State; or that to constitute them a State, requires the further interposition of this House? He could not admit it, he repeated.

These observations, Mr. L. said, he had made with a view to show how little foundation there was for an opinion, which he had understood was not uncommon, that the act of the last session was merely a suggestion to the people of Missouri that they might form a constitution if it pleased them, and that, if that constitution met the approbation of the Congress of the United States at their next session, they should then be admitted into the Union.

Another circumstance, Mr. L. said, showed, beyond dispute, that it was not intended by this House, in passing the act of the last session, merely to give authority to the people of Missouri to propose a constitution, but that it was intended to confer on Missouri, by that act, all the rights which the oldest and proudest States of the Union are supposed to possess. When that act was under consideration, it appears by the journal of this House, that a motion was made by Mr. TAYLOR to amend the bill by striking out these words, "And the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever," and inserting in lieu thereof, those which follow: "And if the same (that is, the constitution) shall be approved by Congress, the said Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, upon the same footing as the original States;" the difference being that, in the bill as it stood, (the act as it now stands,) we made her a State, and in the other we were to give her authority to form a constitution, and leave our approbation to be a condition of its final admission. A very large majority, (125 to 49,) even at that time of strong excitement and nearly equal division of opinion with respect to the restriction, voted in the negative.

The substance of Mr. L.'s argument then was, he said, that, by the act authorizing the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, certain rights were given to them; by the former practice of the Government, he had endeavored to show that the mere circumstance of assenting to the proposition of Congress was enough to constitute the people a State, the act of declaration, now proposed to the House, being mere surplusage. Missouri had, then, a right to form a government absolutely and inalienably. If she had not now the rights of a State, let it be shown how she had lost them. It is contrary to the principles of the constitution, contrary to the genius of our Government, that, having once given them the right of self-government, Congress can now take it from them.

Considering this question as settled, the next important question was, whether the constitution formed by the State of Missouri becomes void by the admission into it of a clause not compatible with the Constitution of the United States,—admitting, for the sake of argument, that such is the fact.

Whether that particular clause of the constitution to which exception was understood to be taken was constitutional or not, the interest of the nation, justice to Missouri, and respect for itself, required that the House should not undertake to decide. In taking this ground, Mr. L. said he knew he should be considered by some as evading the performance of a duty which, in the present case, they supposed to be devolved on this House. On this account he should attempt to show that no duty devolved on this House to express an opinion with respect to that clause; and intimated that he could show, were it necessary, that similar provisions were contained in various acts of the United States to which exception had been taken in neither House. The clause of the Missouri constitution to which he referred was that requiring the Legislature to pass laws to prohibit the settlement of free negroes in the State, which was supposed to conflict with the provision of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Mr. L.

here went into an argument of some detail, the amount of which was, that, as to numbers, a very large majority of the free blacks in the United States were not considered citizens in their respective States; and that, in construing any general provision of a constitution, it was fair to consider it as having a general application, and not as being without exceptions. In any view there could be nothing more clear than that, if the objected provision was capable of a construction which would reconcile it with the constitution, it ought to receive that construction. For example, in this case of Missouri, he thought it might be quite fair to say that that provision respecting free people of color must be construed liberally, as intending to exempt from its operation such of them as were citizens in other States. However this might be, he contended, as the committee had laid it down in their report, that it was a question not for this House, but for a different tribunal to determine.

But, Mr. L. said, there were many who object to this course—the course pursued in all other cases—who allow that the judiciary could, with more ease, certainty, uniformity, and effect, expound constitutional law, but contend that we must decide whether the provision in question be constitutional or not. We must express an opinion on it, however inexpedient, because it is our duty. Now, Mr. L. said, he did not see that having declared that the people of Missouri should form a constitution and State government, imposed on this House the duty of construing law in this more than any other case. It might be considered rather an objection to it, inasmuch as, in doing so, they would have to expound the law themselves had made—no principle being better established than that the authority which forms the law should not construe nor apply it. The true question in this case then was, which was the best tribunal to decide the question respecting this disputed clause of the Missouri constitution. If it were asked whether this House, or the Senate, or the Judiciary of the country, were the best qualified to expound a law, there would be no difference of opinion on the question. It must, then, be a consideration of paramount duty only on the part of this House to decide upon it, which could induce it to undertake the exposition of a law in respect to the construction of which there was a doubt.

Mr. L. then examined, somewhat at large, the question, whether a judicial or legislative tribunal be the most capable to decide correctly such a question as was supposed to be presented by the particular clause in the constitution of Missouri. He argued, from the inability of either branch of Congress to act independently on any such question, from their inability to act with uniformity, &c., that they were not the proper bodies to be charged with judicial investigations. And why, he asked, the rights of all the States being equal, should those of Missouri be subject to an adjudication different from that to which other States are subject? The rights of the old States were subject to judicial decision; and no man would pretend that, in respect to any old State, Delaware for example, her constitution could be suspended, that her Senators and Representatives should be excluded from these halls, on Congress thinking they had discovered something not altogether right in her constitution. It was an essential objection to the power now claimed for Congress, that, if allowed, it would be a power to be exercised in a new State, which none would pretend it could exercise in an old one. Upon every consideration, of which he urged several others, he was in favor of leaving the matter with the Judiciary, where, and where only, in his opinion, it properly belonged.

The principles which had influenced, from time to time, the conduct of the different branches of the Government, would lead to the same conclusion. At the time of the formation of the Federal Constitution (to go back to that date), it was foreseen that there might be a disposition, at some future day, in some or other of the States, to break over the barriers of the constitution about to be formed, &c., and a provision was introduced prescribing a mode of deciding controversies of that description. If, in all other cases of constitutional questions, it has been provided that they shall be decided by the Judiciary, the reason must apply and be conclusive why this body should not undertake to decide a constitutional question in the case of Missouri. Justice requires that those who have the same rights shall have their rights decided by the same tribunal.

If, however, the only objection to the passage of the resolution now under consideration was, that an inference might be drawn, from the silence of Congress, that they approved the exceptionable provision in the constitution of Missouri, Mr. L. suggested that some mode might be adopted by which the objection on this point might be explained. He should himself, as an individual, with the utmost reluctance express any opinion on the subject, and he thought it would be exceedingly unwise in Congress to do so. There would be no end to such a course. There were in the constitution of Missouri, and of every State in the Union, clauses to which some might take exception, of which Mr. L. instanced the provisions respecting banks, &c., which some believed the States had no right to establish. Every consideration of prudence and propriety, in his opinion, forbade from interposing in the present instance.

Mr. L. said he did admit, however, that there might be cases in which Congress might find it to be their duty to interpose, on the moment of admission of new States into the Union. For instance, if, in relation to the term of Senators, or any other provision which, from its character, could not be brought before the Supreme Court, the new constitution were incompatible with that of the United States, it was his opinion it would be a good reason why Congress should interfere. Nor did he think this was at all inconsistent with the ground he had already taken, if for no other reason than that the judicial tribunal could decide the question now agitated, and decide it better than this House. The duty of Congress, in this respect, begins where that of the Judiciary ends.

Referring to his former remark, that gentlemen would do well to satisfy themselves that their opinions were not the effect of prejudice, by examining what was the conduct of their predecessors in more quiet times, Mr. L. said he would turn to the case of the second new State which was admitted into the Union, and the objections to whose admission were removed in the way proposed in the present case. Tennessee, without waiting for a law of Congress to authorize her, held a convention, formed a constitution, and sent it on to Congress. The objection was made in the House of Representatives, by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, that the constitution of Tennessee was incompatible with that of the United States; to which Mr. BALDWIN replied, that, if there should be things in the constitution of Tennessee not compatible with the Constitution of the United States, "it was well known that the Constitution of the United States would be paramount—they can therefore be of no effect." He quoted this to show that this suggestion of referring the question to another tribunal than this, was not an expedient to get over this case, but one which had prevailed in the early days of the Republic. The conflict between the constitution of Tennessee, however, and that of the United States, was much more unequivocal than in the present case, and so far the present case is more favorably presented to Congress than was that of Tennessee. In the latter case, the Legislature were required to provide some means by which the State of Tennessee should be sued in its courts, with a proviso that this advantage should be confined to citizens of that State, and not extended to those of other States. Here was a direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States, whilst that of Missouri is only constructive. Yet, in that case, the question of constitutional law was left to those who were most likely to decide correctly, and withal competent to enforce their decision—that is, to the Supreme Judicial Tribunal. He thought it perfectly compatible with the most nice and rigid sense of duty for Congress to do the same in the case now before them.

Mr. L. said he knew an objection had been taken to leaving the Judiciary to sustain a conflict with a State, in regard to the conformity of its constitution to that of the United States. But, surely, if in regard to all other States, it now has that authority, there can be no hardship in leaving the same power with it, in regard to the new States.

Mr. L. said the views he had expressed were founded on the belief that Missouri was now, to all intents and purposes, a State. But, he said, if he did not believe, that, under the act of last session, Missouri is a State already; if he thought she was only a State in fact and not a State in right, he should have the same opinion as he had now expressed. She has her own government, legislature, and judiciary, and exercises all the rights of a sovereign State. In this case, as in the other, he should think it inexpedient to pronounce on the constitutional question; because, should that clause be excepted from the recognition, it could be reinstated on her becoming a State, without the power of Congress to prevent it; and the question must at last be decided by the Judiciary, the only competent tribunal.

DECEMBER, 1820.]

Mr. L. here concluded his remarks, reserving for a future occasion the answers to objections which he might not have anticipated. And, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 7.

Two other members appeared and took their seats, to wit: from Pennsylvania, ANDREW BODEN; and from Kentucky, BENJAMIN HARDIN.

Missouri.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. NELSON of Virginia in the chair, on the resolution declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the other States of the Union. And the question having been again stated—

Mr. SERGEANT rose. Of the speech which he delivered, occupying upwards of two hours' time, the following must be considered as a free but not a very full report:

Mr. S. began by saying, with respect to the question hinted at by the gentleman from South Carolina, and discussed at the last session, he did not agree with him that the decision of the question now before the House depended upon the decision of the question agitated at the last session. How far that question might be involved in the present question, might be a subject for consideration; but, independently of that question, the one now presented was a very important one. However minute in itself, if it extended but to a single provision of the constitution presented by the people of Missouri, it yet involved considerations which those, who had listened to the arguments of the gentleman from South Carolina, must see, went to the whole extent of determining what power actually remained in Congress with regard to any territory after authorizing them to form a constitution—what they have a right to insist upon, what they have a right to do and say upon the subject—in short, the question whether Congress have or have not any power at all under the Constitution of the United States, with respect to the admission of a new State into the Union, after the passage of an act authorizing the people to form a constitution.

It could not be doubted or denied, Mr. S. admitted, that there was, in looking at the admissions of States into the Union, heretofore, at least, an apparent irregularity, and much of apparent disorder. If, however, any inference were to be drawn from precedents in the case, it would be, that there never had been any precise examination of the powers of Congress in this respect—no established mode of admission—or, in other words, that there had been every variety of mode. For the sake of the future peace and harmony of the Government of the United States; for the sake of the territories hereafter applying to be admitted into the Union—for the sake of Congress alone, said Mr. S., it is incumbent on us all to examine the grounds of this question; to see what are our rights, and what theirs, and deduce, from a full consideration of these, a rule which shall be uniform as to the States hereafter to be admitted into the Union, and free from the danger of exposing us to contests such as that which appears to have arisen on the present occasion.

The power to admit a State into the Union, no one would doubt, was a very high one—a power to part with a portion of that authority which was originally vested in the old States, and which exists in the present States, and to admit to a participation in our counsels, in our power, in the control and management of every thing concerning our rights and property, a new and integral member of the Union. The question became one of graver consideration, when it was considered that it was proposed now to extend this participation to an object which was not in the contemplation of those who formed the Constitution of the United States, who had looked in their provisions to the territory then in possession of the United States, and probably had never calculated on the admission of States out of territory beyond the original limits of the United States. This high power was given to Congress; and, after the discussion of last session, it was needless to say, was given without limitation. The power is, "to admit new States into the Union;" it is granted in the broadest and most comprehensive manner—and, it would seem to follow, as the consequence of this grant of general authority, that Congress possessed every power and authority necessary to its fair exercise. Whatever power was really given to Congress, it was their duty to exercise, and not turn it over to any other department, confiding in it to cure the defect which Congress suffered to pass uncorrected. There was nothing in the Constitution of the United States which countenanced a different course. It is our right and our duty, said Mr. S., when a State offers herself for admission into the Union, to see that she can come into the Union under the Constitution of the United States, and in conformity with its provisions. For certainly, whatever were the terms in which the power was given to the people of Missouri to form a constitution, no one could for a single moment doubt that that power was never intended to transcend the Constitution of the United States, or to bring into the Union a State whose constitution was not conformable to that of the United States. Such a grant would have been an exercise of authority by Congress beyond the constitution: it would be an anomaly impossible to account for—an inconsistency with the Constitution of the United States which it would be impossible for any one to reconcile.

It would therefore seem, that when, as incident to the power of admitting States into the Union, Congress authorized a territory to form a constitution and State government, it must follow that the constitution, so to be formed, is to be conformable to the Constitution of the United States, and that the territory thus authorized does not in any sense become a State until she has formed such a constitution. Our power, said Mr. S., is to admit, and incidentally to authorize the formation of a constitution, with a view to admission. Have Congress the power to authorize a people to form a constitution and State government sovereign and independent of the United States? No, the power to authorize a people to form a constitution is an implied power, subordinate to the full power, which never is effectually exercised until the act of admission subsequent to the formation of a constitution.

Mr. S. said, he made these remarks in the outset, to meet at once an argument of the member from South Carolina, which was plausible, captivating, and seemed to be calculated to smooth the way, and remove every difficulty. That argument was that the State, from the moment of its formation of a constitution, became an independent and sovereign State. Where, said Mr. S., is your power in the constitution to make such a State? Your power is to admit States into the Union, and your power to authorize the people of a Territory to form a constitution, is merely subordinate and subsidiary to the main power. Can you admit a State by anticipation, as the gentleman has suggested? You transcend your authority if you do so. Mr. S. ventured to say that Congress never had done so; that they could not do so; and, in some sense or other, every member of the committee would agree with him in this opinion. Could Congress, by anticipation, bind itself to the admission of a State, (for such was the argument yesterday pressed upon the committee,) so as to have no choice but to accept such a constitution as that State chose to offer? Surely not; but, according to the argument advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina, not only was the present Congress to be bound by the act of the last session, but the present Congress might, by an act passed now, bind the next Congress to the admission of a State into the Union. Was the authority given by Congress to the people to form a constitution, a compact with them that they should be admitted into the Union on any other terms than those prescribed to them? For one, Mr. S. said, he did not feel himself bound, by giving the authority to a people to form a constitution, to admit them into the Union, unless their constitution should be such as the people of the United States, through their representatives, thought fit to accept as the fundamental rule of government of the State thus to be admitted.

Mr. S. then proceeded to say, that he did not mean now to enter into the question of the last session—it had been discussed enough. He did not mean to abandon the opinion which he had then formed and expressed. It had not been formed hastily, but carefully and deliberately, and he had seen no reason to change his mind upon it. Without going into that question at all, he should proceed to the immediate question presented by the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina.

This single question was, whether it is the right and duty of Congress, before admitting a State into the Union, to see that its constitution and State government be not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. He should have hoped, he said, and he yet hoped, that the opinion would be nearly unanimous in this body, that there might be such a repugnancy between such a State constitution and the Constitution of the United States, as would not only justify Congress in interfering, but make it their imperious duty to interfere, to prevent her taking rank in the Union. Whether that was the case in the present instance, was, he said, a different question.

The preliminary inquiry was that which he had just stated. It had been said that Missouri was already an independent State; that she has formed a State government under an unlimited authority from Congress; and that she has now the same rights as the proudest and oldest States in the Union. If it be so, said Mr. S., what are we now deliberating about? Why is it, that the resolution now under consideration, is proposed for our adoption? Why are this and the other House called upon to pass a legislative act which is altogether unnecessary, and which has clauses in it, if this construction be true, which are extremely objectionable? If this construction be correct, her Senators and Representatives have a right to their seats on the floor of either House—to unite in the common counsels on the affairs of the Union, and to give to the votes of Missouri the same force as those of any other State. Why are they, then, said Mr. S., kept waiting at our doors, and not permitted to partake of our deliberations? Why do they wait until the fate of this resolution be known?

It was said that this resolution was nothing but a declaration of a fact. Such a notification was not necessary for the Senators and Representative of Missouri; it was not necessary for Congress, if, the fact being known, the former had nothing to do to entitle them to a seat, but to advance to the Chair of either House, and take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Why was it, moreover, that the constitution of Missouri had been submitted to a committee of this House? Why had a report been made by that committee, and why was this House now discussing it? And why was it that that report went into an examination of a particular clause of that constitution, and pointed out the mode in which Congress were to relieve themselves from the task of deciding on its constitutionality, by leaving it to the judiciary? If the gentleman's doctrine were true, this is all superfluous. It is more, said Mr. S., for the resolution declares that Missouri shall be, and hereafter is declared to be, one of the United States, &c. He did not use this reference, he said, for the mere effect of verbal criticism, but for a higher purpose. When a committee, composed as that committee was, finds itself under the necessity of presenting a resolution, to be adopted by a joint vote of both Houses, declaring that Missouri is thereby, not that she has been admitted into the Union, was it not as strong evidence as could be furnished, that there was something which seemed to compel those who acted on it to say, that this declaration of the fact is the virtual legislation which brings Missouri into the Union—which qualifies her for induction to the Union, and that anterior to it she was not a State, and not entitled to be? From what period, Mr. S. asked, was it that Missouri was admitted into the Union? It would be from the moment of the adoption of this resolution. Could it be said of any antecedent period? Here, Mr. S. said, he would avail himself of another concession of the gentleman from South Carolina; and, in taking to his aid a concession of his, Mr. S. said he did it with the full impression that it was the result of the conviction of his own mind, and with the benefits, therefore, of the conviction of such a mind as his. That gentleman had admitted that Congress might, if they thought proper, introduce a qualification of their assent to the admission of Missouri into the Union, which shall serve to show its dissent to a particular clause of the constitution of that State. If this resolution, then, instead of being merely formal and declaratory, was susceptible of an amendment by which Congress could exclude that interpretation of a particular clause of the State constitution which on its face it bears, would it be said that the State was a member of the Union without the adoption of that resolve? If so, where did Congress derive the authority to legislate on the interpretation of its constitution? Mr. S. further called the attention of the committee to the terms of the preamble of this resolution, wherein it is declared that, "whereas, in pursuance of an act of Congress, &c., the people of the said Territory did, on the 19th day of July, 1820, by a convention called for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution and State government, so formed, is republican, and in conformity to the provisions of the said act." The reason assigned for her admission is, that she has formed a constitution in conformity to the provisions of the act of last session. How could the committee know this? By their own examination? Could Congress, then, declare this to be the case, without having examined the constitution of the new State? Certainly not. And when, in the act authorizing the formation of this constitution, were found two limitations, that it should be republican, and that it should not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, did it not become indispensable, before passing a preamble and resolution like this, that the members of this House should be satisfied in their own minds that these requisitions have been complied with?

If in a single article, the constitution of Missouri be repugnant to that of the United States, said Mr. S., can we seriously assert that she has formed a constitution according to the authority given to her? And, when called on to say how we can reconcile it to ourselves to sanction such a contradiction in terms, will it be sufficient to say that we have nothing to do with that question, and will leave it to the Judiciary to decide? We have nothing to do with it! exclaimed Mr. SEBASTIAN. Why, then, prescribe to the people of Missouri any conditions in the first instance? Why not say, we gave her a right to form a constitution; she has formed it, and whether it be or be not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, she is a member of the Union? The contradiction was sufficiently apparent in the fact of the introduction of this resolution; it would be seen at once, that the House was neither conforming to the Constitution of the United States, to the act of the last session, nor to any principle heretofore observed in the admission of States. Could it be said that Congress had parted with the power of looking into the constitution of Missouri, when it had expressly prescribed conditions which should be indispensable to its acceptance? The terms of the compact, if the act of the last session was to be considered a compact, between the United States and Missouri, were perfectly clear; and he took this opportunity of saying, that, if Missouri was involved in difficulty—if Congress found itself in perplexity—if the Union was disturbed on this occasion—if this House was impelled to the consideration of questions which it was painful to act upon, it was not the fault of the Constitution of the United States, but it was the fault of the people of Missouri. It might be their error—an error which they would be glad to avail themselves of an opportunity to correct—for, Mr. S. said, he could not believe the people of Missouri would have wantonly introduced into their constitution a clause at variance with the Constitution of the United States, under an impression that this act of admission was a mere form. They would not wantonly have done it, for it could not be either their interest or their inclination to try the temper of the Congress of the United States—to try how far its regard to the constitution would bear it out in the contest, or how far it would consent to surrender a portion of the rights of the whole Union to avoid a difficulty which the people of Missouri have themselves created. There was prescribed to them but one condition; to that condition they had not conformed, and they are not entitled to admission into the Union. The failure to fulfil the compact is on the part of the people of Missouri; and, said Mr. S., when we come, in a case of this sort, to the question between remanding this constitution for reconsideration, or giving up the smallest possible portion of constitutional power, I trust that the people of every part of the Union would bear us out in saying that the constitution shall be inviolate; and that we shall not be the first to set a precedent which, begun to-day, may be followed to-morrow, until it involves the very existence of our Government.

Would the people of Missouri, Mr. S. asked, think more highly of Congress were it to yield to them on this occasion? Would they not hereafter come into the Union with more respect for Congress, and with more respect for themselves, too—with a higher sense of the value of admission into the Union, if Congress now fairly met this question, thus giving to the people of Missouri an assurance that what was now done with respect to them should be hereafter the rule of conduct for Congress, as to others asking admission into the Union? Would it not show to them that Congress was disposed to do all in its power to preserve the blessings of this Government for them and for their posterity? What, he asked, would be the consequence of submission by Congress in the present case? Missouri will have extorted from us something; another State will extort something more; each will appeal to our fears, which may be well or ill-founded; each new State will endeavor to exact from us what she thinks will make for her own interest, until at last they will not think it worth while to ask our leave to do as they choose. How much better would it be for Congress at once to take its ground, and refuse to sanction the constitution of any State which is in any respect repugnant to that of the United States!

Suppose that this constitution of Missouri, instead of being faulty in a single particular, were throughout, from beginning to end, at variance with the Constitution of the United States. Would it be pretended, in that case, that Missouri was entitled to be admitted into the Union? Certainly not; yet the only argument in favor of her admission, with one clause of her constitution incompatible with that of the United States, went the whole length, or necessarily involved the consequence of yielding the whole; because it was founded on the ground that Congress had parted with the whole power, and had no right to pass upon the constitution; on the ground, in short, that Missouri is now admitted into the Union.

The gentleman himself, however, had, in another part of his speech, given up this, which was the essential part of his argument; for he had concluded that, if the constitution of Missouri was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States in particulars which could not be submitted to the judicial authority for decision, Congress ought to interfere. If, said Mr. S., we ought in any case to interfere, there must be a mode of interference. What is the mode, and what should be the time? When, certainly, she presents herself for admission. And, if we have then a right to inquire whether there is or is not occasion for our interference, is not the whole ground of the gentleman's argument abandoned?

Pursuing his argument, Mr. S. said he held it to be perfectly true that there could be no violation of the Constitution of the United States which would not produce injurious civil and political effects, as distinguished from individual effects over which the Judiciary have control. How many men may be injured before one man appears with a spirit to resist the injustice! What, Mr. S. asked, did the history of all Governments exhibit to us but a series of usurpations on one hand and sufferings on the other, submitted to until they became too grievous longer to be borne? Men suffer long; they suffer from necessity, from poverty, from ignorance, from the want of capacity to exert those rights which belong to them, and which it ought to be the care of a wise Government to preserve to them. Why is it that the names of men who, in all time past, have resisted oppression, have been immortalized by the historian, the painter, and the poet? Why have they been considered as entitled to peculiar honors? Because they took upon themselves the burden, and a heavy burden it is, of resisting by force the Government which had long oppressed and persecuted them and their fellow-men, under the forms of law. Now, said Mr. S., if we allow bad principles to be admitted into the constitutions of States formed under our eye, or good principles to be excluded, what will be the consequence? You shift the responsibility from yourselves, and leave it to individuals to fight the battle with the States. Why do our State constitutions contain declarations of rights? Why have the people been so careful thus to lay down the principles which are to guide the Government in its operations? For the purpose of preserving political and civil rights inviolate as well as individual rights, and to prevent individuals from suffering under their violation.

Coming nearer to the particular question involved in the constitution now presented by Missouri, Mr. S. said, suppose that constitution had said that no free white citizen of the United States should come to reside in Missouri—was there any gentleman who would say that, with such a provision in her constitution, Missouri ought to be admitted into the Union? He would not answer for others, but, for himself, he believed such a provision would produce such a shock as would occasion but one feeling throughout the country—that of resistance. This was an extreme case, he knew, (not likely to happen,) but he had put it for the purpose of illustration; and he confessed that the argument appeared to him irresistible, that a power to examine the provisions of the constitution must exist, and that a power to refuse admission, in certain cases, must necessarily result.

If Congress, having the power to reject, should yet accept the constitution of Missouri, Mr. S. contended it could not, with any propriety, be said that Congress did not approve the constitution of Missouri.

The trust of guarding the Constitution of the United States from violation, said he, in continuation, is peculiarly and emphatically ours. We are sworn to support the constitution before we enter on the duties to which we are called under it; and, he believed the gentleman from South Carolina himself, and every other member of this House, would go along with him in saying that their support of the constitution ought to be active and zealous, and not a cold and penurious support. It ought to be no calculation how much they might give up of that constitution, but a determination that even if there be doubt, that doubt should be determined in favor of the constitution. It should be thus, said he, that by a constant, warm, and cordial support of it here, we may invigorate and quicken the respect and veneration for that instrument, which, I trust, is entertained by the whole people of the United States.

With respect to the proposition to turn over to the judiciary the decision of the question involved in this constitution, Mr. S. said he must declare, that, with the greatest respect possible for the judiciary; with the highest confidence in their rectitude and wisdom; with the greatest willingness to submit to their decisions in their proper sphere; he could not consent, on a question which was properly presented for his own decision, to say, let the question sleep till some humble individual, some poor citizen, shall come forward and claim a decision of it. He never would pass a duty by, by leaving it to some individual to do what Congress ought to have done. No, Mr. S. said, his idea of supporting the constitution was, to give it such an active support as should convince everybody that even the appearance of violation of it would not be permitted. And he begged gentlemen, before they consented to take a course different from this, that they would consider, seriously consider, what may be the effect, in a Government depending on public opinion for its support, of a disrespect of its authority exhibited on this floor.

Mr. S. then noticed the argument which Mr. Lowndes had derived from the Journal of this House of the last session, in the case of the motion of Mr. TAYLOR to amend the Missouri act so as to require her constitution, when formed, to be approved by Congress, &c., before she could become a State—which motion was negatived by two to one. Mr. S. admitted the fact, but argued that it proved nothing in favor of Mr. Lowndes's argument. Gentlemen had voted against it on various grounds; some, he knew, had voted against it because they believed it superfluous, holding the opinion which he was now maintaining, that the constitution must, of course, receive the sanction of Congress before it could be of any authority, &c.

Mr. S. then referred, for illustration, to the case of Louisiana, who was required to submit her constitution to Congress, and it was submitted and approved accordingly before it went into operation. If Congress, according to the gentleman's argument, had no right to do so, this proceeding was all unconstitutional and void. And it was worthy of remark that, at the same time that constitution was required to be submitted to Congress, it was also required to be not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Yet Louisiana was not intended to be admitted on different terms from other States, but on the same, &c.

But, independently of the act of the last session, it had been asserted that Missouri is now a State; that she is a State in fact. Mr. S. asked of gentlemen seriously to consider this position. From what time has she become a State? From the moment of the passage of our act, from that of the adoption of her constitution, or from that of the organization of her government? He did not distinctly understand from what point of time the gentleman from South Carolina dated her independence—

[Mr. Lowndes here explained what point of time he referred to. It was at the moment when, the question having been formally proposed to the people of Missouri, whether they chose to form a constitution and State government, they voted it expedient to do so, it was then that he thought arose the right in them of self-government.]

Mr. S. did not consider the point of time in this respect material. The question was, is Missouri entitled to the rights of a State until she be admitted into the Union by Congress? In support of this opinion, he said, no reason had been assigned that was founded in the Constitution of the United States. Reasons had been assigned by the gentleman of South Carolina, which appeared to him to be founded in a convenience which amounted to a sort of necessity, but no argument had been drawn from the constitution in support of this position. We have the power to admit a State into the Union, said Mr. S., but was it ever supposed that a State was admitted, by her own act, before we admitted her? Could it be pretended that, when Congress authorized the people of Missouri to form a constitution, and under the circumstances of this case, they did admit them into the Union? It might be argued, with some plausibility, that Congress had by that act engaged that, at some time, they should be admitted into the Union. If the authority given had been to erect themselves into a sovereign and independent State, Mr. S. would have been able to understand the argument that they are now a State. But, when Congress gave them authority to form a constitution to fit them for admission, to say that Congress did then admit them into the Union was an argument not intelligible; and almost equally so was that which made her out to be a State whenever her people had formed a constitution.

The United States, with respect to her territory, stood almost in the same relation as one of the States to its territory. Virginia, for example, gave authority to the people of that part of her territory which is now Kentucky, to form a constitution. The territory called a convention, made a State government, fixed the mode of her elections, and elected her officers. Was she then a member of the Union? Yes, when Congress agreed to admit her into the Union. Was she a State before that took place? Certainly not. So with the Territories of the United States. Congress gives them authority to make a constitution, preparatory to their admission, and that being done, Congress may admit them.

If, said Mr. S. further, Representatives from a Territory which has thus formed a constitution, present themselves at the door of this House, is not the House bound to inquire whether they are the Representatives of a State? Must we not examine whether they are properly deputed, or must we admit anybody and everybody who presents himself and declares that he is the Representative of a State? We may know the fact out of doors, but it must also be known here; to ascertain it, we are obliged to examine the constitution. Mr. S. entered into a train of reasoning to show the inconvenience which would result from each branch of the Government being left to determine for itself the independence of a State, the chance of their not concurring in their views of the subject, and the incongruity which would result from such a disagreement.

The orderly, politic, and regular course of proceeding in such a case as this, was so obvious, he said, that he was only astonished that, in any case, a different course had been pursued. In the main, he said, the construction had been that for which he contended. Whatever irregularities there might have been in other respects, with respect to the newly formed States, the full extension to a State of the benefits of its admission into the Union had never taken place, until, by some act, Congress had expressly or impliedly recognized its admission.

Mr. S. then proceeded to inquire whether the practice of our Government sustained the doctrine which he had endeavored to show was inconsistent with its theory. With respect to precedents, whilst he disavowed a slavish subjection to their authority, yet he acknowledged that if they were clear and undeviating, showing a uniform practice under the constitution to the present time, he should consider them of very high authority. He recollected, in a case at the last session, the gentleman from South Carolina had not considered them of so great weight; but Mr. S. said he agreed with that gentleman now in allowing them weight, provided they have the character of uniformity. He was mistaken if, upon examination, they did not turn out differently from what the member from South Carolina had supposed. In examining them, a precedent might be made out to warrant any course gentlemen chose, they differed so much from each other; among them might be found one for a people making a constitution without previous authority from Congress, and that too out of the territory of the United States, for which nobody would contend. Mr. S. here briefly ran over the cases of admission into the Union, commenting on each. Kentucky, Vermont, Tennessee, Ohio, and Louisiana, were admitted up to 1811, inclusive, and in every case some act of the Government had been thought necessary, precedent or subsequent, to entitle them to admission. From the year 1811, however, every State admitted (five in number, besides Maine, whose case was peculiar) had been formed by previous authority, and had come into the Union by virtue of an act or resolution expressly admitting her. Would gentlemen, then, take the single precedent of Kentucky, of Tennessee, of Vermont, with their peculiarities, and apply it to a State formed out of a new Territory purchased by the United States, or would they take the case of other States, which formed a series of precedents, each distinctly recognizing the power of Congress to give previous authority to a people to form a constitution, and also the authority and right of Congress to admit them into the Union, and the necessity of such an act of admission?

With respect to elections by the inchoate States, he considered them as provisional, and made valid by the ratification of the constitution. The Representative from Indiana taking his seat before the passage of the act for her admission, he considered an oversight. And was not the fact of the Representative from Missouri remaining absent, asserting no right as a Representative, and not being admitted as such, (and so of her Senators also,) a stronger evidence of the opinion, not only of the old States, but of the new States too, than a single precedent of irregularity, as that of Indiana?

Having shown, in his opinion, that Congress possessed the right and power to examine this question, Mr. S. proceeded to the remaining points in the discussion.

In this particular case, the mode of proceeding proposed, struck him as the most objectionable that could be devised; because it seemed to him that the report and the observations of the chairman of the committee, did admit that there was something in the constitution formed by the people of Missouri, upon which, if the House was called upon to speak, gentlemen would be obliged to say they are of opinion it is unconstitutional; for, in the first place, the committee are willing to leave the decision on a particular clause to the Judiciary; in the next place, they think it susceptible of an interpretation not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States; and, it is lastly suggested, that Congress may avoid the difficulty by a protest, or explanation, or interpretation of the clause, as they desire it to be understood. All this seemed to convey the impression that there was something there, which gentlemen wished to avoid voting and deciding upon.

To refer the subject to the Judiciary was one mode proposed for getting over it. To this course there were a great many objections, which doubtless had already occurred to the minds of the committee. Among these, Mr. S. dwelt particularly on the following: that, if it be the duty of this House to pronounce on any question, they had no right to shift the responsibility on the Judiciary; and that Congress cannot send the question to the Judiciary, there being no mode prescribed in the constitution by which they could do it.

With regard to leaving it to chance to bring it before the Judiciary, that chance might never come, &c. If the Judiciary were, indeed, the tribunal to decide the question, they ought to decide it before the House acted on it. Another great objection to the course proposed was, that it would unnecessarily throw on the Judiciary the performance of an odious duty, which he acknowledged this to be; and it seemed to him gentlemen showed too strongly, by their mode of proceeding, and their endeavors to throw it from themselves, that they felt it to be so. But this House was much better able to bear the odium of it than the Judiciary. Mr. S. said he never would consent that the Congress of the United States should, for their own relief, burden the Judiciary with that sort of question, the decision of which makes it most obnoxious, exposes it most to that excitement which, of all departments of the Government, it was least capable of contending against. The effects of unpopular decisions in the State courts, showed what might possibly be the effect, in similar cases, on the United States Judiciary. He wished the whole strength of the Federal Judiciary might be maintained unimpaired for cases wherein the exertion of it might be necessary, which it was not in the present case. Another objection to the course proposed was, that, if the argument in its favor proved any thing, it proved too much. The more objectionable a clause of the constitution is, the stronger is the reason against the reference of it to the Judiciary, because it would there more certainly be declared so. A full consideration of all the views which could be taken of the subject, Mr. S. said, would bring him back to the true ground, that this House ought to decide itself upon the question.

If the Judiciary had been the proper tribunal to determine this question, Mr. S. went on to argue, it was so as to all questions which could arise respecting a new constitution; and if a gross and palpable series of infractions of the Constitution of the United States were contained in a constitution formed by the people of a Territory, Congress would be justified, as much as in the present case, in referring it to the Judiciary.

It had been suggested that the present was a case which it would be difficult for Congress to decide, because the clause of the Missouri constitution was said to have offended that clause of the Constitution of the United States to which it was most difficult to give a precise interpretation. That clause Mr. S. quoted in the following words: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Mr. S. said he should be exceedingly sorry to believe that this clause was so difficult of construction that this House could not decide whether or not it had been violated in a given case; because, in one of our standard books, (the Federalist,) one of those authorities to which we refer for light in difficult cases of construction of the constitution, it was said that this very clause was the "basis of the Union." Strange, indeed, that this clause should have been considered the basis of the Union, and yet so equivocal that a construction could not be given to it.

If there was a difficulty in defining precisely the scope of the clause of the constitution, there could be none in deciding that it does give to the citizens of each State in the Union the humblest and lowest right enjoyed by a free man. Did any one doubt, Mr. S. asked, that this clause gives to citizens of every State the free right to go into any other State, to return, or to remain there? If that was denied, then he would agree that this clause of the constitution was all words and no meaning. Here, then, was the very point of this question. If the constitution of the State of Missouri has, either by its own positive provisions, or by enjoining it on its Legislature, excluded altogether from the State of Missouri any man who is a citizen of another State in this Union, then it is impossible to reconcile that constitution to the Constitution of the United States. It would be a defiance, which is worse than resistance, to the Constitution of the United States, if it had been intentional; but Mr. S. acquitted Missouri of any such intention.

Mr. S. declined going into the question how far a State had a right to make laws with regard to a certain class of persons referred to in the objected clause of the Missouri constitution. He briefly examined the suggestion of Mr. Lowndes that that clause did not intend to exclude such persons as were citizens in other States. But the clause itself, Mr. S. said, made no distinction of classes, but extended equally to both classes. Missouri might make the distinction if she chose. Was it for Congress to make an exception for her which she did not choose to make for herself, and which the Legislature of Missouri might not choose to consider as any part of that clause of the constitution? Congress had no right to interpret for them their own meaning. He then went on to show in what States free persons of color were citizens, and mentioned North Carolina, New York, and Massachusetts among them. To make them citizens of any State it was not necessary they should have a right to vote, as Mr. S. showed by various references that more than half the white men in some of our States did not vote, because they were not freeholders; yet no one would deny them to be citizens of those States, &c.

It was the humble simple privilege of locomotion only that was now claimed for these persons; it was a right indispensable to citizenship, and it was all that was asked for in the present case. If there was any way in which a citizen of one State can enjoy all the privileges and immunities of a citizen of another State, and yet not be permitted to set his foot in it, Mr. S. said he should be glad to be informed of it. With respect to the right of Missouri or of any State of the Union to regulate its own citizens, or to prescribe laws for their government, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, Mr. S. said, no one pretended to interfere. She must regulate her own concerns upon such policy as she thinks best, &c. On what would be her true policy, Mr. S. made a few remarks which the reporter did not hear with sufficient distinctness to report them.

Upon the whole, Mr. S. said, it was clear that, unless something was introduced, by interpretation, into the clause of the constitution of Missouri, respecting free people of color, which the framers of it have not introduced, and which it is not known that they would be willing to introduce, it is a plain and palpable infraction of the Constitution of the United States.

The plain course, then, he believed, was not to receive the constitution formed by the people of Missouri. For himself, he believed, and with him many of the members of this House believed, that it was the duty of this House to look into the constitution, and if they found it contrary to the constitution, that it was the duty of this House to reject it.

What the consequences of doing so might be, it was not for him to anticipate; but, whatever they might be, they could not be worse than the recognition of the constitution in its present shape. But why apprehend any disagreeable consequences? Might not Congress discuss a question of this sort without reference to danger? Might it not reject this constitution of Missouri, without giving her any right to unqualified independence? Or was this House to give way, right or wrong? True, Mr. S. said, Congress had been much divided in opinion on the question of the last session, and they might be on this. But, as far as gentlemen might think the consequences of such division dangerous—the consequences they dreaded were the consequences of free and fair investigation—the consequence of men doing what they believe to be right; and when men yield to fears excited by such causes, they give up the right of free discussion, the right of exercising their own judgment, the right of maintaining what, in their consciences, they think to be right. Does it follow, because there is a strong opposition to any measure, because there is great feeling and warmth on it, that therefore principle is to be abandoned? That no one would maintain. Neither was it consistent with the theory of our Government; because, at last, the will of the majority must govern. And, whatever fears might be entertained by others, Mr. S. said he felt confident that the will of the majority would be submitted to.

With respect to what would be the condition of the Territory on the rejection of this constitution, Mr. S. said, it appeared to him it would be territorial. What provision it might be necessary to make in respect to it he did not pretend to say, nor whether it would be necessary to make any. A case of the sort had never occurred in the history of our Government, and it would, if it occurred, deserve a careful and deliberate examination and decision. Here Mr. S. concluded his observations.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, who desired an opportunity of stating the reasons which would induce him to vote against the resolution for the admission of Missouri, the committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 8.

Missouri—Citizenship of Free Persons of Color.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said: Whatever our opinions may be on the subject which was here agitated at the last session, it is now to be determined whether Missouri shall be admitted to the distinguished rank of one of the sister States of our Union. Believing that the constitution which she has presented to us is repugnant, at least in one of its provisions, to the Constitution of the United States, I am constrained to express an opinion against the adoption of the resolution now under consideration. The Legislature of the proposed State are directed, "as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in the State, under any pretext whatever." The authority thus conferred by the people of Missouri on their Legislature, in my judgment, infringes the security contained in the Constitution of the United States, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

The committee who reported this resolution have said, that "of all the articles in our constitution, there is probably not one more difficult to construe well," than this. I had, indeed, supposed, that, on the principle established in this article, rested the whole structure of our National Government. It was upon considerations derived chiefly from the nature of our political system in this respect, that I had at the last session formed the opinion against our power to insist on the restriction proposed to be inserted in the bill then before us.

The foundation of this article of the constitution is laid deep in the structure of the Government. It is capable of no construction which does not plainly denote the universality of its operation, and its uniform application to individual right throughout every portion of the nation. By what tenure except this is a citizen of New York invested with the right of inheritance to lands in Ohio? By what other authority are the courts of justice thrown open in Virginia or New York to the citizens of every other State? It is the operation of this clause which reduces us to a perfect equality of rights with those around us, wheresoever we may transfer ourselves in every part of the Republic. The right of acquiring lands by purchase in other States—of devising them to our children—of enforcing private contracts, and an almost infinite variety of civil privileges, are all sustained on this obvious construction of the clause in question. To have omitted it would, in a Government like ours, have destroyed the whole harmony of the system, and produced the most jarring and discordant conflict of privileges. Without it, the citizens of each State, except in relation to the powers specifically delegated to the Union, would have been altogether aliens and strangers to each other, without any other mutuality of privileges than those derived from their common limited National Confederacy. Instead of inheriting the estates of their ancestors in other States, the law of escheats would have transferred them to foreign sovereignty. The enforcement of private right, if not the security of personal liberty, would have depended on the will or caprice of every State Legislature. Regulations of the most unjust nature might have created and maintained the most odious and oppressive distinctions. The whole tendency of the system would have been to estrange us from each other, and probably in the course of time we should have found in the want of this equality of privileges perhaps the very source of disunion itself. If, sir, as the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Lowndes) seemed to admit, cases might happen in which it would be the duty of Congress to reject the admission of a State into the Union for the repugnancy of its constitution to that of the General Government, can we scarcely imagine a case more deeply affecting the validity of our system, and more calculated to lead to the most dangerous encroachments on private rights and personal liberty, than an impugnement of this clause of our constitution.

The power of determining to whom the privilege of citizenship shall extend in the respective States has been vested, or rather was left untouched in the hands of the State Legislatures, with the single exception of the right of Congress to regulate the naturalization of foreigners or aliens. The power thus vested in Congress appears to be necessarily exclusive, and was probably intended to be so. With this diminution only of the sovereignty of the States in this respect, the original power inherent in every Government of determining the extent of the right of citizenship remains unimpaired in the States. It is worthy of remark that, while under the old Confederation, this power in the States extended to the naturalization of aliens, its exercise in some of them had produced serious complaints from the other members of the Confederacy. The adoption of aliens into our political families as citizens by the laws of one State, gave to that class of persons, by one of the articles of the Confederation, privileges of trade, and commerce, and immunities of citizenship, in the rest deemed by many to have been productive of serious inconveniences to their own citizens, and unreasonable interference with their separate interests. The power of extending the benefit of naturalization to aliens, was, therefore, in conformity with the other features of our Government, which were truly national in regard to its external relations, delegated to the General Government. With this exception only, the people of each State still retain and exercise the power of conferring upon all the various classes of persons within their respective State jurisdictions, such rights and privileges as to themselves shall appear most conducive to their interest, and most consonant to their own views of justice, equality, and good government. Whatever inconveniences may be supposed to result from the incidental operation of this power, in relation to the other States, must be attributed therefore to that principle of our Union, without which our National Government would retain as little perhaps of permanency as utility.

The description of persons disfranchised by the proposed constitution of Missouri, have been admitted to the rank of freemen in other States, and recognized as citizens. In the State of New York, for instance, they have in many cases more decisive characteristics of citizens, and enjoy greater privileges than a large class of the free white population, to whom none would deny the character of citizenship. Possessed of the qualifications for suffrage required by her State constitution, they exercise the electoral right of voting for the Executive and Senatorial departments, while a great portion of the free white population, not invested with the same qualifications, enjoy only the subordinate privilege of electing delegates to the House of Assembly, or are deprived altogether of the right of suffrage. As freemen of that State they are represented, even here, by the exercise of their electoral franchise, in virtue of their character as a portion of "the people of the several States," having the "qualifications for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures." It would be no difficult task, by referring to the constitutions and laws of many other States, to point out the same recognition of this class of persons as free citizens; but a more decisive evidence of the soundness of this conclusion, is to be derived from the principles and practice of the National Government itself. The laws of the United States for the protection of American seamen from impressment have been construed (and without question of the correctness of such an interpretation) to extend to this class of persons. As "citizens of the United States," according to the terms of the act, they have uniformly received certificates of protection for their security against the violation of their rights. The impressment of persons of this very description, among others, contributed to our loud and just complaints against the violence of a foreign power. In the official returns of impressed American citizens heretofore formally communicated to this House, will be found many of this class. It was then justly considered that the oppression of seamen of this description, by the agents of a foreign Government, involved the violation of our national sovereignty.

To establish a doctrine in relation to this class of persons who have been thus recognized by different States as free citizens, which should deprive them of the benefit of this clause of our national constitution, would, in many cases deeply affecting their personal rights, be productive of peculiar hardship and injustice. Let us suppose that one of this class, in the State of Missouri, dying intestate, should leave the inheritance of his lands to his children, also free, but residing in Pennsylvania, and there invested with the rights of citizens. What power among us could rightfully be exerted consistently with the privileges secured by the Constitution of the United States, to deprive them of the enjoyment of such an inheritance? What principle of sovereignty reserved by our compact to the State of Missouri, could thus limit the operation of the supreme right of Pennsylvania to confer upon the citizens which she had adopted or recognized these privileges?

But the exercise of such a power by the Legislature of Missouri would not only thus defeat one of the greatest blessings of the Union, but might operate as a control on the power of the General Government itself. Let us consider the effect of a measure of this sort, of the Legislature of that State, in its operation on a personal right derived from the United States. I know of no impediment to persons of this description becoming purchasers of the public lands, and deriving title to them from others. In the case, too, of the distribution of the military bounty lands, patents may issue to persons of this class. Inseparably annexed to such a grant is the right of occupation; and can we successfully maintain a doctrine which might in this way indirectly render the State laws of Missouri, if not paramount to the laws of the Union, at least effectual to defeat the rights created under them? From every view of this subject, the conclusion in my mind is inevitable, that the State of Missouri must yield up this assumption of power to the supreme control of the national constitution. The citizens of the other States must enjoy within her jurisdiction all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens, subject to no restraints or conditions not equally imposed on the citizens of Missouri herself. If the arbitrary (I mean not, despotic) distinction created in her constitution can be maintained, she might, with equal right, extend it much further, and deny to all citizens of other States who had not, for instance, reached the age of forty years, or who shall be born after her admission into the Union, the right of emigration to the State.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, took the floor. He had not expected, he said, to have engaged in this discussion to-day, and should necessarily, therefore, speak without preparation; but he promised the committee, that, in the few remarks which he should submit, he should observe every possible degree of brevity.

The subject now under consideration, he said, was one which had become painful to the nation, and, he feared, painful to the House. But it was one to be decided, and it was his most earnest wish that the decision should be such as to avert any possible evil foreseen by any of the gentlemen who had discussed the subject.

What, said Mr. B., is the provision of the constitution which has been referred to as being violated? It is, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." And this provision of the constitution was said to be contradicted by the constitution of Missouri, because a clause in the latter enjoins on the Legislature to pass such laws for the exclusion from the State of people of a certain description. To maintain this proposition, the opponents of Missouri would have to make out that the persons thus proposed to be excluded are citizens of the States. The member from Pennsylvania had yesterday told the House that he would not undertake to say what a citizen is. In that particular, Mr. B. said, in his estimation, the gentleman did not perform a duty which devolved on him. On whom, in this case, did the burden of proof devolve? We, said Mr. B., offer the constitution of a new State, formed under the authority of law. You oppose it, because you say it is incompatible with the Constitution of the United States. With what provision is it incompatible? With that which has been already stated. Did it not then belong to gentlemen who oppose the admission of Missouri to show, that those people whom she proposes to exclude are citizens, in the sense of the Constitution of the United States, before they asserted that the constitution of Missouri was irreconcilable with that of the United States

Missouri State Constitution—Citizenship of Free Colored Persons.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania would not say affirmatively what makes a citizen, but he said that, to constitute a man a citizen, it was not indispensable that he should have a right of voting. To make any reasoning conclusive, Mr. B. said, we must distinctly see, in the outset, what one side admits, and what the other denies. To know this was indispensable to a correct conclusion on any disputed point. Let us then inquire, said he, who are citizens? For, in his humble opinion, that point, which the member from Pennsylvania did not choose to discuss, lay at the root of this question, and its decision was unavoidable.

I will undertake, said Mr. B., what the member from Pennsylvania would not. I will define what is meant by the term citizen—what are the qualities which constitute citizenship. He might mistake, he said, in this position; but, according to the best lights he had, it was correct; and if so, it would seem to lead to a conclusion directly contrary to that drawn by the member from Pennsylvania. The term citizen, Mr. B. said, could not with propriety be applied to any one unless under these circumstances: that he should be possessed of all at least of the civil rights, if not of the political, of every other person in the community, under like circumstances, of which he is not deprived for some cause personal to himself.

If, said he, I am correct in this definition, let us proceed to apply it to the people who are the subject of this inquiry, and see how far their condition places them within the scope of it.

This, however, was not the view of the question which he rose for the purpose of presenting. In the view which he was about to take, he should proceed upon the supposition that the constitution of Missouri was properly before the committee for consideration, and that the true inquiry was, does this constitution contain, or not, any provision incompatible with the superior provisions of the Federal Constitution? It would be his endeavor to show that it does not. Whatever opinion he might entertain of the condition of the State, or of the powers of this House in relation to it, it did not impinge on the view that he should present, which admitted, for the opponents of Missouri, the position most favorable to them, that the constitution was now properly submitted for consideration, and for the examination of the question whether it contains any provisions in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Before he proceeded to do this, however, he said, he would dismiss the objections which might be offered to the definition which he had taken the liberty to give. It might be said, for example, that even in Virginia one white man is entitled to a particular right, while another is not. Still, Mr. B. said, his definition applied, because all under like circumstances had like rights. Show me, in Virginia, said he, or in any other State with the laws of which I am acquainted, any white man who is deprived of the rights of other white men similarly circumstanced. Every white man of Virginia who has a freehold, votes. Females do not vote; but all females do not vote. All white persons in Virginia may sue and be sued; all are entitled to the great civil rights of personal liberty and the free possession and enjoyment of personal property. It was no objection, therefore, to the definition which Mr. B. had presented, that, in a community, there were distinctions, some having rights which others have not; because they were not in like circumstances. A young man under the age of twenty-one years cannot make a will; but all persons under like circumstances are subject to the same disability. A man above forty-five years of age is exempted from militia duty; but all above the age of forty-five are exempt. Show me an instance, said Mr. B., in any State in this Union, where, among white men, rights are enjoyed by some which are forbidden to others under like circumstances. It cannot be shown.

Is there, then, said he, pursuing the purpose of his argument, a State of this Union in which colored men have all the civil rights of any other citizens in the community to which they belong? He proceeded to examine the laws of the several States on this subject. In Virginia, a colored man—yes, even a slave, and of that class over whom it was supposed, by those unacquainted with facts, that so much tyranny was exercised—is secured against at least one undue degree of personal violence. The free man of color rises higher—to the dignity of the right to sue and to be sued, to acquire property, to make contracts. He was yet under one signal political disability—he is not allowed the right of suffrage; and under an important civil disability, not being allowed to give testimony in any suit in which a white man is a party. In North Carolina, persons of this description are indulged in the highest political privilege, the right of suffrage, and are yet deprived of the privilege of giving testimony in any case in which a white man is a party—a privilege which can only be wrested from a white man for some cause particular to himself. In Virginia, further, in regard to manumitted slaves, considering them as hostile to public peace, as the brand of discord between the whites and another class of persons, it was declared, by the law, that every manumitted slave should, within twelve months after the act of manumission, leave the State, or forfeit the rights he had acquired.

Mr. B. said he would not, as he might, go further into detail on this point: it was sufficient to say, in general, that free people of color are in all the States deprived of many of the rights of white men. Was there any State in the Union in which they were in the full enjoyment of civil rights? Mr. B. said he took some degree of interest in looking to the laws of Massachusetts in regard to this description of people, who, it had been said, enjoyed in that State an unqualified equality with the whites. But he found, on examination, it was otherwise. He found a penalty was imposed by a law of fifty pounds on any minister who marries a white with a colored person, and it was declared, that any such marriages should be null and void in law—and on what grounds? Not upon the ground of crime in the parties, carrying with it disability. Was it it not upon the ground of the disqualification of one of the parties to make that particular contract? How disqualified? Because of his color, certainly. The party may be of age—in the exercise of his sound senses; he may be able to make contracts in relation to property; but, in regard to marriage—in that particular in which, above all other things, we ought to pursue our own happiness, in our own way, he may not contract, but under certain circumstances, that is, with a person of color. Whom God has joined, let no man put asunder—but in old Massachusetts they do put asunder the colored person who intermarries with the white.

We find, then, said Mr. B., that in the East and North, as well as in the South and West, there are certain distinctions growing out of color. They are distinctions founded in the best good sense, in the preservation of public morality and of the dignity of our nature, and in the consideration that between the whites and the blacks there never can be an incorporation which is calculated to add to the happiness or elevate the dignity of either party. Mr. B. asked, in further illustration of the denial of civil rights, even in the Eastern States, to colored persons, whether a colored man had ever been known to sit on a jury? He was told not. This attempt to maintain a principle in theory, which was abandoned in practice, forcibly reminded him of an incident in Roman history. It was known that there was a long and severe contest in that republic between the patricians and the plebeians, in relation to a claim set up by the latter, of the right of being elected to the Consulship; and yet, after this pretension was acquiesced in, a century perhaps elapsed before any plebeian was actually elected. Was there any other State in this Union, Mr. B. asked, which had declared the free man of color to be equal in his civil and political rights to the white man? If so, he called on gentlemen to produce it.

There was a time, Mr. B. went on to say, when the man of color and the white man were not equal in any part of this country, even in theory. The population which came to this country from abroad were Europeans or the descendants of Europeans. They found the aborigines here, but, as far as they came from abroad, they were of European birth or descent. This other race, said Mr. B., got among us afterwards. I deeply regret that they did. When they came, they were slaves. He called upon gentlemen to show the words, in any of the State constitutions, which declare that a man of color, become or born free, shall be elevated to the grade of the whites. He would refer, he said, to some clauses in constitutions on which he supposed gentlemen would rely to prove this; but he would show that those clauses would not bear them out.

Do you find it, said he, in the constitution of New York or Massachusetts, that free people of color shall vote? No; you will find that every male person or male inhabitant shall vote; and, under this clause, it is said that free persons of color have equal rights with the whites. If upon that construction, these persons are considered as citizens, who else are? Aliens are male persons. Were gentlemen prepared to say, that an Englishman or an Irishman, having a six months' residence, and being a free citizen, should have a right to vote at all elections? He would state a case yet more impressive, deriving an argument from the condition of certain unhappy remnants of the aborigines lingering out their wretched lives among the inhabitants of these States; there were some of those persons in Massachusetts and some in other States. Are they not free persons? Yet, do you suffer them to vote, or to sue and be sued? Do you receive them as witnesses? Are they entitled to those civil, much less those political rights, which are required to constitute them a part of the body politic? Was ever one of them a juror or a witness? Can they elect or be elected to any office? Can they hold property, except under regulations which are prescribed to them, and prescribed, too, by legislatures in which they are not represented? They cannot. What is the distinction between their case and that of the free people of color? They equally come into the definition of male persons and male inhabitants. Would any gentleman contend that Indians are citizens of every State in the Union, because they reside within any one of them? He presumed not.

It seemed to him, Mr. B. said, that, on a review of all the facts connected with this subject, it would be found, that free persons of color have been considered a nondescript class. In some States they have some civil rights; in others more. In some States they have some political rights; in others, none. It never had entered, he was persuaded, into the mind of any member of the Legislature of any State that they were citizens, under the definition which he had laid down. Had Virginia, he asked, violated the Constitution of the United States when she said that persons of color made free should depart her territory? He presumed no gentleman would contend that she had. If not, how could it be said, that she had a right to get rid of persons of that description already within her limits, and yet that she could not exclude a new torrent of that population attempted to be poured in upon her?

The member from New York had put to the committee a number of cases, all of which, Mr. B. said, if he mistook not, were susceptible of a ready answer. It would be found, indeed, that most of them were but different statements of the same proposition, and at last depend on the application of a principle. Suppose, said the gentleman, one of these persons residing in New York to acquire a right to a patent to land in Missouri; and shall he be entitled to the fee simple, and yet not entitled to occupancy of the land? The gentleman would see, Mr. B. said, that the free negro of Virginia had the same right to acquire property in Virginia as the free negro in New York could have to acquire it in Missouri; yet, being by law excluded from the State, he could not occupy it. The gentleman's argument proved, therefore, that, quo ad the right of purchase, the free people of color had civil rights, but not that they have all civil rights. Could it be argued because they had one civil right, that they therefore have all? Might it not as well be argued, because a man has one political right, he therefore has all political rights?

With respect to the power of naturalization, the gentleman from New York had correctly stated that the States have a right to declare who shall be citizens thereof respectively. Ay, said Mr. B., have they so? Has not Missouri, then, the right to say who shall be entitled to citizenship within her limits? Or is she alone to be kept in a state of pupillage, and are we to say to her now, as gentlemen wished to have said to her at the last session, you shall not have all the rights enjoyed by the other States of the Union? If Missouri says that certain persons shall not be her citizens, has any other State a right to say such persons shall be your citizens, whether you will or not? Did not the right, the existence of which had been acknowledged by the gentleman from New York, involve a power of making its exercise effectual? It was idle to say that a State had a right to decide this question, and yet that other persons had a right to overrule that decision, and be its citizens whether it would or not.

Mr. B. said he knew that the powers of the States had been greatly abridged by constructions of the constitution. He feared they would be yet more so. But he hoped it would not be here contended, that the rights of a State shall be so far abridged as that it shall not have power to protect its own safety and its own morals. If a man afflicted with a pestilent disease approached the shore of a State, there was certainly a right to keep him off. If vagabonds and fugitives from justice infest a State, they may certainly be expelled from it. What was the consequence of such a preservative power? We in the Southern States, said Mr. B., consider this description of population the most dangerous to the community that can possibly be conceived. They are just enough devoted to have some sense of liberty, and yet not the capacity to estimate or enjoy all its rights, if they had them—and being between two societies, above one and below the other, they are in the most dissatisfied state. They are themselves perpetual monuments of discontent, and firebrands to the other class of their own color. And if the time ever come when the flames of servile war enwrap this Union in a general blaze, perhaps we may have to look to them as the primary cause of such horrors. Has not a State, then, a right to get rid of them? They are not citizens in Missouri, and Missouri has as much right to say they should not be, as Massachusetts had to say that a black man shall not, within her limits, marry a white woman. Has not Missouri a right to send off beyond her limits persons of color when free? Virginia has done it, and Missouri must have the same right as Virginia. And here Mr. B. repeated his question, had Missouri a power to get rid of all the free people of color now there, and yet not the power to prevent others from going there?

When Mr. BARBOUR concluded, there seemed not to be a disposition in any person to rise.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, said that he wished to present his views on the subject, but was not prepared to do so this afternoon. He therefore asked that the committee should rise, and ask leave to sit again.

The committee, however, refused to rise.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, that he, too, wished to address the House on this question, but was prevented from doing so to-day by bodily indisposition.

Another motion for the committee to rise was negatived.

At length, however, after one or two more refusals, the committee rose and reported the resolution to the House; and, after several ineffectual attempts, a motion at length prevailed to lay it on the table.

SATURDAY, December 9.

Missouri—Citizenship of Free Persons of Color.

The House having resumed the consideration of the resolve declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union,

Mr. A. SMYTH, of Virginia, having obtained the floor, addressed the Chair. He said that the Constitution of the United States contains a clause that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" and the constitution formed for the State of Missouri contains a clause, making it the duty of the Legislature of that State to pass such laws as may be necessary "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, that State, under any pretext whatsoever;" and it has become a question whether the clause in the constitution of Missouri is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. He would attempt, he said, to show that there was no such repugnance.

The Constitution of the United States provides that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. This can only apply to citizens who are, in their own States, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens. Can it be shown that free negroes are such citizens in any one of the States as are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens? A citizen is he who is entitled to the freedom and privileges of the body politic, and has a share in its government. In Rome every citizen was enrolled in one of the thirty-five tribes, and, consequently, had the right of suffrage. When we apply the term "citizens" to the inhabitants of States, it means those who are members of the political community.

The civil law determined the condition of the son by that of the father. A man whose father was not a citizen was allowed to be a perpetual inhabitant, but not a citizen, unless citizenship was conferred on him. I consider him as a citizen of the United States, who is entitled to every personal right of a civil and political nature common to the great body of the political community. The distinguishing characteristic of a citizen of the United States is the possession of those capacities which a foreigner obtains by naturalization. Those are: 1st, a capacity to take a freehold; 2d, to vote at elections; 3d, to be elected, having the requisite qualifications of age, residence, and property. He who possesses these capacities is a citizen of the United States, within the meaning of the clause of the constitution under consideration; and he who does not possess these capacities is not. The free negro is not entitled to those civil and political rights in the United States, or in any State that adopted the constitution. Let the State constitution be shown, which declares the free negro to be entitled to all the rights of citizenship, or the code of State laws that places him on an equality in all respects as to privileges with the white citizen.

The Revolution found the negro in America a slave. Where are the acts or constitutions which have declared him a citizen, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States? They have no existence. He is everywhere inferior to the white man, as well by the laws of the States as of the United States. In the State of Massachusetts, always foremost in the work of liberty, the free negro is under considerable disabilities—one of which is, that he is not enrolled in the militia. If he comes into that State from another, he must show a certificate from the Secretary of State of his freedom, or he will be seized and deported. In Delaware free negroes convicted of larceny may be sold. If one of them comes into that State from another, he forfeits ten dollars per week for the time of his stay, and if he does not pay the penalty he is sold. In Virginia the free negro has no political, and very few civil rights. He is forbidden to come into that State; and if he does come, he is seized and removed. In Ohio he is not permitted to vote, and in North Carolina, although he is allowed the right of suffrage, yet he, and his posterity to the third generation, are refused the privilege of giving testimony in a court of justice, where a white man is a party. By the laws of the United States the negro is refused the privilege of being naturalized; and in the code adopted for the government of this District, (which is the laws of the adjacent States,) it is provided that, on the trial of a free negro for a crime a slave may be a witness; that a free negro may not marry a white woman; that it is criminal to employ him, unless he has a certificate of registry; that he may not keep or carry arms, and is punishable for lifting his hand against a white man; and by the law incorporating the City of Washington, passed by this present Congress, a colored servant is made liable to be punished by stripes for a breach of the ordinances of the city.

It is not every person who is born in a State, and born free, that becomes a member of the political community. The Indians, born in the States, continue to be aliens; and so, I contend, do the free negroes, where the laws have not otherwise provided. A savage cannot be a member of a civilized community; he is incapable of exercising political rights; and nature seems to have made the negro a perpetual alien to the white man. Slaves are aliens. Alienage was the first foundation of slavery. Citizenship belongs to the civilized freeman. It is for Congress to provide a rule of naturalization that may admit to the rights of citizenship the civilized descendants of Indians and Africans. The States have no authority to admit citizens. When Congress have refused to naturalize any free negro, can it be tolerated that the master of a negro slave should have power to make him a citizen of the United States, entitled to all the privileges of citizens in the several States?

Who, then, are citizens of the United States? I would answer, 1st, those subjects of Great Britain who, being entitled to all the rights and privileges of British subjects, became American citizens by the Revolution; 2d, those who were declared citizens, or naturalized by the States, previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; 3d, European foreigners naturalized in conformity to the law of Congress; and I would add, 4th, the children born in the country of aliens, who were of a description that might have been naturalized. Since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, no State has had a right to naturalize an alien; and, therefore, I contend that no State can make citizens of its slaves; and that, if the father is incapable of naturalization, birth will not make the son a citizen.

The mass of mankind in this country may be divided into two classes—free people and slaves; but the class of free people includes many who are not citizens. The same mass may be divided into three classes—citizens, aliens, and denizens; the latter description of persons being those who are admitted to some portion of the rights and privileges of citizens, but not to all those rights and privileges. Such of the free negroes, in our country, as are not aliens, may be denizens, but none of them, it is apprehended, are citizens within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution of the United States which is under consideration. The free negro who would claim all the privileges and immunities of a citizen in another State, must show a right to all those privileges and immunities in his own.

I shall contend, sir, that a State possesses the right of excluding from settling within its limits even the citizens of another State.

Has not every county and parish a right to exclude paupers and vagrants? May not every city and town exclude persons having infectious diseases, although they are citizens? If New York may exclude the citizens of Philadelphia when the latter city is visited with yellow fever, and if New York may do the same under the like circumstance, what gives to them this right? The right of self-preservation confers this right of exclusion. And if a town possesses this right of exclusion, founded on the right of self-preservation, does not a State possess it? May Virginia send 40,000 free negroes to settle in the State of Ohio, and has the latter State no power to exclude them? May Massachusetts or Pennsylvania send a few thousand of their citizens into Rhode Island and Delaware, there to exercise the privilege of suffrage, and thereby bring Rhode Island under the power of Massachusetts, or Delaware under the power of Pennsylvania? Some members may recollect that, not many years since, the citizens of Baltimore, of a certain political party, resolved to direct the elections of Annapolis, by hiring a number of men to go to Annapolis, there to remain six months, to qualify them to vote at elections. Might not the councils of a State be changed by the like means, if the State has no power to exclude intruders? Sir, every State has the right of self-preservation. If it is proved that a State has the right to exclude the leper from coming and settling therein, the construction contended for on the other side, that a State can exclude no citizen of another State, is overthrown. The health laws of every city and State refute the argument.

Usage expounds the law. The States possess the right of exclusion; for they have exercised it, and Congress has sanctioned the right. In the act of the last session for incorporating the City of Washington, power is granted to the corporation "to enforce the departure of such vagrants and paupers as may come into the city to reside, unless they give ample security, and to prescribe the terms on which free negroes and mulattoes may reside in the city." All powers not granted to the General Government are retained by the States. Have the States granted to Congress their power to exclude dangerous persons from settling within their limits? I do not find that they have granted this power to Congress.

I shall contend that whatever be the just interpretation of the clause of the Constitution of the United States under consideration, it ought to be submitted for investigation and determination to the Judiciary. There are many parts of the constitution which are addressed particularly to Congress; such are all those giving power to Congress, or to the Government of the United States, or to any department or officer thereof. There are other parts of the constitution which are laws formed by the people, and addressed directly to the Judiciary. Those parts require no legislation by Congress; the constitution being the supreme law. The clause under consideration is one of them; it vests no power in Congress; it calls for no legislation; it confers privileges and immunities on individuals; Congress cannot diminish or increase them; what are they the Judiciary should decide.

The clause in the constitution of Missouri is not a law in itself, as is the clause of the Constitution of the United States to which it is said to stand opposed. It directs that a law shall be passed. I venture to predict, with confidence, that no law will be passed in pursuance of this direction, by the Legislature of Missouri, that will contravene the Constitution of the United States. The members of the Legislature of Missouri will be sworn to support the Constitution of the United States; they will not be sworn to support the constitution of Missouri, and they will know that their acts contrary to the Constitution of the United States, will be void. They will, therefore, give to the constitution of their State, a construction consistent with the Constitution of the United States.

When Mr. S. had concluded—

Mr. Strong, of New York, said, the magnitude and importance of the subject under consideration must be his apology for claiming a small share of the attention and patience of honorable members, while he submitted the reasons for the vote he was about to give. I shall endeavor, said he, to be brief and plain in what I have to say.

The people of the Territory of Missouri were, by a law of Congress, authorized to form "a constitution and State government, provided that the same, whenever formed, should be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States." They have formed a constitution, presented it for the approbation of Congress, and asked admission into the Union. If it violates the plain provisions of the Federal Constitution, ought it not to be disapproved, and the resolution under consideration be rejected? The constitution of Missouri contains, among other things, this remarkable clause—"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, the State, under any pretext whatsoever." Here permit me to remark that the authority is express and positive, and is in restraint of personal liberty, and of the means of contesting personal rights. But are the persons here described citizens of the United States, or of a State, or of both, or of neither?

If citizens, then the repugnancy is plain and palpable. But the honorable member (Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia) on my right, who has just resumed his seat, has attempted, ingeniously, to prove, that free negroes and mulattoes are either aliens, or denizens, and consequently not citizens.

The honorable gentleman will pardon me for differing from him. I cannot assent to the proposition that this description of persons are aliens. An alien is one who owes allegiance to some Government other than that under which he lives. Allegiance to a foreign power enters into the very essence of the term alien. To what foreign power, or to what Government, other than that of the United States, do these persons owe allegiance? If to none, then what are they, if not citizens? But if they are not aliens, it is insisted they are denizens. Is it so? No one can be a denizen who has not been an alien. Denization is the modification of alienage. But Congress can pass laws of naturalization only, and not of denization. It would seem to follow, therefore, that these persons cannot be denizens.

He has argued, too, at some length, to prove that a State possesses the right, not only of banishing her citizens, but excluding from her limits paupers, lepers, and persons infected with pestilential diseases; and hence inferred that each State might exclude all the citizens of the other States; and, consequently, that Missouri had a right to prohibit free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, Missouri.

I have never understood that a State, town, or city, could prevent the admission of a pauper as such. In many of the States, and I do not know but in all of them, a pauper may be removed if likely to become a public charge; and every person, whether pauper or prince, may be prevented from gaining what the lawyers call a legal settlement.

That a State may banish for crime, and guard herself against pestilence, need not be denied. The rights and privileges of peaceable, unoffending citizens, for whom we are expounding the law, do not depend upon the principles which determine the disabilities and punishment of criminals. Because a State can banish a traitor, does it follow that she can deport every or any harmless, unsuspected citizen? Because Pennsylvania may exclude from the city of Philadelphia persons infected with the leprosy or the plague, can she, therefore, exclude all the officers and troops of the Federal Government?—or any uninfected, peaceable citizen of any State or place? If not, Missouri remains undefended. She must seek some other mode of justifying the exceptionable provisions of her constitution.

The general proposition has been urged by the honorable member, (Mr. SMYTH,) that, if any clause in the constitution of Missouri be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land, such clause is utterly null and void. This is true in law, not in fact. But, shall we sanction a wrong, which, until remedied, we know will produce injustice and evil? This constitution is submitted to us. For what purpose, unless it be for our approbation? If this submission and approbation are necessary, can it acquire the force and effect of a law, until Congress has approved it? But if approved and put into operation, when, by whom, and how are its repugnant provisions to be adjudged null and void? I think one must have some skill in the cultivation of chances to determine. This proposition proves too much. It proves that every law or other matter, which requires the revision and sanction of Congress to give it validity, may be passed with impunity, our oaths to the contrary notwithstanding, however flagrantly it may impugn the Constitution of the United States.

I am entirely opposed, sir, to remitting this matter to the Judiciary. Why send it to the Judiciary for adjudication? It may be years or ages before it reaches that tribunal. In the mean time, hundreds of American citizens may be deprived of their rights, oppressed, and persecuted. Who is to take their part? It requires money and friends to regain lost rights. Many sound objections have been urged by those who have preceded me against this inference. I shall content myself with stating one further objection. It is this: A free negro or mulatto of the District of Columbia may take and hold real estate in Missouri. This, I think, will not be denied; and, to make the case the stronger, suppose he derives the title to his land directly from the United States. Now, by the constitution of Missouri, he is not only excluded from the possession of his land, but is prevented from coming into the State and contesting his claims in the courts there, and the doors of the Federal courts are barred against him. They cannot entertain his claim and afford him relief, because he is not a citizen of a State. How is this to be answered? Or is the sufferer to be turned off remediless? And will you thus permit individual wrong to accumulate? Or will you rather prevent it, by staying the operation of the only cause which can produce it?

Are our free negroes and mulattoes citizens? This is a deeply interesting question, both as it respects them and the nation. The report of the committee seems to admit that some of them are citizens, because it says that a large class of them "cannot be considered as citizens of any State." The honorable members (Messrs. BARBOUR and SMYTH) from Virginia deny that they are citizens. But the gentleman (Mr. BARBOUR) from Virginia, who first spoke, will permit me to say, that I think his definition of a citizen proves too much; for it proves that the Jews of Maryland are not citizens of Maryland, although their fathers and their ancestors have resided there since the days of Lord Baltimore. A definition may destroy a right, but never can create a right. Facts, and experience in politics and morals, are better than definitions. What, therefore, are some of the peculiar and distinctive characteristics of a citizen of a State? They are, the right of passing, freely and unmolested, from town to town, and place to place, within the State, and the right of residing, at pleasure, in any part of the same. That these rights belong to every one entitled to the high privilege of a citizen, I think will not be denied.

But these rights are also common to all free persons, of every age and sex, within the State, except aliens, lunatics, vagabonds, and criminals; because their possession and exercise are indispensably necessary to the social relations of life, and to the preservation of the State. Indeed, vastly the greatest proportion of the citizens of a State have no other external mark of their citizenship. Females and minors cannot be elected to office, or vote, or sit on juries, or be subjected to taxes, as a general rule. These persons enjoy the privilege of citizenship, and the immunity of the laws of the State, to which they must demean themselves, as completely as the man who has, in addition, the qualification of a voter, or a jurymen. What, then, is the meaning of that great clause in the Federal Constitution, which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?" This has been called the basis of the Union. As I understand this clause, it does away the disability of alienism. Without it, the citizens of each State would be aliens to every other State, and could not, of right, enter another State without a passport. It confers the same common privileges and immunities upon the citizens of Maryland, for instance, in reference to the United States, as the citizens of Maryland possess in reference to that State. Hence, a citizen of Maryland may pass into and about the State of Virginia, and reside there, subjecting himself to the laws of Virginia, as he was bound to do to the laws of Maryland; because in Maryland he possessed these rights, and owed this obedience. But it does not follow, nor is it at all necessary, that because he was a voter or a jurymen in Maryland, he must be either the one or the other in Virginia. If this reasoning be correct, then these essential rights of citizenship are secured, and each State left in full possession of its obligation and powers to protect its peaceable citizens and defend itself against violence and crime.

When Mr. Stronge had concluded—

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, moved that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 73, nays 90.

The question was then stated, shall the resolution be engrossed, and read a third time? And debate arising thereon, the House adjourned.

Maine, late a part of the State of Massachusetts, JOSEPH DANE, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John Holmes, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

JOHN A. CUTHBERT, from the State of Georgia, also appeared, and took his seat.

Missouri.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. AROHER, of Virginia, said, that, having had some share in protracting the trial, to which the patience of the House was to be subjected, in the debate, he owed it the atonement of making his trespass as brief as possible. His inducement to trouble the House at all, grew entirely out of the circumstances of views having been stated in support of the resolution, in which he could not concur, and to which he should be considered as assenting if the grounds of his vote were not explained. The delicate relation of the question, however, to the slaveholding States, would furnish sufficient excuse to any member coming from that quarter of the Union, for wishing to bestow on it the fullest examination.

Mr. A. proceeded to remark that, whilst he utterly disclaimed the consequences which had been inferred from it, he was by no means prepared to contest the right of the States to admit the colored person, born within their respective limits, to the privileges of citizenship. The States had delegated, in relation to this subject, only the power of naturalization, the operation of which was known to extend only to persons born beyond the limits of the community, by whose authority it was exerted. The collateral connected power of determining the right and condition of admission to the privileges of citizenship, as respected persons born within their respective limits, could not, then, be denied to the States or abridged in its exercise, without a construction which might equally be employed to divest every other reserved right, and to dismantle every safeguard to be found in the constitution. We had been told, indeed, that the exercise of this right in relation to colored persons, could not be considered as contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. Supposing it were not, the rights of the States did not depend, for their validity or exercise, on the recognition of the Federal Constitution, which, in its true character, was no more than the source of the limitations on them; nor had the advance of encroachment yet reached a construction, by which the security of these rights would not simply be impaired, but their independent existence absolutely subverted. The mode, too, of the derivation of the inference which excluded the exercise of the right in question, was as little warranted as the source of its derivation. It was derived, not from any thing in the language of the constitution, but from the peculiarity of the circumstances of some of the parties to it,

A new member, to wit, from the State of which were supposed to preclude the intention to allow such an exercise of right. This was not a case, however, in which a resort of this kind was admissible, for the ascertainment of intention. Where language was of doubtful import, this resort might be admitted with little danger, because there was a limit to the possible variety of interpretation of which language was susceptible. But where there was no doubt arising in the interpretation of language, nor any language on the subject of doubt to be interpreted, the allowance of a resort to the circumstances of parties, to an instrument for the ascertainment of its purport, would be admitting the supply, and not the explanation of an intention. To such a principle of substitution and enlargement of the operation of instruments, there was evidently no limit short of the exhaustion of ingenuity. It was better to admit any defect whatever, in the constitution, than a liability so indefinite, to accretion and metamorphosis.

The objection to the recognition of the right in question was founded in an entire misapprehension of the consequences of its exercise. It had been supposed that if the right were admitted, it would follow that colored persons, emigrating from a State in which they were allowed the privileges of citizenship, to another in which they were excluded from these privileges, would become entitled to all privileges of this character in the State to which they removed, notwithstanding the exclusion. Such an inference was founded on a view which was altogether erroneous of the operation of the first clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, assuring a reciprocity of privileges to the citizens of the several States, respectively. That clause, like every other, in that or any other instrument, must receive a construction which would not violate reason; which would not carry the operation of the clause beyond the intention which dictated it, and which would render its operation consistent, if possible, with the established rights of other parties. All these incontrovertible principles of interpretation would be violated by the construction which had been supposed. If persons removing from one State to another were to be considered as becoming entitled, under the operation of this clause of the constitution, to all the privileges of citizens of the State to which they removed, and were not restricted to the privileges accorded to persons of the same class and description with themselves, then the anomaly would be presented of a foreign co-ordinate legislation, exerting a more efficient operation in the States than their interior legislation, and of their legislation exerting in relation to the same subject, a more efficient operation abroad than it could at home. A construction involving such consequences was absurd. Clauses were to be construed in consistency with their intention. What was the intention of this clause? The States, by the adoption of the Federal Constitution, became, to a certain extent, members of one community. It was an incident essential to the secure enjoyment of the advantages of this community, that they should be restrained from any power of inimical regulation as respected the right of removal from one State and settlement in another. This was the design of the clause in question; not to inhibit to the States nor to restrain the power of regulation, as respected the conditions of the enjoyment and exercise of the privileges of citizenship, an essential, indefeasible portion of self-government; but to inhibit any power of regulation on this subject, to be directed exclusively against citizens removing from other States, any exercise of inimical discriminative regulation. The discretion was left unimpaired to adopt regulations affecting either the indigenous inhabitants or those removing from other States, provided these regulations were not rendered restrictive and peculiar in relation to this last description of inhabitants. Under this limitation the reserved power of the States was unsusceptible of employment to any serious or injurious counteraction of the social design of the Federal Incorporation. This construction had the advantage of reconciling the rights of the States with the clause of the constitution in question, affording to each ample and uninterfering scope for operation. Any opposite construction led to the wildest and most unredeemed absurdities. No one could conceive it to be the design of the constitution to communicate to persons removing from one State to another, privileges larger in number or value than they had previously enjoyed; yet, under the construction which was combated, such persons might not only acquire an increase of privileges, the privilege of suffrage for example, but blacks from abroad might acquire privileges to which indigenous whites were not entitled. Women, in one of the States, (Jersey,) were, or had formerly been, admitted to all the privileges of citizenship, that of suffrage inclusive. Under this construction, women, in States where there was a qualification on suffrage, as in Virginia, might become entitled, by migration, to privileges from which a large proportion of the indigenous white males were excluded. Constructions of this kind were no subjects for discussion. Persons, by removing from one State to another, did not, therefore, acquire any further or greater privileges than were the allotment of the indigenous inhabitants of the same class and description.

Another consequence which had been imputed to the clause of the constitution under review, fell with that which had been examined. It had been imagined that, under the operation of this clause, colored persons, emancipated on a condition of removal from one State in which they receive their emancipation, might be returned upon the emancipating State in the character of citizens. The validity of this interference was excluded by the remarks which had been stated. It was equally excluded by other and independent considerations. The condition of emancipation alluded to, would labor, at the time of its adoption, under no defect of validity, as presenting no conflict with any provision of the Federal Constitution.

It could not, then, be brought into conflict, and rendered invalid at any posterior time, or by any act of an authority not superior to that of the party imposing it, and which was no party to the compact in which this condition was comprehended. Yet, if the inference above referred to were just, this condition, the creation of a competent authority, and the consideration of a benefit to the party accepting it, would be liable to invalidation by the posterior intervention, not of a superior, but an extraneous and merely co-ordinate authority; and be liable not simply to invalidation, but to be converted to an instrument of injury and abuse to the party who had made it the subject of stipulation. An inference of this kind had only to be represented in its true character to be disclaimed.

The endeavor had been made to show that there was nothing in the clause of the Constitution of the United States, which had been quoted, which could be construed as prohibiting the State governments from subjecting persons removing from other States to any restrictions as respected the privileges of citizenship which it was thought proper to extend to indigenous inhabitants of the same class and description. The power of the States would be found, upon further inquiry, to extend to a point beyond this—to the capacity of prohibiting the ingress of citizens of other States, provided the exclusion were for causes affecting the individual merely, and not the class: that is to say, provided the exclusion operated by what, in the technical language of the law, would be denominated descriptiorem persona, or for causes accidental in their access, and liable to removal. Thus, it would not be denied that a State might exclude citizens of other States, for contagious disease, by quarantine regulations; that it had competency to exclude for crimes, or to exclude paupers liable to become burdensome by regulation of police. What was the reason of the competency of exclusion in these cases? The reason had already been stated, the necessity of giving to the clause of the Federal Constitution communicating the privileges of citizenship, a construction which would reconcile its operations with the reserved essential rights of the States. There could be no danger of abuse from this construction, as long as its principle was not transcended, which required that the exclusion should be for cause affecting the individual, and not the class. Mr. A. went on to say, that perhaps a just application of the principle of exclusion, which had been now stated, might be considered as authorizing the slaveholding States to prohibit the entry and settlement among them of colored persons from other States, inasmuch as it was known that the peculiar circumstances of their population tended to communicate to the admission of persons of this description a character of mischievousness worse than that which would attach to the admission of pauperism, and as bad as that which would attach to the admission of criminals and disease. Mr. A. said that he did not mean, however, to push the argument to this extent. It was not necessary to his purpose to do so. Perhaps it would not be fair, as the exclusion might be said, in these circumstances, to be denounced for a cause not personal, that is to say, accidental to the excluded object; or which, indeed, was not to be considered as residing so much in the excluded object, as in a peculiar condition of the community from which the object was proposed to be excluded. All that it was now designed to show was, that, notwithstanding the sweeping operation which had been attributed to the clause of the Federal Constitution, which had been adduced in the debate, the exercise, under certain circumstances, of a power of exclusion by the State governments, as respected the citizens of other States, was in perfect consistency with that operation.

If it was the wish of any of the States to have colored citizens, Mr. A. said that he felt neither wish nor authority to derogate from their right to do so. The proposition he denied was, that such citizens could be imposed on other States, who had no participation in the wish. In the lapse of time it was possible that the period might arrive, when, from the excessive multiplication of the mixed race, some of the slaveholding States might conceive themselves required, by considerations of policy, to admit this description of persons to a qualified or absolute enjoyment of the privileges of citizenship. Without pretending to express any opinion that such a period would arrive, Mr. A. could not, in the event of its occurrence, consider the competency of the State to exercise the power as a subject of question. The demarcation of color, importing a discrimination not simply of complexion, but blood, was too indefinite to be admitted as a limitation on State right. In all the slaveholding States, in a certain stage of intermixture, the legal distinction ceased. If the State right were confined in the mode supposed, there was no competency to assign the limit of this distinction.

He was not unaware, Mr. A. said, that the language he had been holding, of guarded respect for State rights, had been for some time going out of fashion. It was but too obvious to remark, that the essential defences of the States were rapidly giving way before the steady and powerful current of Federal authority. This circumstance only rendered more imperative, however, the duty of using every endeavor to sustain even the feeblest of these defences. The scope of public duty under a free constitution was peculiar. Its first object was the support of the constitution. How was this to be effected? Not by carrying one principle victorious over every other, but by sustaining the balance between the various and conflicting principles which made up the composition of a free constitution. And how was this secondary incidental object to be effected? By enlisting on the side of the principle which, in the progress of the conflict, had been found to decline and become the weakest. It was upon a consideration of this sort, that Mr. A. thought the maintenance of the rights of the States, even in matters which bore the appearance of being immaterial and indifferent, ought to form a primary object of solicitude and effort.

The purpose of the remarks which had been submitted, was to show what Mr. A. conceived to be the just construction of the very delicate clause of the constitution, assuming a reciprocity of the privileges of citizenship to the citizens of the several States, which had been so much referred to in the discussion. It had been seen that the recognition of the right of the States to admit colored persons to the privileges of citizenship, involved none of the abusive consequences which had been ascribed to it. The inquiry material to the present controversy next arose, whether any of the States had ever exercised the right; whether there were citizens of this description to be found in any of the States? Mr. A. thought that, upon due inquiry, it would be found there was no one of the States in which this class of persons could be fairly considered as assignable to the rank of citizens. He did not found this conclusion on any definition which had been, or, as far as appeared to him could be, given of the constituents or criteria of citizenship. He admitted that any definition which could be assumed upon this subject, must be regarded as gratuitous, and could, therefore, serve as the foundation of no conclusion. He admitted that there was no definition which would apply, under every circumstance. He thought that the only description which could be adopted, must be analogous to the definition which civilians gave of municipal law—"the rule which each State had prescribed to itself." But although there was no affirmative definition of citizenship which could be regarded as of invariable application, there was negative test which appeared to Mr. A. to be conclusive. Citizens might be admitted in various degrees to the exercise of political rights. They might even be admitted in various degrees to the enjoyment of civil rights. But those could not be considered as belonging to the rank of citizens, who, not by the mere operation of usage, but the positive enactments of law, were everywhere excluded from an equality with even the lowest rank of citizens, as respected the ordinary and most essential relations of domestic and social life. But this was the fact in relation to colored persons, as Mr. A. believed, in every State in the Union, without exception. Colored persons, as has been stated by his colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR,) were in no part of the Union permitted, by law, to contract with white persons that engagement, the liberty to contract which was the inseparable incident and criterion of a condition of social equality. He alluded to the engagement of marriage. How could persons be said to belong to the same class who were everywhere prohibited by law from the contraction of any relation of intimacy, and from association, on the basis of social equality? It was from the influence of this consideration, and not from any concurrence in various other views which had been stated, that Mr. A. derived his conclusion that colored persons could, in no part of the Union, be assigned to the rank of citizens.

But, suppose that these persons could be assigned to this rank in some of the States of the Union. Admit that there were citizens of this description. Ought the clause of the constitution of Missouri, to which objection had been taken, to be considered as operating upon such of these persons as were citizens? Mr. A. conceived that it ought not, upon the established maxim of interpretation, which had been stated by his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEDE,) that where instruments presented the appearance of conflict, a construction was, if possible, to be adopted, which would reconcile their operation. If there were colored persons who belonged to the class of citizens, there was, notoriously, a much larger class who did not belong to this description, on whom the clause in question might be considered as operating without the involvement of any breach of the Federal Constitution. There was a distinct peculiar reason for the adoption of this construction. The term "free negroes and mulattoes," on which the doubt in the present case arose, had acquired in the South and West an import perfectly precise, and as it might be said technical, denoting a class who were invariably excluded from the privileges of citizenship. To restrict these words in the clause of the Missouri constitution to this sense, was doing no more than was required by another established rule of the construction, confirming the words to their ordinary and received signification. There was neither force nor liability to abuse in this interpretation, because the import of the language was not enlarged so as to be made to embrace something which it did not properly comprehend, but was restricted. It was another established rule that in cases of doubt, the most mitigated construction was to be adopted. "In obscuris quod minimum est querimur." But, in the present case, it also happened that the most mitigated was, at the same time, the usual and most received signification of the words to be construed. All that was asked, was, that the language should not be distorted from its customary and appropriate import, and a description applicable to, and designed for an inferior class of persons, be stretched to comprehend a higher class, in contravention of one of the most familiar maxims, that "minor non continet major." Cases analogous to the present might be easily stated from the constitution. Mr. A. instanced the case of imports which the State were forbidden to lay unless with the consent of Congress, or for a special purpose. If Massachusetts, who was now engaged in the formation of a new constitution, were to insert a provision granting a power to her Legislature to lay imposts, would any court or reasonable man refuse to this clause a construction restricted by the competency of the State, and consistent with the prohibition of the Federal Constitution?

One word as to the consequences of the proceedings which might now be adopted. One gentleman had said, that no consequences of unpleasant character could be anticipated; and another, that the consequences, whatever they might be, were not to be taken into consideration. Both gentlemen were mistaken. Whatever might be the real views which would dictate the rejection of the resolution under discussion, this rejection, in the present state of the public mind, would be liable to be ascribed to the policy of re-attempting the imposition of the slavery restriction of last year. In the best event, then, the wound inflicted on the harmony of the country would be incurable. But, if the policy imputed was really to be acted on, every man must perceive that the Union was gone. Gentlemen might conceive that they were sowing the seeds of sectional influence and importance, but they would, in fact, be sowing a crop like the dragon's teeth, which would spring up in civil discord, and armed men, destined to perish in unnatural warfare, by a mutual destruction. It had been remarked the last year, that a gulf, similar to that which we read of in the early history of Rome, had been opened among us by the discussions on this subject. There was one circumstance, however, of favorable distinction. The chasm which was said to have occurred in Rome was only to be closed by the sacrifice of her most precious possession. But the chasm which had occurred in our harmony, required to heal it, only the most worthless of all sacrifices, that of our passions, or of what, in their application to human affairs, were the next most pestilent things to vile passions—our abstract and speculative notions. In what he had been saying, Mr. ARCHER disclaimed any intention of employing the language of menace, which would be suitable neither to his character, nor to that of the place in which he stood. His purpose was to express his sincere views of the possible consequences of the measures which Congress might adopt in relation to this important subject. The train had already been prepared by antecedent events and discussions. It now only required to be fired to produce effects which it would be equally impossible to avoid lamenting, or to repair. Mr. A. would add only a single remark. It was that, in the event of the real occurrence of the effects to which he had been alluding, their authors would stand chargeable with the greatest crime which had ever been committed against the interests of human nature, inasmuch as they would have led to the destruction of the most persuasive model of free institutions, and the overthrow of the most imposing promise of splendid destinies, which the world, in any age of it, had ever seen.

When Mr. ARCHER had concluded—

Mr. HILL, of Massachusetts, moved an amendment, qualifying the assent of the admission of the new State into the Union by an exception of a particular clause of the constitution. This motion, however, was withdrawn by Mr. HILL for the present, on the representation of Mr. LOWNDES, that it would embarrass the main debate, by bringing on an incidental one, and would deprive him of the opportunity of replying to some objections he had not anticipated, and to others arising from a misapprehension or evasion of his first arguments in support of the resolution.

Mr. BALDWIN then moved to strike out the preamble to the resolve.

Mr. LOWNDES assigned briefly the reasons why, on more mature reflection, he should assent to this course, though he had at first preferred the other.

The question being taken on striking out the preamble, was decided in the affirmative—87 to 65.

Mr. HEMPHILL observed that the subject before the House, in its various relations, had occupied so much of the time of Congress, that it was becoming in him to make an apology for rising, and to promise, at the least, to be as brief as possible. He said he would make no exordium, but engage at once on the merits of the question.

The constitution of Missouri, as transmitted to Congress, enjoins, in the most positive manner, and makes it the unqualified duty of the Legislature to pass, as soon as may be, such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, the State, under any pretext whatsoever. If these free colored people are embraced in the second section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States, it is most clear and manifest that the constitution of Missouri is a direct infringement of the Constitution of the United States, and repugnant to it.

The section in the Constitution of the United States to which I have alluded, declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. The main question, according to my conception of it, involves but this single inquiry—Are free negroes and mulattoes, or any of them, citizens of the United States? The report of the honorable committee, as I thought, admitted the fact of citizenship; and this circumstance led me from making any examination on that point, until the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) yesterday assumed the broad ground of denying the rights of citizenship to any free black or mulatto man. He has endeavored to give us a definition of a citizen of this country; and although

I acknowledge that the gentleman's reflections on the subject were ingenious, I cannot give my assent to their accuracy. He supposes that a citizen means a person who is entitled to all the civil rights of others in like circumstances, unless deprived of some of them for personal reasons. He then proceeded to show that discriminations existed, in a variety of instances, and in different States, between the white and black people; but this definition cannot be a good one, unless he is capable of proving that, among citizens, a majority have no right to make any such discriminations. What is there to control the will of the majority, when it does not come in collision with any higher power?

Discriminations are familiar to us, in the several States, both as to political and civil rights; but it never was believed that they effected a total extinguishment of citizenship. Some citizens are entitled to vote, and others are not. Some are exempted from serving in the militia, or on juries, for various reasons; and this throws an unequal burden on the rest of the community. Paupers are not allowed even to choose the place of their residence. In some cases, whole professions are distinguished from others; as, for instance, when ministers of the gospel are made ineligible to office. Provisions of this character are contained in several of the State constitutions; I will, however, only read a clause or two on this subject, from the constitution of Tennessee:

"1. Whereas ministers of the gospel are, by their profession, dedicated to God and the care of souls, and ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their functions, therefore, no minister of the gospel, or priest, of any denomination whatever, shall be eligible to a seat in either House of the Legislature.

"2. No person who denies the being of a God, or a future state of rewards and punishments, shall hold any office in the civil department of this State."

The latter description of persons are citizens, although their infidelity afflicts them with a much deeper misfortune than to be distinguished from the white people, merely by the circumstance of color. Females are also citizens, but they by no means fall within the given definition, particularly in the sense in which it is intended to operate on political rights.

The gentleman has put many cases in illustration of his definition. It is unnecessary to refer to each case—I will select two only, on which I am desirous of making a few observations.

The first is on an argument deduced from a law in the State of Massachusetts which, in the opinion of the gentleman, seemed to be entitled to peculiar force, as being the offspring of a State so celebrated in espousing the cause of this race of people. It is a law by which marriages are forbidden between the white and the black people; but if this circumstance proves any thing, it proves too much, because it equally abridges the rights of both, and the argument destroys itself; for if, on that account, a black person is not a citizen, how can the white person be a citizen? And besides, it will be found, by an inspection of the law, that the penalties or fines are imposed only on the white people.

The other case stated is, that the black people are exempt from serving in the militia. But I do not consider this as a deprivation of a right: it is a privilege, and is so esteemed, when the indulgence is granted to persons advanced in age. The colored people might be compelled to form in companies by themselves, so as not to be the associates of the white soldiers, as was the case in the Revolutionary war. I have taken this brief notice of the definition, by endeavoring to show its inaccuracy when applied to the complex system of our Federal Government.

We shall arrive with more safety at the knowledge whether any free black people are citizens or not, by considering their acknowledged situation in a general point of view. And, at this stage of my remarks, I beg the House to recollect that, previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, each State had the unquestionable right of saying who should compose its own citizens; and if, at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, free negroes and mulattoes were citizens of any one State in the Union, the Federal Constitution gave to such citizens all the privileges and immunities of the citizens in the several States.

I have examined the constitutions of the several States, and there are but seven or eight that, in terms, exclude the colored people from voting. In these constitutions the right of suffrage is confined to white persons; but this affords a very forcible argument that it was the opinion of the members of their convention, that black people should have been included under the general term of citizens.

In the Kentucky constitution, the understanding of the convention appears plain. The words are, "Every free male citizen, (negroes, mulattoes, and Indians, excepted.)"

Under the old constitution, in Maryland, this description of people voted; but the general terms were changed, by the present constitution of that State, to every free white male citizen.

In North Carolina, I understand that they still vote at elections. In Pennsylvania, there have been instances of their voting, but they are seldom. In several of the New England States they exercise this right, and did so in choosing the delegates who formed the Federal Constitution. In Massachusetts, and in the State of New York in particular, they enjoy the acknowledged and uninterrupted right of suffrage; and the constitutions of these States are both antecedent to the Constitution of the United States. The question might be very safely rested on the correctness of the opinions entertained in these two respectable States on the subject. The situation of the black people in these States was known anterior to the Revolution, and at the time of the acknowledgment of our independence; they were of course the best capable of judging, and were the only persons who had the right to judge whether these free people were embraced in the general terms of their constitutions.

When our different constitutions were formed, this class of people lived among us, not in the character of foreigners; they were connected with no other nation—this was their native country, and as dear to them as to us. Thousands of them were free born, and they composed a part of the people in the several States. They were identified with the nation, and its wealth consisted, in part, of their labor. They had fought for their country, and were righteously included in the principles of the Declaration of Independence. This was their condition when the Constitution of the United States was framed, and that high instrument does not cast the least shade of doubt upon any of their rights or privileges; but, on the contrary, I may challenge gentlemen to examine it, with all the ability they are capable of, and see if it contains a single expression that deprives them of any privileges that is bestowed on others.

They have a right to pursue their own happiness, in as high a degree as any other class of people. Their situation is similar to others, in relation to the acquirement of property, and the various pursuits of industry. They are entitled to the same rights of religion and protection, and are subjected to the same punishments. They are enumerated in the census. They can be taxed, and made liable to militia duty; they are denied none of the privileges contained in the bill of rights; and, although many of these advantages are allowed to a stranger, during his temporary residence, yet in no one instance is a free native black man treated as a foreigner.

When they enjoy all these rights, civil and religious, equally with the white people; and when they all flow from the same constitutions and laws, without any especial designation or reference to them, I have a curiosity to learn upon what principle any right can be singled out, as one of which they are to be deprived.

I appeal to the public transactions in this country, to the different constitutions, and to the laws, for the correctness of this position; that, whenever exceptions are intended to be made in regard to this class of people, that it requires express provisions for the purpose. It is said that they are not witnesses in some States; but it requires a particular law to render them incompetent to give testimony.

As citizenship has not been defined in any of the conventions, or by any of the wise assemblages of men in this country, it would be rash in me to attempt to give any thing like a confident definition; but, if being a native, and free born, and of parents belonging to no other nation or tribe, does not constitute a citizen in this country, I am at a loss to know in what manner citizenship is acquired by birth. This would be broader than necessary for the present occasion, as it would exclude the children of manumitted slaves. In England, from whence we adopt many of our customs, the sons of aliens are deemed natives; though the case is said to be different in many other countries.

When a foreigner is naturalized, he is only put in the place of a native freeman. This is the general idea of naturalization.

The word citizen, in its original sense, I believe, only meant a free person of a city; it had no application here until after our independence; and then it had to be accommodated to the customary and peculiar character of our complex system. In our political acceptance of the word, it differs in theory and origin from allegiance; that was a feudal connection, acknowledging the distinction of superior and inferior; it was a species of slavish tenure. But citizenship is rather in the nature of a compact, expressly or tacitly made; it is a political tie, and the mutual obligations are contribution and protection.

If our free black population should be impressed in a foreign port, how could we redress the wrong if we have no political connection with them, if they do not belong to our political family? Previous to the Revolution they were British subjects, and they were dissolved from any further connection with that nation at the same time with the white people; and it would be exceedingly strange, if, from that moment, they ceased to be connected with any political society. Cases are familiar where they assume not only the appearance, but the reality of citizenship. If they should engage in commerce, none of the regulations, as to foreigners, would be applicable to them. Can there exist any doubt as to their capacity of sustaining actions in the Federal courts in the character of citizens? But all our researches on this subject aim principally at one object; it is to ascertain what was the opinion of the patriots of this country, at an early day, respecting this question. This is a fountain, when reached, that cannot deceive us; and, in looking into the ancient records of this Government, we find that this very question attracted attention, and received a solemn decision. The fourth article of the Confederation reads as follows: "The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in the Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States—paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted—shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." This language includes every free inhabitant, whether black or white, and clothes him with all the privileges of a citizen; and that this was the actual intention appears from the minutes taken when the Confederation was agreed to, (first volume of the laws of the United States, page 26.) When the fourth article was under consideration, the delegates from South Carolina being called, moved the following amendments in behalf of their State: 1. In article fourth, between the words free inhabitants, insert white —passed in the negative, ayes, 2, noes 8, and one State divided. It was then moved, after the words "the several States" to insert, "according to the law of such States respectively," for the government of their own free white inhabitants, passed in the negative—ayes 2, noes 8, and one State divided—and in the Journals of Congress, in 1788, we are furnished with the opinion of Congress, on this subject, in terms equally clear and explicit, when it was resolved, with the exception of two States, one of which was divided, that all charges "of war and all the expenses that have been or shall be incurred for the common defence and general welfare, &c., shall be defrayed out of the common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the whole number of white and other free citizens and inhabitants of every age, sex, and condition," &c.

Here it is acknowledged expressly that there were other free citizens besides white citizens. If this will not convince gentlemen that free negroes and mulattoes were, from early times, considered as citizens, and composed a part of the people who chose the delegates to frame the Federal Constitution, it will be in vain for me to urge the matter any further.

I will add a few remarks on the subject of manumitted slaves. Among the Romans, as it appears from Cooper's Justinian, there were three grades; the first class of their freemen were entitled to the privileges of Roman citizens; the other two classes were only allowed the enjoyment of inferior rights. What would be the condition of a manumitted slave, in this country, where the equal rights of man are more highly appreciated than in any other nation, I will not undertake to say.

In England, also, alight circumstances were caught at to effect the enfranchisement of persons held in villanage—such as the master bringing an action against his villain, which was construed to be the putting of him on an equal footing with himself. The idea that a free colored man, if a citizen, would be eligible to any office, however elevated, seems irreconcilable to the impressions of some gentlemen. But it will be recollected that this is an event that has never occurred in States where they are acknowledged to be citizens. The manners and practical distinctions in private life, which are observed between the white and the black people, will form a barrier, in this respect, as insurmountable as if ingrafted in the constitution itself; and no danger need be feared that there will be any other commixture of community than we see at present. There are thousands of white people who have no better chance of being placed in office. I would not wish to see a practice prevail of putting them in situations that would create any disagreeable or unpleasant sensations; but this is no reason why they should not be allowed the practical enjoyment of such rights of citizenship as our customs and habits may approve of as suitable to their condition.

It is, however, wholly unnecessary, on this occasion, to trouble ourselves in drawing nice lines of distinction as to the propriety or power of abridging the common rights in regard to this class of people; for no one can gravely accede to the proposition, that a citizen can be denied the privilege of residing on the soil of his citizenship, when he has committed no offence; that he can be held in a state of exile without being branded with any mark of disgrace.

TUESDAY, December 12.

Missouri.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution for admitting the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, addressed the House, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, in soliciting the indulgence of the House upon the present occasion, I cannot avoid expressing my sincere regret, which none can feel more deeply, that the odious Missouri question should ever have been revived. After the discussion at the last session, after the excitement it had occasioned in this House and in the nation; after the deliberate decision of the National Legislature, connected with the principle of an honorable compromise, calculated at once to allay public agitation and reconcile conflicting views, and fully and fairly executed upon one side, as far as it was practicable, it was at least to be desired that it would be the wish, as, in my humble opinion it is the duty, of every friend of his country, that this subject should have been put forever at rest; and that the people of Missouri, mingling their interests and feelings with those of the other States, should have been permitted quietly to take their station in our National Confederacy. But it seems that all these expectations are illusory, and that the ordinary course of public business is again to be interrupted by the agitation of a subject, which, I fear, cannot lead to any profitable result.

I admit, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania who spoke second in this debate, (Mr. SERGEANT,) that the subject has assumed a different, though an important form; but it still appears to me to have arisen out of the old question, and that its importance is derived much more from its effects upon the national tranquillity and the interests of our white population, than that class of persons whose rights are supposed to be affected by the Missouri constitution; who, as I believe I shall be able to show, have little interest in the matter.

I can assure the House that I feel no inclination to prolong the discussion upon so unpleasant a subject beyond that which every one must feel, to prevent any misconception of his course; and the best apology, perhaps, for engaging their attention at all, is to be found in the contrariety of views by which gentlemen who think with me have been conducted to the result. I do not advert to this circumstance with the least intention of undervaluing the arguments of those who enjoy so deservedly the respect of this House and the country; but it will always happen in the first agitation of great constitutional questions, involving the principles upon which the institutions of the Government are founded, that a variety of reasons may lead different minds to a similar conclusion; and when I feel it my duty to avow that, I do not rely upon all the grounds taken by other gentlemen who advocate this resolution, I desire to be understood as saying no more than that they have not the same weight with me that they appear to have had with others.

I entertain no doubt that Missouri is not, at present, a State of this Union; and I am equally clear, that it is both the right and duty of Congress to examine the constitution which has been submitted to us; and, if it be found repugnant to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, refuse to admit the State into the Union. No State can of right claim to be admitted a member unless her frame of government is conformable to the principles of the confederacy of which she seeks to be a part. This was the doctrine for which I contended when I had the honor to address the House at the last session, and I have seen no cause since to change my opinion. I have, therefore, examined the constitution of Missouri, and am satisfied that it is republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

It must be admitted on all hands, that the constitution of Missouri is republican. To deny it this character because it does not prohibit slavery, would be to pronounce the constitutions of all the original States in the Union, and that of the United States, anti-republican. Nor should it be forgotten, that, as it respects the slaves, in regard to whom the proceedings of the last session offered some admonition, its provisions are both liberal and humane; conferring upon this unhappy class of persons greater rights, and guarding them with better securities, than they enjoy in any State in the Union in which they exist.

The only objection which is taken to the constitution, is founded on that article which provides that "it shall be the duty of the Legislature, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever." It should here be remarked, that the Missouri Convention could derive no lesson upon this subject from the proceedings of the last session, which, professing only to close the territory against slaves, could not be construed into a design to open it for free negroes. In announcing this course, too, the convention have proposed merely to model their municipal policy after that of a majority of the old thirteen States, and of those subsequently admitted, dictated, as I believe, by no improper temper, but rather by the danger of an influx of this class of persons from the Southern part of the continent, who alone would be likely to go there. If this policy be right in the old States, it cannot be wrong in Missouri. We cannot charge Missouri with a violation of the constitution, without pronouncing the same judgment upon the original parties to the compact; and I shall not be readily persuaded of the unsoundness of a doctrine which has regulated the practice of the State and General Governments, ever since their organization; nor will I hastily pronounce the laws of half the States in the Union unconstitutional and void.

But, I proceed to consider more particularly, the character and extent of the objectionable provision; and I beg leave to remark, first, that of itself, it is entirely inoperative. It does not infringe the rights of any person whatsoever, nor does it prohibit any free negro from emigrating to the State of Missouri. It is directory merely to the Legislature to do so, and, until they have made it by their enactment, no prohibition does, or can exist. It is not, nor can it be known, that the Legislature will ever pass such a law; if the direction be unconstitutional, they never can. If they should, the law, and not the constitution, would create the prohibition; unless the Legislature should derive the power to pass the law from this provision. But, it cannot be pretended, that this clause confers on the Legislature any new or greater power than they would possess without it. In governments not republican, the legislative is the supreme power; in those which are republican, the supreme power is in the people; and under our system, therefore, the constitutions abridge, rather than enlarge the powers of the legislative department. The provision, then, instead of conferring new power, directs the Legislature to exert a power already in them, independent of the constitution, and depending for its efficacy in no degree upon the authority of the constitution. If this clause confers no new power, so it imposes no additional obligation upon the Legislature; it directs the exercise of a legislative function, upon the supposition that the right to exercise it exists, and that it may be rightfully employed. It does not require the Legislature to pass the law, per fas aut nefas, right or wrong; but to do so if they can consistently with their constitutional obligations. In referring the subject to legislative interposition, the convention could have designed nothing else, than that it should act under the same responsibilities, and with the same regard to motives of State and general policy as in other cases. They could not have made it obligatory upon the Legislature to pass the law at all events, for this would have been requiring them to violate the Constitution of the United States, which their oaths, as members of the Legislature, bound them to support. Besides, if it had been the design to enact the prohibition without regard to constitutional restraints; or to abridge legislative discretion, the convention, themselves, would have ingrafted it upon their work, and not have referred it to the Legislature. The injunctions of the convention in matters of legislative cognizance must always be subservient to the higher duties of the legislator, the first of which is to pass no law repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The direction in question, therefore, amounts to nothing more than that the Legislature shall originate the system, provided they shall deem it compatible with the Constitution of the United States.

If, therefore, this clause neither enlarges the power, nor increases the obligations of the Legislature of Missouri, the power of the State in relation to the General Government, and the checks and balances of the latter, are the same as they would be independent of it; and if the relation of the State to the United States, and the rights of the persons to be affected by it are the same whether the clause be in or out of the constitution, the Legislature will act, if at all, at the same peril, and under the same restraints, as though it did not exist, and it would be the law and not the constitution of Missouri which would be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, if either could be. How then can we say, that a clause of a nature perfectly nugatory, possessing no legal force or operation, which confers no additional power, nor creates any new obligation, but directs a legislative interference subject to the higher control of the institutions of the General Government, can be unconstitutional?

If this clause do not violate the constitution, it is not possible for Congress to anticipate the passage of an unconstitutional law, and prospectively to pronounce it void, much less can we act upon such a supposition. Suppose, for example, that this clause were not in the constitution, but that Congress had reason to believe, that it was the intention of the Missouri Legislature to pass a similar law; could Congress require from them, as the terms of their admission into the Union, a stipulation, that no such law should ever be passed? Clearly not; for this would not only be drawing to Congress the judicial power of revising State laws, which they never can possess, but it would amount to a condition tying up the functions of the Legislature, and denying it the same powers which have been actually exerted by the other States. Sir, as it regards the municipal laws of the States, Congress must always rely upon the sound legal discretion of the State Legislature not to pass unconstitutional acts, and upon the firmness and integrity of the national judiciary, to avoid them if they should. With regard to the present States we have no other reliance, and we need no other.

And why, sir, do we fear the Legislature of Missouri more than we do those of the other States? We have stipulated to admit these people into the Union, and, wishing to avoid our obligation, we refuse to execute it, because we are pleased to suspect that at some future time their Legislature may pass a law, which we choose to determine would be unconstitutional!

But, Mr. Speaker, suppose the clause in the Missouri constitution be considered as making it obligatory upon the Legislature to pass a law conformable to its terms, is its compatibility with the Constitution of the United States irreconcilable? The clause in the latter instrument with which it is supposed to be in conflict, provides, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Now, on this supposition, I do not require gentlemen to refer this question to the judiciary, for I am prepared to decide it for myself; but, I ask them, when they attempt its interpretation here, to be guided by the same rules of construction by which the Judiciary would decide, if it were before them. If the State of Missouri possess any power over the subject-matter to which the provision relates, then it is not altogether void; it is in part at least good, and we must give it a construction which will reconcile the powers of the State with those of the General Government; otherwise, we should deny to the State the power of acting at all, lest it might transcend its proper sphere.

It must be conceded, sir, that if there are any free negroes and mulattoes, who are citizens of any State, yet that the great majority of this class of persons in the United States are citizens of no State. As to these, by far the greatest number, the power of Missouri is complete; their emigration to the State may be constitutionally prohibited, and, so far as it may operate upon them, the clause is good. Missouri, then, has the undeniable right to prevent "free negroes and mulattoes" from settling within her State; and, in order to give any color to the objection, gentlemen are obliged to assert that the clause excludes all free negroes and mulattoes, including citizens of the several States. If Missouri had no power to prevent any free negroes from going there, the clause might be bad; but she is admitted to possess sufficient power to fill up the plain literal scope of the clause; and it can never be bad, unless the Legislature exceed even the limits of the injunction. Is it fair to presume that the Legislature will do so, where they have neither a legal nor moral obligation to urge them forward, but have both to help them back?

It is our duty, moreover, sir, to give to the words of the clause that sense in which they are usually employed in all parts of the country, and by men of all classes; and in that sense they import, ex vi termini, that class of colored people who are neither slaves nor citizens. In a country where there are slaves who can become citizens, the middle condition of a man passing from slavery to citizenship, can be no otherwise designated than by the terms here employed, since his freedom does not necessarily import citizenship. When we speak of a negro slave, we mean one who owes a lasting service to a master; when we speak of a free negro, we refer to him who has been set free by his master; and the appellation of citizen belongs to a higher condition and fuller rights. If we design to discriminate between citizens of different color, we should use the terms white citizens, or black or negro citizens, which have, I confess, to my ear at least, the sound of novelty. In common parlance, therefore, we use the term free negro in contradistinction both to slaves and citizens, in the same way as the freedman among the Romans denoted the middle condition between the bondman and the Roman citizen. The convention of Missouri could not have used the terms in any other sense, especially when it is considered that their principal design was to exclude this class of people, of idle and dissolute habits, upon their Southern and Eastern borders, who are confessedly not citizens, and known only as free negroes and mulattoes, rather than those in the Northern and Eastern States, who, it cannot be supposed, will be likely ever to wander into this Western region. But as this part of the subject has been pressed more in detail, and with greater ability than I could hope to employ, I will say no more in regard to it than that, while there is a sound, legal, rational construction at hand, which reconciles the constitution of Missouri with that of the United States, we are bound in a fair performance of our engagements to adopt it, rather than diligently to hunt after some technical objection by which we avoid the one, under the pretext of obeying the other.

But, Mr. Speaker, these are not the principal views which I design to submit; I confess that the great ground upon which my opinion is formed is, that the free negroes and mulattoes in the United States are not that description of citizens contemplated by the Constitution of the United States as entitled to Federal rights.

I do not mean, sir, to deny that these people have certain rights. I admit they have many; and these I would cherish, and, when consistent with the safety of the white population, enlarge. But their rights are of a local nature, dependent upon the gratuitous favor of the municipal authority of the States, and liable to be curtailed or enlarged by those authorities; they are limited to the State granting them, and confer no claim to similar privileges and immunities purely federal. Gentlemen must not only show that a free negro may be admitted to the enjoyment of some rights of citizenship in a particular State, but they must also show that he is of that description of "citizen" to whom the constitution meant to guarantee equal rights in every State. The State authority may confer the right of citizenship within their State upon aliens and Indians; but it was never imagined that they would therefore be the subjects of federal rights. Nor could the constitution have intended to refer to any description of persons whose privileges were matters of grace from the local municipality. For I take it to be clear, that no person can claim federal immunities who cannot claim, as a matter of right, the privileges of a citizen in the State of which he is a resident. A consideration of the nature of citizenship and the principles of the Federal Union, will show that the free negroes in our country have no such pretensions. An inattention to the distinction here taken, has led to great misapprehension throughout the argument. Gentlemen have seen some few of these people voting in some one or two of the States, and have seized upon this circumstance as conclusive evidence of citizenship, without reflecting that, as a political right, it is the consequence rather than the characteristic of citizenship, and may depend upon the precarious tenure of the local legislature, which, if it pleased so to order, might deprive a real citizen of the right of voting, while at the same time it should confer it upon an alien who could claim none of the essential rights which characterize a citizen.

I concur entirely in the definition of a citizen, as given by the honorable gentleman from Virginia on my left, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who has spoken with so much ability, and left I fear little for me to add. I believe that his definition will be found, in all its prominent parts, to be fully supported by the best authors upon the subject, as well as the reason of the case. I take it, sir, that a person, to be a "citizen" under our Government, must be a member of the civil community, and entitled as matter of right to equal advantages in that community. His rights result from his association with it, and of which nothing short of his own will or misconduct can deprive him. They are rights independent of the political power, and inalienable. They were anterior to the community, were carried into it, and their preservation formed the great object of the association. They may be modified, but cannot be destroyed, by the political power of the society. A State, for instance, may regulate the right of suffrage, and extend it to such only of its members as possess a freehold property; but it could not extend it to one freeholder and not to another; much less could it say that a citizen should not acquire a freehold; for it is the inherent right of every citizen to exert his mental and physical powers in the pursuit of happiness, and for the acquisition of property, and to have his acquisitions protected. Our political system is founded upon this principle of equal rights in the members of the community, and any State regulation which should interfere with them, would be unconstitutional. It follows, therefore, that those only are "citizens" who can claim these advantages as a matter of right; all others, and those whose privileges depend upon the grace or favor of the local authority, fall under the denomination of inhabitants and aliens, holding their rights at the will of the Government under which they live. Upon a subject on which so great a variety of opinion has been entertained, I pray to be indulged in referring to an authority in support of the exposition I am pursuing. It is remarked by Vattel, who, in this respect, follows Grotius, that "The citizens are the members of the civil society. Bound to this society by certain duties, and subject to its authority, they equally participate in its advantages. The natives are those born in the country of those who are citizens. In order to be of the country, it is necessary that a person be born of a father who is a citizen."

"The inhabitants, as distinguished from citizens, are strangers who are permitted to settle and stay in the country. Bound by their residence to the society, they are subject to the laws of the State while they reside there, and they are obliged to defend it, because it grants them protection, though they do not participate in all the rights of citizens. They enjoy only the advantages which the laws or customs give them."

"The perpetual inhabitants are those who have received the right of perpetual residence. These are a kind of citizen of an inferior order, and are united and subject to the society without participation in all its advantages. Their children follow the condition of their fathers," &c.

Of the two last of these classes, I consider the Indians and free negroes and mulattoes of the United States. The "laws and custom" nowhere give them the right of participating in all the advantages of society. Their actual advantages vary in almost every State; in some they are dealt out more liberally; in others with a sparing hand; in none are they complete. In some States they cannot be witness against the whites; in others they cannot be jurors; in none are they allowed to hold offices or to intermarry with the whites—a circumstance to which I shall more particularly advert hereafter. If they were citizens, these disabilities could not be imposed upon them, but for some personal defect. The real truth is, sir, that they are nowhere considered as members of the civil society, but as inhabitants of the country, holding their rights at the will of the local authority.

It was competent, in the original formation of the societies which now compose this Union, to admit into the association, or to exclude from it, any description of persons whatsoever. Every one in any degree acquainted with the history of the first settlement of these States must know that the association was of white people—Europeans and their descendants. The idea of a mixture was at no time tolerated; even the aboriginal Indians were not received as a competent part of the civil or political community; but the country was settled, and the society formed, by a white population. It was essentially a white community. In its origin the black population could have formed no part of it, and throughout its progress the invincible barrier to a mixture of white and black, and the positive regulations of society, have perpetually excluded them. They could not, therefore, upon the principles of the association, and in the nature of things, be entitled to equal rights.

The African race came to the country posterior to the whites, and their original condition most unhappily was that of slaves. As such, they were clearly without the pale of the society; and it is equally clear that they never could be admitted within it afterwards, unless by some positive law, or by long usage and custom. They never have been admitted by either. In Pennsylvania, and many other States, they were expressly excluded from the benefit of the naturalization laws existing in the States, prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Where is there any positive institution providing for their incorporation into the civil community, or extending to them equal rights? Where is the State in the Union in which it is declared, by positive enactment, that free negroes shall be entitled to claim all the rights of citizens, and be entitled "equally to participate in the advantages of the civil" or political "society?" I never heard that there was one. The act of emancipation cannot have this effect, unless it should be so declared by some express statutory provision. Emancipation is the mere act of the owner; it is merely a relinquishment of his claim to the services of the negro; it gives freedom to the slave, but it is not competent for the owner, a single individual, by any act of his, to constitute him a citizen. This must be the work of the society at large. There cannot be a stronger illustration of this, than that the right and form of the manumission of slaves is everywhere a matter of State regulation; under which they confer on the manumitted slaves only the rights of free negroes, not of citizens, distinguishing between the two conditions, and creating a liability on the owner to support the negro, if at any period of his life he should become unable to support himself. This would never be, if by the act of manumission the negro were admitted to the rights of a citizen, for in that case it would be the duty of the society at large to provide for his age and infirmities, and they would have no power to impose the obligation exclusively upon the owner. It is because he can neither incorporate with, nor attain to any rank in the society, whereby his means and inducements to provide for himself are diminished, that the owner is not suffered to cast him loose upon the community without becoming responsible for his maintenance. Sir, the doctrine is confirmed by the experience of all history.

When Mr. MCLANE had taken his seat—

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, observed, that he was conscious of his small claims to the indulgence of the House, while he presented his views on the subject which engaged its attention. He trusted, however, some excuse would be found in the interesting character of the question to be decided.

DECEMBER, 1820.]

Missouri State Constitution—Citizenship of Free Colored Persons.

[H. OF R.]

The measure proposed is calculated to affect the privileges of a part of the people of that section of the Union to which I belong, said Mr. M., and particularly of the State of which I am a Representative. I feel myself under the highest obligation to assert, feebly as it may be, the rights and privileges of those whom the institutions of other States, as well as my own, declare to be their citizens. Such as they recognize as deserving their protecting care, I hope I shall be ever ready and willing to defend.

Is the constitution of Missouri repugnant to the Constitution of the United States?

By the twenty-sixth section of the constitution now offered for our acceptance, it is declared that "it shall be the duty of the General Assembly of Missouri, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever." Language, clear, precise, and energetic. It almost seems that it was feared the Assembly might be disposed to relax the severity of that inexorable clause. But to prevent the possibility of disobedience, we find, not the common declaration of duty to the Assembly, but a rigid admonition, not to disobey under any "pretext whatsoever."

The Constitution of the United States declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Are negroes and mulattoes the citizens of any State? If so, it is clear, that the language which has been repeated from the constitution of Missouri, is a glaring and offending violation of the Constitution of the United States.

An honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. ARCHER,) has very gallantly avowed himself the champion of State rights. I consider, with him, that it should constitute a crime of the darkest hue to abandon them; but, at the same time, it is a duty of the highest order to preserve from violation those which belong to the Union. Those rights which have not been surrendered by the several States to the General Government still remain in their power. Among these, the right of a State to declare who of its own inhabitants may be its citizens still remains unimpaired. It was never given up; it has been perpetually exercised by every State, as one of its most valuable prerogatives.

We have been asked, if other States are allowed to declare who may be their citizens, shall not Missouri be indulged in the same power? She would be entitled to equal privileges, but no more. The people of that territory may make citizens of whom they please, among themselves. For one, I have little disposition to interfere. But, when they attempt to disfranchise those who have been made the citizens of other States, it is a matter of very different import. This privilege, instead of reducing Missouri to a state "of pupillage," would elevate her to the rank of mistress to the Union.

The other States must then bow in submission to her superior power. Sir, no State in the Union would presume to deprive the citizens of Missouri of their rights, nor will they with composure allow her a prerogative which they disavow for themselves.

A citizen has been defined by a member from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) to be a person who enjoys all the civil rights and privileges which others possess under the same circumstances, belonging to the same community, unless such rights have been forfeited by such person, by some cause existing in himself. Whether the definition is correct or not, it will, I am confident, lead to a conclusion directly the reverse to that which has been drawn by the honorable gentleman who gave it. It admits, that there are different circumstances under which the people of the Union are found. It would be morally and politically impossible that all persons in a State could be found under the same circumstances. Those will be natural or created by the civil and political institutions of society. Yet, it seems to be agreed, that when we find a person, who enjoys all the rights and privileges which others enjoy, under similar circumstances, he is a citizen.

In many, perhaps in all, of the States a distinction is made, for many purposes, between freeholders and those who are not. One may serve as a juror, the other is excluded from that privilege, or right. The freeholder in Vermont may have a certain kind of process without surety; the person who is not a freeholder is deprived of this privilege. No one, however, would presume to declare that a person who was not a freeholder could not be a citizen. Here the rule which has been mentioned would apply correctly. The person who was not a freeholder, but who possessed all the civil rights and privileges which others enjoyed, under the same circumstances, would still be a citizen. So, minority or advanced age would constitute other classes, and having equal rights with their several classes are equally citizens. If property or age are employed by the supreme power of a State to confer different rights on the white population, and yet the character of citizenship remains unchanged, why may not color be employed to distinguish another class? Color may be a circumstance which will designate a portion of population, and may be used constitutionally, as age or property. If it is so, it is a clear conclusion which will follow from the position assumed, that every colored person who is entitled to all the rights and privileges which others enjoy, under the same circumstances, must be a citizen.

A reference has been made to the laws of Massachusetts which prohibit a black man from marrying a white woman. It is said that by the operation of this law he is deprived of a civil right, which renders him unequal to others, and deprives him of citizenship. Had not this doctrine been advanced by those whose talents command respect, it would never require refu-tation. It may be proper to pursue this principle to its necessary conclusion. It will not be denied that the female part of society are citizens of the several States to which they belong. They have civil rights and privileges, and as citizens can demand the protection and support of Government. But the black man cannot marry a woman of a different color, therefore he is not a citizen, because he is deprived of a right which a white man possesses. The white woman cannot marry a man of a different color—by the same rule, which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) has laid down, she cannot be a citizen, because she is deprived of a right which a colored woman enjoys. The operation of the law must be reciprocal, and if one class has lost its rights as citizens, the other has also.

It is also said that the negro and mulatto are not enrolled in the militia, and compelled to perform military service. In some States, perhaps in all, they may be exempt. So are those over and under the age prescribed by the laws. Is the youth of sixteen and the man of fifty deprived of the character of citizens because others are called upon to perform more arduous duties than themselves? If this is correct, all who have been excused from these duties are most shamefully degraded. The white and black man must share one common fate.

Thus, sir, I have endeavored to prove that the position which has been assumed will lead to the inevitable conclusion, that negroes and mulattoes, who, in any State, can demand the exercise of civil rights and privileges in common with that class to which they belong, are entitled to the character of citizens.

I concur with others who have addressed the House before me, that the term citizen cannot be defined by a single expression. The rights of citizens are different in different States, and are dependent on the several constitutions and laws which have been adopted. In the same State, different persons may be confined to different rights and yet all be citizens.

I will venture to assume a position, which I am confident none will deny. Not that it will embrace all who are entitled to the rights of citizens, but will be sufficiently comprehensive for the present discussion.

A person must be considered a citizen, who, by the fundamental laws of a State, is invested with political rights. These are the rights which communicate life and give activity to a government itself. In all the States of the Union, these rights are conferred on those only who have bound themselves to the common interest and become pledged to promote the general welfare; who have been incorporated into the great family of the people, and have made one common cause in the pursuit of the great objects of human government.

It would be absurd, sir, to say, that you will allow the enjoyment of the highest prerogatives to a person while he is yet an alien and a stranger; that you will permit a man to exercise those powers on which your Government must depend, and still not be a citizen. What State in the Union permits, for instance, the right of suffrage, but to such as are its citizens? What constitution declares a person eligible to its highest honors, who is deprived of the character of a citizen? It would be fatal to the existence of any government to admit the people of other countries to control its operations, until they had been bound by some strong, indissoluble tie to the general welfare.

In the position which I have assumed, I am well supported by the assertion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH.) I understood him distinctly to maintain "that a citizen might be defined to be one who is entitled to political rights."

Permit me, sir, to examine whether any negro or mulatto has political rights in any State; whether there is a constitution which decrees to such persons all the privileges of citizens. I should never have troubled the House with many observations on this point, had it not been so often asserted, in the most decisive language, that negroes or mulattoes, in every State in the Union, were deprived of all the essential rights of citizens. I should have supposed the most superficial examination of the constitutions of the several States would have proved, that such ideas were utterly destitute of foundation. But they have been advanced on the floor of this House, with such confidence, that I hope I shall be indulged in attempting to correct the error.

Sir, I would call the attention of the House to the constitution of Vermont. There, gentlemen will find an unequivocal declaration "that all men are born equally free and independent; that no male person, born in this country, or brought from over sea, ought to be holden, by law, to serve any person as a servant, slave, or apprentice, after he arrives at the age of twenty-one years; nor female, in like manner, after she arrives at the age of eighteen years." It does not declare that all men except negroes and mulattoes "are born equally free and independent;" it does not declare, Mr. Speaker, that no person except negroes and mulattoes shall be holden to servitude. The language is broad and comprehensive as the race of man. And, I believe that those unfortunate beings, even where they are held in a state of the deepest degradation, are still considered as belonging to the human family.

Sir, lest this may be called an unmeaning manifesto of the rights of man, calculated for a splendid show of republicanism, but intended to confer no substantial benefits, I will again refer to that instrument. "The declaration of the political rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this State is hereby declared to be a part of the constitution of this Commonwealth, and ought not to be violated on any pretence whatsoever." Negroes and mulattoes, sir, here find protection under this firm, humane, and liberal provision; to which the people of Ver-ment look with the proudest satisfaction, as their common safeguard.

Again, sir, it is declared "that every man of the full age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State for the space of one year next before the election of representatives, and is of a peaceable or quiet behavior, and will take the following oath, [the oath of allegiance to the State,] shall be entitled to all the privileges of a freeman of this State." This does not say, every man, except negroes and mulattoes. It embraces all of every color, whether "born in this country or brought from over sea;" and permit me to say that the rights of a freeman confer the highest distinction that can be given to an inhabitant of that State; they imply the perfection of all the civil and political privileges and immunities that can be enjoyed by man in the society of his fellow-men. All the security which the constitution gives to the most distinguished citizen for the protection of his life and reputation, is afforded to every freeman, whatever may be his circumstances, or color. The spirit of the constitution watches with equal eye over the rights and privileges, civil and political, of the negro and mulatto, and would chastise the least attempt to offer violation.

When Mr. M. concluded—

Mr. EVERTS, of Massachusetts, addressed the House, in substance, as follows:

I am one of those who had hoped that the discussion of this question might have been avoided. But it is upon us, and we must meet and decide it. With gentlemen who have preceded me, I perfectly agree, that the only question to be determined is, whether that article in the constitution of Missouri, making it the duty of the Legislature to provide by law "that free negroes and mulattoes shall not be admitted into that State," is, or is not, repugnant to that clause in the Constitution of the United States, which declares "that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." This question has been fairly met. Those who contend that the article is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, ground themselves on the position that blacks and mulattoes are not citizens of the United States, and have repeatedly referred to the condition of those in Massachusetts to support the assertion. Now, sir, I invite the honorable member from Delaware, who has lately addressed you, with the honorable member from Virginia, who, in his address to the Committee of the Whole, on Friday last, maintained the same position, to go with me and examine the question to its root.

At the commencement of the Revolutionary war, there were found in the Middle and Northern States, many blacks and other people of color, capable of bearing arms; a part of them free, the greater part slaves. The freemen entered our ranks with the whites. The time of those who were slaves was purchased by the States, and they were induced to enter the service in consequence of a law by which, on condition of their serving in the ranks during the war, they were made freemen. In Rhode Island, where their numbers were more considerable, they were formed, under the same considerations, into a regiment commanded by white officers; and it is required, in justice to them, to add, that they discharged their duty with zeal and fidelity. The gallant defence of Red Bank, in which this black regiment bore a part, is among the proofs of their valor.

Among the traits which distinguished this regiment, was their devotion to their officers; when their brave Colonel Greene was afterwards cut down and mortally wounded, the sabres of the enemy reached his body only through the limbs of his faithful guard of blacks, who hovered over him and protected him, every one of whom were killed, and whom he was not ashamed to call his children. The services of this description of men in the navy are also well known. I should not have mentioned either, but for the information of the gentleman from Delaware, whom I understood to say that he did not know that they had served in any considerable numbers.

The war over and peace restored, these men returned to their respective States. And who could have said to them, on their return to civil life after having shed their blood, in common with the whites, in the defence of the liberties of the country, You are not to participate in the rights secured by the struggle, or in the liberty for which you have been fighting? Certainly, no white man in Massachusetts.

The gentleman from Virginia says he must not be told that the term, we the people, in the preamble to the constitution, means, or includes, Indians, free negroes, mulattoes. If it shall be made to appear that persons of this description, citizens at the time, were parties to, and formed an integral part of that compact, it follows, incontestably, that they are and must be included in it. To justify the inference of gentlemen, the preamble ought to read, We the white people. This was impossible; the members of the convention who formed that constitution, from the Middle and Northern States, could never have consented, knowing that there were in those States many thousands of people of color, who had rights under it. They were free—free from their masters? Yes, in the first instance; they also became freemen of the State, and were admitted to all the rights and privileges of white citizens. Was this admission merely nominal? This is answered by the fact that they did enjoy and did exercise the rights of free citizens, and have continued to exercise them, from the peace of 1788 to this day. It has been contended that they are not citizens, because they have been deprived, by a law of Massachusetts, of a part of their civil rights, and in proof, is stated the law forbidding the marriage of a black man with a white woman. The same law, sir, in-terdicts the marriage of a white man with a black woman. The law, then, applies equally to both, and cannot justify the inference which has been drawn from it. But, if the black man ceased to be a citizen because he had lost this civil right, as contended for by the gentleman from Virginia, the white man also must be determined not to be a citizen, and the State of Missouri would have an equal right to exclude him. Again, sir, the exclusion of the blacks from the ranks of the militia is adduced as another instance of their privation of a civil right. Without dwelling on the well-known fact that militia duty in Massachusetts is a heavy duty, an exemption from which is considered a favor, and that several other descriptions of citizens are also exempted; and admitting that the blacks are interdicted, while others are only exempted from this duty, what is proved by quoting these laws? They prove that they were in the actual enjoyment of these rights, and that a specific law became necessary to deprive them of them. Admitting that the State had a right to pass these laws, and that this description of citizens are curtailed in their exercise of a part of their privileges, what rights are left to them, and what rights do they continue to enjoy and exercise? We answer, all the broad and essential rights of citizens—the right, in common with the whites, to hold real and personal estate; the right of course to hold and convey land; the right of trial by jury; the right to the writ of habeas corpus; and, in this Government, the all-important right of the elective franchise; and it may be safely affirmed, that, by the laws and constitution of Massachusetts, they are considered as citizens equally with the whites.

It has been justly observed on this subject, by a gentleman on the other side, that facts and practice are better than theory. Here, then, we offer incontrovertible facts, proving, not from theory, but from actual and long-continued practice, that black men and mulattoes, in Massachusetts at least, are citizens, having civil and political rights, in common with the whites. If we are asked for evidence of their being in the exercise of these rights, it is answered, that a knowledge of the history and practice of the State for more than forty years past, will show that they have been in the constant exercise of them. To vote in the election of town, county, and State officers, the same qualifications of residence and property are required from them, as from the whites, and, having these qualifications, they have a voice in the election of all State officers. Again, it is particularly affirmed by the honorable member from Delaware, that this description of persons, whatever right they may have in the several States, have no federal rights, and cannot be considered as citizens of the United States. I had thought, with the honorable member from Pennsylvania, that the question "who were citizens?" was merged and decided by the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

By whom, and for whose use and benefit was that constitution formed? By the people, and for the people inhabiting the several States. Did the convention who formed it go into the consideration of the character or complexion of the citizens included in the compact? No, sir; they necessarily considered all those as citizens who were acknowledged as such at the time by the constitutions of the States.

Independent of all reasoning, presumption, or theory, we proceed to state facts which prove incontrovertibly their federal rights. I confine my observations to Massachusetts, because the practice in that State is within my own personal knowledge and observation. In that State, sir, the citizens in question constituted, and were in fact an elementary part of the Federal compact. They were as directly represented as the whites in the initiatory process; and, from their votes, in common with those of the whites, emanated the convention of Massachusetts, by whom the Federal Constitution was received and ratified. Is not this proof? Is it not demonstration that they are entitled to—that they hold and exercise federal rights in common with the other citizens? If a doubt remained, it is answered by another equally important fact. They are also represented, not circuitously and indirectly, but directly, in this House. I very much doubt, sir, if there be a member on this floor from any one district in Massachusetts, whose election does not partake of the votes of these people. In the district which I have the honor to represent, their number, compared with that of the white population, is not great; but, in an adjoining district, their number of qualified voters have been sufficient, and has actually turned the election of a member of this House.

After affirming that they had not the rights of citizens of the United States, which we apprehend we have disproved, the gentleman from Delaware presumes that they are few in number. This also is a great error. Their number is much greater than that gentleman apprehends. Not only the number and the rights of these men, but their characters also, do not appear to have been understood. Nor is it to me at all extraordinary that gentlemen from other States, in which the condition, character, the moral faculties, and the rights of men of color differ so widely, should entertain opinions so variant from ours. In Massachusetts, sir, there are among them those who possess all the virtues which are deemed estimable in civil and social life. They have their public teachers of religion and morality, their schools and other institutions; on anniversaries which they consider interesting to them, they have their public processions; in all which they conduct themselves with order and decorum. Do we ask for them any enlargement or extension of their rights? No, sir, we ask only that, in a disposition to accommodate Missouri, their avowed rights and privileges be not taken from them.

Mr. Speaker, no one can address you who is more sensible than I am that this Government is the result of compromise; of a healing, heavenly, conciliating spirit, which the genius of the immortal Washington was perhaps alone capable of rallying round him; nor can any one be more sensible of the importance of cherishing these dispositions, more especially in cases where the rights of States, whether already admitted, or hereafter to be admitted into the Union, are concerned. Let us be careful that this indulgent disposition be not extended too far. Sir, this has been considered a sectional question. I must deny the position. Maine is as deeply interested in it as Missouri. In every question touching the constitution, every State in the Union has an equal, a common interest; and, let me add, however we may differ in opinion or in construction, we are bound by a common interest to extend to each other the belief that there is a common respect and an equal desire to obey its injunctions. Were this even a doubtful case, it ought to be decided in favor of common rights. Were it possible that, in the wish to accommodate Missouri, the constitution should be made to bend in her favor, the tree is in danger, and, if a single limb be broken, Missouri is no longer safe in what would be guaranteed to her. In less than twelve months the inclination may be in a different direction, and she may lose more than she would have gained.

When Mr. E. had concluded—

The committee rose, on the motion of Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, (some other gentlemen also rising to obtain the floor,) and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 13.

Another member, to wit, from North Carolina, THOMAS SETTLE, appeared, and took his seat.

Constitution of Missouri.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, delivered, at considerable length, his sentiments, in opposition to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, said, after the full discussion which this subject had already received, he felt much reluctance in asking the attention of the House to a single additional remark from him; and were it not for the peculiar situation in which he found himself placed, he should have been contented in giving a silent vote. He said he had fully given his constituents to understand that he should vote for the admission of Missouri. That he had given them so to understand, even previous to his re-election to a seat in the next Congress, and the result of that election had satisfied him that his vote would not be disapproved. He considered the faith of Congress pledged, by the act of the last session, to admit her, provided her constitution was made in conformity to the terms of this act, and when he had said he would vote for her admission, that declaration had always been made under the belief that such would be the case.

When Mr. C. arrived at Washington, he for the first time met the objection which was now urged against her constitution, and perhaps under the influence of a strong anxiety for her admission, had examined the question, as he then thought, thoroughly, and for a considerable time saw no reason to change his determination. Under this conviction, produced by that examination, he had, as he hoped he always should do, fearlessly expressed his opinion in favor of her admission. He even now, notwithstanding his opinion was changed, freely declared that all his predilections were in favor of such a vote. Missouri, he said, was the near adjoining neighbor of Illinois, and notwithstanding an unhappy difference of opinion upon political subjects had created between their respective citizens a rancour and animosity, which he well knew the vote he was about to give would not in the least allay; a vote which he well knew many of his constituents would be greatly disappointed when they heard of; yet he should be glad to see her admitted and placed upon an equal footing with the State which he had the honor to represent.

Mr. C. said, it was because of his particular situation, and because there was a view of the subject which had weight with him, and which had not been taken in argument, that he ventured to beg the indulgence of the House for a single moment.

He was aware that the change his opinion had undergone, had called forth the charge of inconsistency and timidity from some, on both sides of the question. But such suggestions made no impression upon his mind. He felt shielded against the effects of all such unkind opinions and suggestions, by a consciousness of the rectitude of his own motives.

[Mr. Cook then gave at length his reasons for changing his opinion on the question of admitting Missouri into the Union, the change being founded on that clause in her constitution which prohibited free people of color from settling in the State; and which he held to be incompatible with that clause in the Constitution of the United States which guaranteed to the citizens of each State the rights of citizenship in every State.]

The question was taken, "Shall the resolution be engrossed, and ordered to be read a third time?" And on this question the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Burton, Burwell, Cannon, Cobb, Cooke, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Edwards of North Carolina, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Gray, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Lowndes, Little, McCoy, McCreary, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Kentucky, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, Montgomery, T. And the resolution for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union was rejected.

Mr. LOWNDES then rose, and said that he did not wish to be disrespectful to a majority of the House, as declared on the vote just taken, but he now felt it to be his duty to call on them, having rejected the resolution proposed by the committee of their appointment, to devise and propose to the House the means necessary to protect the territory, the property, and all the rights of the United States in the Missouri country.

A motion being made to adjourn, was decided affirmatively, and, at a little before sunset, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 14.

Military Punishment.

The following letter from the Secretary of War was received and read:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Dec. 14, 1820.

SIR: In answer to that part of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 9th instant, requiring this Department to show whether the order given by Colonel King of the 4th infantry, for shooting deserters taken in the fact, was approved by any general officer in the service of the United States, or was known to, and passed over in silence by him, as stated in the defence of said Colonel King, I have to enclose an extract of the letter of Major General Jackson on that subject, which was transmitted to the House of Representatives with the copy of the trial of Colonel King, and which is published in the appendix of that trial. This extract contains all the information within the knowledge of this Department on that subject.

In relation to that part of the resolution which requires any information this Department may possess, showing that corporal punishment has been inflicted on any soldier, whereby he came to his death, I have the honor to state, that the only report of that kind, which has reached this Department, was the case of a soldier at Fort Preble, near Portland, in Maine. Major Brooks, a correct and intelligent officer commanding that post, in September last, reported that the death of a soldier, an habitual drunkard, who had been on a fatigue party, under Lieutenant Hobart, and had been confined by him, had caused much excitement among the citizens, who attributed the death of the man to the conduct of Lieutenant Hobart; that the civil authority had taken up the affair for investigation, to which Lieutenant Hobart had readily submitted himself. The report was accompanied with the enclosed certificate of the jury of inquest as to the correct conduct of Major Brooks and the other officers of the post, in relation to the transaction. It thus appearing that the affair would undergo an investigation in the district court of the United States, the Department did not think it proper to order a military investigation.

I have the honor to be, yours, &c.,

J. C. CALHOUN.

To the SPEAKER of House of Reps.

FRIDAY, December 15.

The engrossed bills for the relief of Margaret Perry, and for the relief of William McIntosh, were severally read the third time, passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.

MONDAY, December 18.

A new member, to wit, from Massachusetts, AARON HOBART, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Zabdiel Sampson, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Death of Mr. Hazard.

Mr. EDDY, of Rhode Island, rose, and briefly announced to the House the decease, on yesterday, of NATHANIEL HAZARD, Esq., a member of this House from the State of Rhode Island.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. E., resolutions were unanimously adopted, expressive of the feelings of the House on this occasion; resolving to attend the funeral, this day, at two o'clock; appointing a committee to superintend the same; and resolving, also, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, to go into mourning, and wear a black crape round the left arm for thirty days.

Messrs. EDDY, MORTON, RUSS, SHAW, MALLARY, ARCHER of Maryland, and COOKE, were appointed a committee accordingly; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 19.

Occupation of the Columbia.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, a committee was appointed to inquire into the situation of the settlements upon the Pacific Ocean, and the expediency of occupying the Columbia River. Mr. FLOYD, Mr. METCALFE, and Mr. SWEARINGEN, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. FLOYD submitted the following resolution, which, under the rule, will lie on the table for consideration until to-morrow.

DECEMBER, 1820.]

Bank Notes in Payment of Duties.

[H. OF R.]

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of War be required to lay before this House a statement of the number and situation of the military posts in the United States at this time; together with the distribution of the army; designating the number of men, also the number and rank of the officers at each place.

Hall of the House.

Mr. MEBOER submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Buildings be instructed to inquire into the practicability of making such alterations in the present structure of the Hall of the House of Representatives, as shall better adapt it to the purposes of a deliberative assembly; and, if no such alteration can be effected, to ascertain whether it be practicable to provide a suitable Hall in the centre building of the Capitol.

Mr. M. briefly explained his object in offering this resolve, which, it would be observed, proposed an inquiry merely. It was, he said, utterly impossible, as every gentleman's experience must have taught him, to hear more than one-half of the members who addressed the House, without changing one's seat for the purpose. For one, he declared, that, owing to this circumstance, he felt himself utterly incapable of discharging the duty imposed on him by his constituents. He had, he said, in anticipation of such a duty as he now proposed to devolve on the Committee on the Public Buildings, made it his business to examine the centre building. He had satisfied himself that the room intended for the Library, simpler in its structure than the present Hall, which was of a figure unfavorable to deliberation, would answer all the purposes of a Representative Chamber. It would be a room larger than that which often accommodates five hundred members in the British House of Commons; as large as that which has accommodated a more numerous body in Massachusetts; and larger than that which is occupied by a more numerous body than this in the State of Virginia.

The resolve for inquiry was adopted, as above stated, but not without opposing voices.

THURSDAY, December 21.

Death of Mr. Slocumb.

Little business was transacted in either House of Congress to-day, both bodies having adjourned at an early hour, to make arrangements to attend the funeral of a deceased member of the House of Representatives, and, as a mark of respect, usual on such occasions.

As soon as the Journal was read in the House of Representatives, Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, rose, and announced to the House the decease of JESSE SLOCUMB, Esq., a member from the State of North Carolina; and, on the motion of Mr. SMITH, resolutions were then unanimously adopted expressive of the feelings of the House on this occasion; resolving to attend the funeral, this day, at three o'clock—appointing a committee to superintend the same—and resolving, also, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, to go into mourning, and wear a black crape round the left arm for thirty days.

Messrs. SMITH, of North Carolina, BURTON, FISHER, HOOKS, SETTLE, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and DAVIDSON, were appointed the committee of arrangements.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, also, it was resolved that the Speaker of the House acquaint the Executive of the State of North Carolina, with the vacancy occasioned in the representation from that State by the death of Mr. SLOCUMB.

TUESDAY, December 26.

Death of Mr. Burrill.

The Secretary of the Senate then came in with a message, announcing the death of the Honorable JAMES BURRILL, Jr., a member of that body, and that his funeral would take place from the Senate Chamber, at half past ten o'clock to-morrow.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. EDDY, it was—

Resolved, unanimously, That this House will attend the funeral of the Honorable JAMES BURRILL, Jr., late a member of the Senate from the State of Rhode Island, to-morrow, at half past ten o'clock, A. M.; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning, and wear crape for thirty days.

The House then adjourned to Thursday next.

THURSDAY, December 28.

Bank Notes in Payment of Duties.

Mr. LOWNDES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing that the notes of no banks by which notes below the amount of five dollars are, or may be, issued, shall be taken in payment of duties or debts to the Government of the United States.

In introducing the resolution, Mr. L. adverted to the viciousness of the currency where notes for dollars and parts of dollars supply the place of specie, as, where such notes are issued, they always will. He spoke also of the efforts made in some of the States, and now making in Virginia, to banish those notes from circulation—efforts which were always vain, so long as such notes were issued by neighboring States, &c. No authority but Congress, he contended, was competent to correct the evil in any manner; and, the object of his resolution being for inquiry only, he did not anticipate any sound objection to its adoption.

Mr. STORRS said he had no decided objection to inquiry into this subject, but he hoped the House would reflect on the effect which the adoption of the measure suggested would have, in giving a preference to the notes of the Bank of the United States over those of all other banks. He hoped that the Committee of Ways and Means, whose information on such subjects was so extensive, would examine this question in all its bearings, and present their views of it to the House.

Mr. LOWNDES said it was hardly possible to suppose that the committee would not know, as every member of the House would see, that the effect of the adoption of such a measure must be favorable to some banks and unfavorable to others. But, Mr. L. said, there are many banks, and those among the best in the States, which do not issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars. It was for the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire whether the Government should not lend its aid to produce uniformity in this respect.

Mr. MEIGS agreed in opinion with his colleague, and was opposed even to authorizing an inquiry into this matter. When this great Bank of the United States had furnished the Union with a circulating medium of equal value in all parts of the Union, he might perhaps be inclined to give it further facilities; but, for the present, he would not, for one, consent to go further in this respect than Congress had already gone. The Secretary of the Treasury had already the power to forbid the reception of notes not in good credit, by the collectors, &c., which he had duly exercised. If a measure of the sort now proposed were to succeed, the notes of a great majority of the banks in the United States would cease to be receivable in payment of taxes, and would be driven from circulation. He could see no other effect which could flow from the adoption of the regulation suggested in the resolve, but to give an almost exclusive circulation to the notes of the Bank of the United States, and he was therefore opposed to the resolve.

Mr. SOUTHWARD spoke in favor of the resolve. He thought it was bad policy ever to have permitted the banks to issue notes of a less denomination than five dollars, and believed that such issues had a great agency in driving specie from circulation a few years ago. He was of opinion that excluding the small notes from circulation would restore specie to its former general currency.

Mr. LOWNDES spoke in reply to Mr. MEIGS, denying that the particular object of his motion was to benefit the United States Bank. Suppose no such bank were in existence, he said, and the interests of the country required that its currency should consist in part of gold and silver, and not of paper merely, would it not be well, under such circumstances, at least to inquire into the policy of prohibiting the circulation of notes of a denomination under five dollars—the effect of which measure would be to substitute specie, in part, for notes, in the circulating medium of the country? The object of the resolution was not to institute an inquiry in order to benefit the Bank of the United States; but, if it were the policy of the country to encourage the circulation of specie, which he presumed no man would doubt, he asked whether that policy ought to be disregarded, because a resort to it might incidentally benefit the Bank of the United States? If it were true that the Bank of the United States had not afforded a circulating medium of equal value, &c., that itself would be an argument not against, but in favor of this inquiry.

Mr. MEIGS resumed the floor. The great Bank of the United States, he contended, had not fulfilled the duties which it was expected to have performed. There were a hundred banks in the States, he said, about the legality of whose institution there were no doubts, whose paper was as current and in as high credit as that of the Bank of the United States, and who issued notes of a less amount than five dollars. And why should they not? Was the circulating medium of the country intended only for men who deal in tens and hundreds of dollars? The object of this resolution, he said, was plainly neither more nor less than to restrain the circulation of the notes of banks issuing notes of less than five dollars, and of course to benefit the Bank of the United States by making its notes the only current paper. He was, therefore, yet decidedly opposed to this proposition.

Mr. TREMBLE said he should vote for the proposed inquiry, and regretted the opposition to it. The people of the United States, he said, expected that the National Government would make the inquiry, and do what appeared, on inquiry, to be within the scope of its power, to restore to this country a sound circulating medium. At a former session, a report had been made to this House, in which it had been suggested that a circulating medium might be established, to consist of small coins of convenient denominations. He presumed it was intended to take up the subject at the present session, and, if possible, to adopt some measure to carry that idea into effect. He observed, by the way, that with regard to the Bank of the United States, he was not much disposed to offer to it any advantages in addition to those which it already enjoyed. Adverting to what had fallen from other gentlemen respecting small banks and small bank notes, Mr. T. said that Congress had set the example to the States in establishing them; in this District, with a population of some thirty thousand, Congress had established twelve banks, and it had a branch of the Bank of the United States besides. Mr. T. here alluded to the miserable small notes in circulation in the District, respecting which he made a ludicrous comparison, which the reporter did not hear with sufficient distinctness to commit to paper. He hoped some measure would be adopted by Congress to effect a circulation of coins for all transactions under five dollars. It was expected from Congress. It was in the power of Congress alone to effect this object, and Congress had already too long delayed the exercise of the power.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks on the proposition before the House, the object of which he understood to be to exclude from circulation all bank notes under five dollars, with a view to introduce, in place of them, a specie currency. Such a measure, Mr. S. believed, would have the effect to prevent the general exportation of specie whenever there was a demand for it abroad, by dispersing it over the country, in such a manner that it could not readily be gathered together in large sums. Mr. S. showed, by reference to what had taken place in different parts of the country, and more recently by voluntary arrangement of the banks in Baltimore, that such would be the effect of the exclusion of small notes from circulation. Whether it was politic to do, in this respect, what would have the appearance of striking at the State banks, was another question; there could be no doubt, however, of the authority of Congress in this regard within the District of Columbia, nor of the expediency of exercising it, &c.

Mr. SILSBEE made a few observations to the same effect as those of Mr. SMITH. He was in favor of the resolution, and believed that the sooner the circulation of these small notes was stopped the better it would be for the country.

Mr. MERCER, in expressing his approbation of the resolution, said he was surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky should have reflected so pointedly on the District of Columbia; for, as the old saying is, those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. Of the banks of this District, he would only say that he believed they were in a better state than any beyond the Alleghany mountains; and, with respect to the circulation of small notes within the District, the people of the District had been the first to direct the attention of Congress to the subject; and he intimated the hope that the session would not pass without making some provision to restrain these issues of notes, particularly by the corporations of the city and towns of the District. With respect to the Bank of the United States, Mr. M. said it had nothing to do with this question. Whenever that subject should properly present itself to the House, he should take the opportunity to offer some few remarks on the impolicy of affording further advantages to that already powerful institution.

Mr. BALDWIN said he was unwilling at any time to oppose a proposition having for its object an inquiry into the expediency of any measure. But this was an exception. It was the beginning of a system of legislation which looked towards an interference with the State banks. The next step might be, to propose that no notes of State banks should be received in payments to the United States. The same principle as is found in the proposition suggested in this resolution, would equally justify that legislation which he had just mentioned. It is best to stop, said Mr. B., before we begin this course. What we have already done has led to a question of the rights of States to lay taxes; in regard to which some think the judicial decision has been too much against the States. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. B. said, had already a discretionary power on this subject.

Why then should this House take the matter up, when the proposition submitted was at least of questionable character? He knew of no motive which could induce him ultimately to sanction the proposition; but, before he would even vote for an inquiry into it, he must have much stronger reasons in its favor than had yet been assigned.

Mr. TRIMBLE said he well recollected the proverb which the gentleman had quoted to him. The example of multiplying banks, however, was set by the Congress, and the people of Kentucky but followed it; and that example had a powerful effect. Whatever might be thought of Congress immediately around the Seat of Government, at a greater distance a very high opinion was entertained of them; and when they established the twelfth bank within this District, the people at a distance thought it a wonderfully wise measure, and the good people of Kentucky followed the example which Congress had set them. Congress, Mr. T. said, had set a pernicious example in this respect, and ought to be prompt in acknowledging their error, and retracting it as far as practicable. The adoption of this resolution would be one step towards doing so.

Mr. MERCER said, if the subject had been the policy of multiplying banks, he should have thought himself unhappy in the proverb he had brought to his aid. But the question was of the absence of specie, occasioned by the circulation of small notes; and Mr. M. said, that he believed in the State in which the gentleman from Kentucky resided, there is not a specie-paying bank, whilst there is not one in operation in this District which does not pay specie. Mr. M. made some further remarks in defence and support of State banks against the Bank of the United States. He was opposed to one bank in a country, as he was to one head in a monarchy, &c., and was as much opposed as any one to subjecting the State banks to the sway of the great banking institution of the country.

Mr. BURTON said it appeared to him that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) had placed this subject on its proper basis. If Congress had the power to interfere with the circulation of one dollar notes of the State banks, it certainly had the same power in regard to all the notes of State banks. Mr. B. was opposed to the resolution. The substitution of specie for small notes was a matter to be regulated by public opinion. When specie vanished some years ago, the issue of small notes was indispensable; on the other hand, when specie became plentiful in the cities, public opinion there corrected the evil. If we adopt the resolution, said Mr. B., we at once commence an attack on the State banks, and there is no knowing where it will end.

Mr. LIVERMORE said, for his part, that he considered it improper to attempt indirectly a measure which could not be directly approached. Such, he said, would be the effect of the adoption of the resolve now proposed. Every State in the Union had authority to do, by direct legislation, what it was now proposed to do indirectly. Mr. L. was, therefore, for leaving this matter wholly to the State Legislatures. In Pennsylvania a law had been passed prohibiting the circulation of notes for less than five dollars. In other States the same have been done. In New Hampshire, though attempts had been made to effect this object, the laws had been afterwards repealed. Let each State, said Mr. L., regulate this matter for itself. It was not pretended, he said, that the proposed measure was necessary in aid of the collection of the revenue. On the other hand, if it became necessary to resort to internal taxation, it would be indispensable to have small bills in circulation, without which the revenue could not be collected. Silver and gold, Mr. L. said, would forever centre in the cities; they would not remain in the remote parts of the country, and, in their absence, small bills were indispensable. He hoped, therefore, that the country banks would not be prevented from issuing them.

Mr. COBB was surprised at the nature of the objections to this resolution, which proposed to establish no principle, but merely to make an inquiry. What was the object of the resolution? It was to inquire into the expediency of a measure which, if adopted, would probably have the effect to force a general specie currency. Certainly, if it had that effect, a great benefit would result to society from its adoption; because specie is subject to no variation, and will answer all purposes in all places, which paper currency will not. He could not see that, by this measure, the United States Bank was to be benefited either one way or another; and, as to the abstract policy of the proposed measure, he did not see how a doubt could exist.

The question was then taken on agreeing to Mr. LOWNDES's resolution, and decided in the affirmative—59 votes to 40.

Military Academy.

Mr. CANNON submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the number of cadets educated at the Military Academy that have remained in the service of the United States five years; also, the number that have received commissions, and have resigned before the expiration of five years; also, the number that have left the Military Academy without commissions, and the amount of money that has been paid to each one; also, the sums of money that have been paid to cadets who were permitted to stay at home (if any) for the time between their appointment and that of their being mustered at the academy; also, the whole number educated at the academy, who were in the service of the United States during the late war; and the number of those, thus engaged in the service, who were in any battle or battles fought during said time with the enemies of our country; also, the whole expense of maintaining officers and instructors of the academy each year, since the year 1802; the whole expense of ammunition and soldiers that have been placed at the academy, for their assistance, since its first establishment; also, how far martial law has been carried into effect there, and whether, or not, the professors and teachers are, or have been, under martial law, and whether, or not, any of the cadets have been sent from said academy, or dismissed by order of the superintendent, or any other officer, without a trial, or any specific charge being proved against them; also, how many foreigners are professors or teachers in said academy; and the number of cadets, if any, that have been admitted into the same from the families of foreigners.

Reduction of Expenditures.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, took into consideration the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient that the annual expenses of the Government should be reduced; that, for the accomplishment of this object, it is further,

2. Resolved, That all such offices as are not immediately necessary for the transaction of public business, and the abolition of which would not be detrimental to the public interests, shall be abolished.

3. Resolved, That the salaries of all civil officers, whose compensation has been increased since the year 1809, shall be reduced to what they were at that period.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce the Army to the number of six thousand non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, preserving such part of the corps of engineers, without regard to that number, as may be required by the public interest; and including such reduction of the general staff as may be required by the state of the Army when reduced as herein proposed.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient that the appropriations for the erection of fortifications shall be so made as to require a less sum annually, by extending the time within which they shall be completed.

6. Resolved, That the act making an appropriation of one million of dollars per annum for the increase of the Navy, be so amended as to extend the time within which such increase shall be made, and to reduce the annual appropriation to the sum of five hundred thousand dollars.

7. Resolved, That it is expedient to recall from active service one-half of the naval force now employed, and to place the same in ordinary.

And the same having been read—

•Mr. COBB, of Georgia, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The task which I have undertaken, to investigate all the subjects involved in the resolutions just read, would be a fearful one, to heads much more profound than mine. But, as I am well convinced that the committee are not prepared to expect a display of any profound ideas from me, I deem an apology for the very imperfect views which I shall offer quite unnecessary.

Broad as the resolutions would appear, they are defective, in not embracing all the objects upon which I mean to touch in the course of my remarks. For this reason I shall take the liberty of offering one or two amendments before the investigation of them shall be closed.

I think the preference which is to be given to the form in which these resolutions have been introduced, will be obvious. They admit of the committee's taking a full view of the state of the nation. They admit of an inquiry into the financial resources of the country, and of the sources from which revenue is derived by the existing laws; into the extent of the various establishments requiring the expenditure of the public money; the necessity and usefulness of them, and the adequacy of the revenue to their maintenance; whether they are to be supported by the imposition of additional burdens upon the people, in the shape of loans or taxes, or whether the interests and true policy of the nation would not rather point to their reduction in preference to such a resort. The importance of the question involved in such an inquiry will not be denied. Attempts at a partial view of them, and at making partial reductions in the public expenses, are always attended with the danger of doing nothing, or of running into an extreme parsimony in relation to particular objects. It is the duty of the Legislature to determine what shall be the "portion of the produce of the land and labor of the country to be placed at the disposition of Government." This must be determined by the capacity of the people to contribute this portion. When, however, it is ascertained, it is right that you should have before your eyes all the objects of expenditure, before you will be able properly to distribute it among the several objects.

By what principles the Legislature of this nation shall be governed in determining this "portion of the product of land and labor," (which is only a definition of what are called taxes,) has been a subject of great discussion and contrariety of opinion, from the institution of the Government to the present day. My opinion upon the subject can be expressed in a very few words: The people of that nation are happiest whose rights are protected at the least expense, with the least danger from the instruments of protection, and where there are the fewest obstacles created, by law, to the exercise of individual industry, and the display of individual enterprise. I can scarcely conceive of controversy upon a position so reasonable and plain.

We boast that our form of government best admits of reducing the principle I have stated into practice. I very much fear that history has yet to determine, from our conduct, whether, like the Athenians in relation to politeness, we shall show that we only know it, or, like the Lacedaemonians, we practise it. That we have an idea of it I think is very evident; for no people under the sun boast more of their national simplicity, frugality, and economy than we do, even at the very moment that an increase of the public burdens is required to defray the ordinary expenses of the year. To prove a conformity between the boast and the fact, is a task I have no disposition to undertake.

Admitting the practicability of economical principles, (which, so far from denying, I shall attempt, before I conclude, to prove,) I will take the liberty to say, that in no nation can taxation be rendered more oppressive than in ours. This arises from our form of Government; from that "imperium in imperio," that exercise of two distinct kinds of sovereignty by the same people, of which we are so proud. The affairs of the Confederacy are administered by one body of magistracy, under the Federal Constitution, and must be supported in its expenses. The government of each State, in whose care is confided the greatest portion of the people's rights, is conducted by another body of magistracy, and must also be supported. The expenses of either government, taken separately, have nothing alarming in their amount. If added together, they are swelled to an enormous sum, and it requires but little augmentation to make them onerous indeed. Suppose the General Government should determine upon some grand and expensive political scheme, the execution of which requires an increase of revenue; for instance, a magnificent scheme of internal improvements, in favor of which a vote of this House has already been had; and that one of the States, say New York, determines on a similar scheme, as she has done, also requiring an increase of State revenue; is it not obvious that the burdens of the people of that State would be rapidly increased? I have alluded to this scheme of internal improvements only by way of exemplifying my ideas. If, however, the view is extended to all the powers which may be exercised by each sovereignty, requiring the expenditure of money, it will be seen that the adoption of but very few of these magnificent schemes will make the public burdens alarmingly oppressive, and destructive of a large share of our comforts.

The facility with which this state of things could be produced, was most distinctly perceived by the people who authorized the formation of the Federal Constitution, and by whose authority it was put in operation. The old Federal Government asked of the States the power to impose a very small tax on commerce. The convention which met to confer that power produced the Federal Constitution as the result of their labors, and submitted it to the people for their ratification. In their examinations of this instrument, they could but see how injuriously the unlimited power of taxation therein conferred might be exercised.

Gentlemen can see, by turning to the various acts of ratification, how many of the States, by express declarations and limitations, attempted to guard against the abuse of the powers conferred upon the Federal Government, and to settle the principles of policy by which the agents employed in the administration of that government should be guided. These acts speak a language that cannot be misunderstood; and let it be remembered, that this language is held by the people by whom the Federal Constitution was made and ratified to their servants thereafter to be appointed to execute the purposes of it. It is in these acts that we shall first discover the marks of distinction between what has since been appropriately denominated the ordinary and extraordinary sources of revenue. By the first was meant the revenue derived from commerce, to which has since been added the price of the public lands, and, by the second, internal taxes in the broadest sense of the term. Here it is that we see the makers of the constitution declaring that "standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty," and that the defence of the country shall rest upon the militia. Here, in short, we shall see asserted and dictated, in the plainest terms, all those principles of economy and rules of political conduct which I am attempting to advocate. To read the whole of these ratifications would tax the patience of the committee more than I wish; but I pray their indulgence in reading one or two of them. The ratification of New York contains the following expressions: "That the people have a right to keep and bear arms; that a well-regulated militia, including the body of the people capable of bearing arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defence of a free State." "That standing armies, in times of peace, are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be kept up, except in cases of necessity, and that at all times the military should be under strict subordination to the civil power." "That Congress will not lay direct taxes in this State, but when moneys arising from the imposts and excise shall be insufficient for the public exigencies, nor then, until Congress shall first have made a requisition upon the State to assess, levy, and pay the amount of such requisition," &c.* On this last subject the language of the ratification of North Carolina is as follows: "When Congress shall lay direct taxes or excises, they shall immediately inform the executive power of each State," &c.† Such, sir, was the jealousy displayed by the people of the States—parties to the constitution—in relation to the subject of internal taxes. That they intended that the General Government should rely only upon the imposts for defraying the expenses in times of peace, cannot admit a doubt. If, however, the public exigencies—if a state of war, or other extraordinary circumstance, should require it, then, and not till then, was resort to be had to other sources of revenue, so long as the necessity should continue. What was it, sir, but a departure from those principles, and some others prescribed in the same imperative manner, that caused the people, at a later period in the Government, to withdraw their confidence from their agents then in the administration of affairs, and to substitute Mr. Jefferson and his friends in their places? The mention of the name of this distinguished man leads me to call the attention of the committee to certain opinions of his, in corroboration of the ideas I have advanced; not because they are his opinions, but because they were those of the people at that period. They will also be found in the writings and speeches of the "conscript fathers," and the reports and proceedings of Congress of that day. Mr. Jefferson's opinions were then considered as the test of political orthodoxy. I am aware, sir, there has since been a considerable change in the times, and that, in this change, men have not been able to preserve a uniformity of political visage. But, if his principles were then founded in truth and political propriety, they are now equally worthy of being adopted in practice. Such is certainly my opinion of them, and, therefore, I shall not relinquish them. In his inaugural speech, among other principles advanced by him, are the following: "A well-disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority; economy in the public expense, that labor may be lightly burdened; the honest payment of our debts, and sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce, as its handmaid;" (the word manufactures is not to be found in the sentence—should it hereafter creep in, I hope it will be understood to be an interpolation,) "the diffusion of information, and the arraignment of all abuses at the bar of the public reason; freedom of religion—freedom of the press—and freedom of persons under the protection of the habeas corpus; and trial by juries impartially selected."

These principles form the bright constellation which has gone before us and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation. The wisdom of our sages and blood of our heroes have been devoted to their attainment; they should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civic institutions, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or of alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps, and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety. How beautiful the style—how much more beautiful the principles! It would be a speculation not entirely fruitless to compare our present political course with that of the administration just previous to the delivery of this speech, and test its correctness by the "touchstone" of these principles. Then an army in time of profound peace was deemed proper—so it is now. Then an expensive navy was to be created and supported—so it is now. Then a large debt was not considered a national curse—nor is it now. Then a latitudinous construction of the constitution was the fashionable doctrine—so it is now, by more than one solemn vote of this House. Then a sedition law was both proper and constitutional.* In another branch of the Legislature they have lately said it was not unconstitutional. The comparison might be urged much farther, but I will not pursue it.

In his first Message to Congress, Mr. Jefferson speaks the following language:

“War, indeed, and untoward events, may change this prospect of things, and call for expenses which the imports could not meet. But, sound principles will not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow-citizens to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not, perhaps, happen, but from the temptations offered by that treasure.

“These views, however, of reducing our burdens, are formed on the expectation that a sensible, and at the same time a salutary reduction, may take place in our habitual expenditures. For this purpose those of the Civil Government, the Army, and Navy, will need revision. When we consider that this Government is charged with the external and mutual relations only of these States; that the States themselves have the principal care of our persons, our property, and our reputation, constituting the great field of human concerns, we may well doubt whether our organization is not too complicated, too expensive; whether officers and offices have not been multiplied unnecessarily, and sometimes injuriously to the service they were meant to promote.”

I beg pardon of the committee for having detained them so long by reading these extracts. But really they are so applicable to the present situation of the nation, that they seem to be addressed to us with equal propriety as to the Congress for whom they were intended. Yes, sir, if a system of economy were not recommended to us by its evident propriety, under the most favorable circumstances, we are now driven to its adoption by the embarrassments by which we are surrounded. What is our present condition? What is the state of the nation?

We have an army, which, with its various appendages, is more numerous than it ever was before in a time of peace.

We have a navy, the force and expense of which have almost quadrupled in ten years.

We have a pension list, whose rapid growth and extended length should affright us.

We have a civil list of constantly increasing expense.

We have a national debt of $90,000,000, which, to say the least of it, is not diminishing, and the interest upon which requires more than one-fourth of the estimated receipts into the Treasury for the present year.

* The Senate refused to refund to Matthew Lyon a fine imposed on him under the Sedition law.

And, to crown the whole, for the last and the present year, the annual revenue calculated to be received, by official reports submitted to our inspection, is insufficient to support these establishments, by millions of dollars.

However coolly some may affect to view this state of things, to me it presents a subject of the most lively interest. It is, at least, sufficiently gloomy to urge us to a review of our policy, and to correct its errors, if any there are. This is a duty which the nation expects us to perform, and let us not shrink from the task.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15.

Missouri—Her Anomalous Position.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, read from his seat the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether there be at this time existing, and in force, in Missouri, any legal tribunals or tribunal, derived from the authority of the United States, invested with competent jurisdiction and powers for the examination and determination of cases of controversy which have arisen, or may arise therein, under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, or controversies to which the United States are or may become a party; and if there be no such tribunals or tribunal, then to report to this House the provisions and measures which, in their opinion, may be necessary to be adopted by Congress, for causing the authority of the Government and laws of the United States to be respected, and for assuring protection to the property and other rights of the United States, and of their citizens, within Missouri.

Before forwarding the motion to the Chair, Mr. A. stated the motives which induced him to offer it. Whatever might be the situation of Missouri with respect to this Government, the propriety remained the same of instituting the inquiry he proposed, and of adopting the resolution. He must be candid enough to state, however, that to him it appeared that Missouri stood entirely disconnected from any legal or political relation with this Government. With our own hands, said Mr. A., we have cut all the moorings which attached her to it, and she floats entirely liberated and at large. She stood formerly in the relation of a Territory to the United States; she had proposed to assume the new relation of a State of the Union. This House had refused her permission to do so, and, Mr. A. said, she stands discharged from all relation to the Union. It was vain to tell him that Missouri was a Territory. Such an assertion was disproved by the fact, known to every one, that she had discarded every attribute of that character. The concession which Congress made to Missouri at the last session, Mr. A. said, consisted of two parts: the permission to depart from the existing relations of a Territory, and the permission to assume, under certain conditions, the relations of a member of the Confederacy. She must have departed from the relation of a Territory before she could have availed herself of the second part of the concession to her. What is it that Congress can admit into the Union? Not a Territory, but a State. Missouri was therefore obliged to cease to be a Territory before she could be in a condition to claim admission into the Union; and she became a State. Not only, then, in point of fact, but in legal acceptance, Missouri is no longer a Territory.

Mr. A. said he was not intimating, nor would he be understood as intimating, that the people of Missouri wished to be permanently disconnected from the Union. He was assured she was attached to the Union by feelings generated by her descent from it, and by a true reverence for the principles of its institutions. Nor did he say that she had shown any disposition to throw off the yoke of allegiance to the Union; it was this House which had itself cut loose the harness, and thrown away the reins. Mr. A. went on to say, that, if Congress could act at all at present with reference to Missouri, such was now her condition, that it could not act by law, but must act by force. The authority of the Union might hang over her, but there was no legal modes by which it could be exercised. All its ordinary and regular conductors were broken off. With regard to Missouri, Mr. A. said the citizens of the United States had individual rights, which it was the duty of Congress to secure. Many of them, for example, had received donations of land in that Territory, in requital of their services, of their blood, and of the glory they had acquired for their country. Congress were bound, by the most sacred of all obligations, to insure protection to those rights. The question, therefore, which he wished to present to the consideration of gentlemen was this: Where are the tribunals and methods by which these and other rights can be protected—where the channels by which the authority of the Government can be enforced? No man could say that there existed such tribunals or channels for the enforcement of our authority. My proposition, said Mr. A., is not presented because of any peculiar situation of Missouri, but because of the ambiguity of it—because no man can say what it is. Suppose, he said, that he was right in his opinion of the condition of Missouri; every one would say that an inquiry ought to be instituted with the view to establish some bonds of relation between Missouri and this Government. But, suppose that he were mistaken on this point; the inquiry would yet be proper, in order to remove the doubts which he and others entertained. In every view in which he considered the subject, he thought the inquiry ought to take place. He did not propose that this inquiry should be committed to himself, or to those who agreed with him in opinion, but he proposed to refer it to a standing committee of the House, which might reasonably be supposed to be an impartial tribunal, and at the head of which (Mr. SERGEANT) was one of the most prominent of those who differed from him in opinion on this topic.

Mr. A. said he was far from supposing that there would be any opposition to this proposition; but, if there were, he would say to the opponents of it, that they had taken upon themselves to direct the course of our legislation on this subject, and, if they had not foundered, they had at least brought us into the neighborhood of shoals and breakers. If gentlemen who constitute the late majority of this House were to refuse to agree to the proposed inquiry, he would then say, what he was now very far from saying, that they were afraid to pursue the principle of their own vote in its operation, and to stand confronted with the results.

The resolution having been read from the Chair—

Mr. SERGEANT suggested that the resolution was one of such a description as ought not to be acted upon without affording an opportunity to every member of the House to vote upon it. He therefore moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. CORB said it was a very unusual course to move to lay on the table a resolve proposing inquiry merely. It would seem almost a matter of course to agree to such a resolution moved by any gentleman. When the committee should report would be the time for deciding any principle involved in this proposition.

Mr. SERGEANT said, if this were a simple proposition for inquiry, in the ordinary shape of such propositions, there would be no force in the remark of the gentleman from Georgia. But, Mr. S. said, he thought it perfectly plain and obvious that this resolution assumed, as the groundwork of it, certain opinions in regard to Missouri, about which the sentiments of the members of this House had already been more or less expressed. It was taken for granted, no doubt, by the mover, and his proposition assumed it as a fact, that, in consequence of something which has happened, a change has been produced in the position of Missouri in regard to the Union, which renders it necessary that there should be new legislation in regard to it; and it of course took for granted what had been a source of litigation certainly, and what a large portion of this House will not accede to. If a question existed whether the relation of Missouri to the Union be thus changed, it was a question which ought to be discussed and decided in this House, before a committee was charged with it in any shape. The inquiry whether the relation of Missouri to the Union be in reality changed, must precede the adoption of a resolution such as this is, which assumes that a new code of laws is necessary for its government. He thought this House ought not at once, without notice, to go into the discussion of the question whether Missouri has or has not changed her condition. So strongly impressed was he with this opinion, that he had moved to lay the resolution on the table; and, if the discussion were pressed at this time, he should certainly vote against the resolution.

Missouri—Her Anomalous Position.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. LOWMEDE said he had hoped the resolution would have appeared to the House to be such a one as did not involve any of the questions which had been suggested. As, however, time was desired, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would consent to its lying on the table until to-morrow. But assuredly, Mr. L. said, it did not involve any such question as had been supposed. It proposes an inquiry into the matter of fact, whether there now exists a tribunal in Missouri adequate to particular objects. It proceeds on the supposition that every party in the House is desirous to know the actual relation which Missouri bears to the Union—to decide whether it be necessary to legislate or not to legislate on the subject; not only to ascertain what is the relation between Missouri and the Union, but what it may be proper to do, if any thing, in consequence of the fact thus to be ascertained. Whilst, however, Mr. L. said, he believed that resolutions of inquiry ought in general to be assented to without objection, and whilst he believed this to be of that character merely, yet if, from the terms of the resolution, it should appear to any member, and most of all it appeared to a member of the committee to whom it was proposed to assign the consideration of the subject, that it involved an important principle, he admitted it would be proper to give time for the consideration of it.

Mr. GEORGE, of New York, said, that though he presumed he entertained, with respect to the answer which ought to be given to this resolution, the same opinion as the gentleman at the head of the Judiciary Committee, he was ready to act upon it without delay. If he believed that it took any thing for granted, particularly if he believed that it took for granted that there was no legal tribunal by which such questions could be settled, he should certainly vote for laying it on the table, and finally against the resolution. But, as he was of a different opinion, he should vote for the resolution, and against laying it on the table. It would be well recollected, he said, that during the discussion of the subject at the present session, the position had been taken that Missouri was a State, and that, though admitted into the Union, she was an independent State. This position was taken by a gentleman whose weight of character and talents gave a color to whatever he should advance. For his part, Mr. G. said, when the question on the admission of Missouri was before the House, he had made up his mind on the subject of this resolution. He hoped that, if the resolution passed, the true answer would be given, and he was therefore in favor of the resolution.

Mr. FLOYD said it was a very unusual thing for the House to hesitate in respect to motions for inquiry. He was glad to find that the gentleman from New York thought so clearly on the subject. As this was an important subject, he wished to record his opinion on the postponement, and therefore required that the question should be decided by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered—

Mr. AROHER, of Virginia, said, if the wish of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for delay were pressed, though it was so unusual a course, he should be bound, by considerations of courtesy, to accede to the motion now before the House. He was rather disposed, however, to take the same view of this matter as had been taken by the gentleman from New York, that every one, before he gave a vote against the admission of Missouri, must have foreseen the necessity for a resolution and inquiry of this sort. Every member of the majority of the House must have known that the question must have come upon him in some shape or other, and must therefore have been prepared for it. With regard to the character of this proposition, it was not novel. If the facts should be ascertained as the gentleman from New York supposed, there would be no occasion for any expression of the opinion of the Judiciary Committee as to what ought to be done, &c.

Mr. FULLER made a few remarks to the effect that he did not consider it of much importance whether the resolution passed to-day or to-morrow; that he had examined it, and had no great objection to it; but, only to save the needless trouble of calling the yeas and nays, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would withdraw his objection to laying it on the table.

Mr. AROHER said he had already done so, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania pressed it, though such a course was not usual, nor in his opinion necessary in this case.

Mr. SERGEANT said that the gentlemen from South Carolina and Virginia had concurred in considering this resolution as proposing an inquiry into a matter of fact. Mr. S. said, if he understood this resolution at all, it proposed an inquiry, not into a matter of fact, but a matter of law, and that matter of law involving a point on which there was known to be more or less difference of opinion in this House. The question, whether there now exists a tribunal in Missouri, was not a question of fact, but it was a question of law. It was not a question whether tribunals heretofore have existed, but whether they do now exist. There was an objection to referring to a committee an inquiry into a matter of law, which is not to be tested by evidence, &c., but must depend upon opinion, which every member in his place would form as well as a committee, whose report on such a subject would only leave the question where it stood before. With respect to what is to be done in relation to Missouri, it must be perfectly obvious that this cannot be ascertained until the sense of the House is ascertained on the previous question; and the clear course would be to ascertain the sense of the House, and then send the matter to a committee to report such bills as should be calculated to give effect to it. He did not know that, on further examination, the resolution might be liable to the objection he now felt to it; but he wished time to decide that point.

from the relation of a Territory before she could have availed herself of the second part of the concession to her. What is it that Congress can admit into the Union? Not a Territory, but a State. Missouri was therefore obliged to cease to be a Territory before she could be in a condition to claim admission into the Union; and she became a State. Not only, then, in point of fact, but in legal acceptation, Missouri is no longer a Territory.

Mr. A. said he was not intimating, nor would he be understood as intimating, that the people of Missouri wished to be permanently disconnected from the Union. He was assured she was attached to the Union by feelings generated by her descent from it, and by a true reverence for the principles of its institutions. Nor did he say that she had shown any disposition to throw off the yoke of allegiance to the Union; it was this House which had itself out loose the harness, and thrown away the reins. Mr. A. went on to say, that, if Congress could act at all at present with reference to Missouri, such was now her condition, that it could not act by law, but must act by force. The authority of the Union might hang over her, but there was no legal modes by which it could be exercised. All its ordinary and regular conductors were broken off. With regard to Missouri, Mr. A. said the citizens of the United States had individual rights, which it was the duty of Congress to secure. Many of them, for example, had received donations of land in that Territory, in requital of their services, of their blood, and of the glory they had acquired for their country. Congress were bound, by the most sacred of all obligations, to insure protection to those rights. The question, therefore, which he wished to present to the consideration of gentlemen was this: Where are the tribunals and methods by which these and other rights can be protected—where the channels by which the authority of the Government can be enforced? No man could say that there existed such tribunals or channels for the enforcement of our authority. My proposition, said Mr. A., is not presented because of any peculiar situation of Missouri, but because of the ambiguity of it—because no man can say what it is. Suppose, he said, that he was right in his opinion of the condition of Missouri; every one would say that an inquiry ought to be instituted with the view to establish some bonds of relation between Missouri and this Government. But, suppose that he were mistaken on this point; the inquiry would yet be proper, in order to remove the doubts which he and others entertained. In every view in which he considered the subject, he thought the inquiry ought to take place. He did not propose that this inquiry should be committed to himself, or to those who agreed with him in opinion, but he proposed to refer it to a standing committee of the House, which might reasonably be supposed to be an impartial tribunal, and at the head of which (Mr. SERGEANT) was one of the most prominent of those who differed from him in opinion on this topic.

Mr. A. said he was far from supposing that there would be any opposition to this proposition; but, if there were, he would say to the opponents of it, that they had taken upon themselves to direct the course of our legislation on this subject, and, if they had not foundered, they had at least brought us into the neighborhood of shoals and breakers. If gentlemen who constitute the late majority of this House were to refuse to agree to the proposed inquiry, he would then say, what he was now very far from saying, that they were afraid to pursue the principle of their own vote in its operation, and to stand confronted with the results.

The resolution having been read from the Chair—

Mr. SERGEANT suggested that the resolution was one of such a description as ought not to be acted upon without affording an opportunity to every member of the House to vote upon it. He therefore moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. COBB said it was a very unusual course to move to lay on the table a resolve proposing inquiry merely. It would seem almost a matter of course to agree to such a resolution moved by any gentleman. When the committee should report would be the time for deciding any principle involved in this proposition.

Mr. SERGEANT said, if this were a simple proposition for inquiry, in the ordinary shape of such propositions, there would be no force in the remark of the gentleman from Georgia. But, Mr. S. said, he thought it perfectly plain and obvious that this resolution assumed, as the groundwork of it, certain opinions in regard to Missouri, about which the sentiments of the members of this House had already been more or less expressed. It was taken for granted, no doubt, by the mover, and his proposition assumed it as a fact, that, in consequence of something which has happened, a change has been produced in the position of Missouri in regard to the Union, which renders it necessary that there should be new legislation in regard to it; and it of course took for granted what had been a source of litigation certainly, and what a large portion of this House will not accede to. If a question existed whether the relation of Missouri to the Union be thus changed, it was a question which ought to be discussed and decided in this House, before a committee was charged with it in any shape. The inquiry whether the relation of Missouri to the Union be in reality changed, must precede the adoption of a resolution such as this is, which assumes that a new code of laws is necessary for its government. He thought this House ought not at once, without notice, to go into the discussion of the question whether Missouri has or has not changed her condition. So strongly impressed was he with this opinion, that he had moved to lay the resolution on the table; and, if the discussion were pressed at this time, he should certainly vote against the resolution.

Missouri—Her Anomalous Position.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. LOWNDES said he had hoped the resolution would have appeared to the House to be such a one as did not involve any of the questions which had been suggested. As, however, time was desired, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would consent to its lying on the table until to-morrow. But assuredly, Mr. L. said, it did not involve any such question as had been supposed. It proposes an inquiry into the matter of fact, whether there now exists a tribunal in Missouri adequate to particular objects. It proceeds on the supposition that every party in the House is desirous to know the actual relation which Missouri bears to the Union—to decide whether it be necessary to legislate or not to legislate on the subject; not only to ascertain what is the relation between Missouri and the Union, but what it may be proper to do, if any thing, in consequence of the fact thus to be ascertained. Whilst, however, Mr. L. said, he believed that resolutions of inquiry ought in general to be assented to without objection, and whilst he believed this to be of that character merely, yet if, from the terms of the resolution, it should appear to any member, and most of all it appeared to a member of the committee to whom it was proposed to assign the consideration of the subject, that it involved an important principle, he admitted it would be proper to give time for the consideration of it.

Mr. GROES, of New York, said, that though he presumed he entertained, with respect to the answer which ought to be given to this resolution, the same opinion as the gentleman at the head of the Judiciary Committee, he was ready to act upon it without delay. If he believed that it took any thing for granted, particularly if he believed that it took for granted that there was no legal tribunal by which such questions could be settled, he should certainly vote for laying it on the table, and finally against the resolution. But, as he was of a different opinion, he should vote for the resolution, and against laying it on the table. It would be well recollected, he said, that during the discussion of the subject at the present session, the position had been taken that Missouri was a State, and that, though admitted into the Union, she was an independent State. This position was taken by a gentleman whose weight of character and talents gave a color to whatever he should advance. He hoped that, if the resolution passed, the true answer would be given, and he was therefore in favor of the resolution.

Mr. FLOYD said it was a very unusual thing for the House to hesitate in respect to motions for inquiry. He was glad to find that the gentleman from New York thought so clearly on the subject. As this was an important subject, he wished to record his opinion on the postponement, and therefore required that the question should be decided by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays having been ordered—

Mr. AROHER, of Virginia, said, if the wish of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for delay were pressed, though it was so unusual a course, he should be bound, by considerations of courtesy, to accede to the motion now before the House. He was rather disposed, however, to take the same view of this matter as had been taken by the gentleman from New York, that every one, before he gave a vote against the admission of Missouri, must have foreseen the necessity for a resolution and inquiry of this sort. Every member of the majority of the House must have known that the question must have come upon him in some shape or other, and must therefore have been prepared for it. With regard to the character of this proposition, it was not novel. If the facts should be ascertained as the gentleman from New York supposed, there would be no occasion for any expression of the opinion of the Judiciary Committee as to what ought to be done, &c.

Mr. FULLER made a few remarks to the effect that he did not consider it of much importance whether the resolution passed to-day or to-morrow; that he had examined it, and had no great objection to it; but, only to save the needless trouble of calling the yeas and nays, he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would withdraw his objection to laying it on the table.

Mr. AROHER said he had already done so, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania pressed it, though such a course was not usual, nor in his opinion necessary in this case.

Mr. SERGEANT said that the gentlemen from South Carolina and Virginia had concurred in considering this resolution as proposing an inquiry into a matter of fact. Mr. S. said, if he understood this resolution at all, it proposed an inquiry, not into a matter of fact, but a matter of law, and that matter of law involving a point on which there was known to be more or less difference of opinion in this House. The question, whether there now exists a tribunal in Missouri, was not a question of fact, but it was a question of law. It was not a question whether tribunals heretofore have existed, but whether they do now exist. There was an objection to referring to a committee an inquiry into a matter of law, which is not to be tested by evidence, &c., but must depend upon opinion, which every member in his place would form as well as a committee, whose report on such a subject would only leave the question where it stood before. He did not know that, on further examination, the resolution might be liable to the objection he now felt to it; but he wished time to decide that point.

Mr. STORRS wished the resolution to lie on the table, for this reason—that he wished gentlemen to have time to obtain the necessary information to enable them to act on the subject. He had himself no information whatever which went to show that Missouri was not in the same situation now that she had been for the few years past, except that her convention had met, and agreed upon a form for her future government. He did not say that he had not heard, out of doors, that she had elected a Governor, Legislature, &c. But he did not wish to proceed to the consideration of this resolution until the information was given to him officially, on which he was to act. A resolution addressed to the Executive, who was charged with the execution of the laws of the United States, would, he supposed, elicit the necessary information. For aught we know officially, said Mr. S., the officers of the United States in that Territory may be at this moment in the full discharge of all their functions. He could not consent to assume it as a fact, that the authority of the United States in Missouri was in full operation. He could not assume it as a fact, that the President has failed in his duty of appointing a Governor and other officers, in pursuance of the laws. By entertaining this inquiry, said Mr. S., the House would assume, in some degree, the duties of the Executive, and bring us in collision with that department. For his part, he said, he could not consent that this House should thus take upon itself the responsibility which belonged to another department of the Government. Whenever the authority of the United States in Missouri was set at defiance, or whenever, from any cause whatever, the authority of the United States in that Territory should be at an end, he presumed Congress would receive from the Executive department information of it. Until such information was received, he could not agree to consider the subject. When it did come, he reserved to himself to decide what course ought to be taken. But the proper course for gentlemen at the present time appeared to him to be, to call on the Executive to inform the House whether the laws of the United States were at present duly executed in Missouri, &c. If the President should say, in reply, that the laws are not executed, and our authority not in existence, it would then be time enough to refer the subject to a committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL said the time might come, during the present session, when he should not have the smallest objection to this resolution; but, he must be allowed to state, that he did not think the present was the proper time. It was well understood that there were several projects on foot for the admission of Missouri into the Union. When all these failed, he said, he should be as ready as any gentleman to assent to this resolution. If gentlemen were prepared to say that no further efforts would be made to accomplish that object, he was ready to vote for the resolution now. But, he said, in every quarter of the country, it is anticipated that the discussion will be revived on the resolution from the Senate: in the paper from Richmond received to-day, there were two or three letters from Washington to that effect. The understanding was, he believed, that perhaps next week the resolution on the table of the Clerk might be called up and decided on. If every effort should fail for the admission of Missouri, it would be proper to adopt such a resolution as this, but, in his opinion, not till then.

Mr. FOOT rose to show, by example, that the motion to lay this resolution on the table was not unprecedented. He agreed fully in opinion with the gentleman from Ohio, that the resolution ought to be laid on the table, and should not agree to take it up again until the resolution from the Senate should have been finally acted on.

Mr. LOWNDES said, a very little reflection would satisfy any one that it was not necessary to postpone this resolution until the other question referred to should be decided. He submitted to the House the consideration, that the report of the committee under this resolution might have considerable influence on the question to be decided on the proposition from the Senate. It appeared to him, he had no hesitation in saying, that no man could vote on the various propositions which had been alluded to, unless his mind was made up on the topics presented by the resolution now before the House. Whilst up, Mr. L. adverted to what had fallen from his friend from New York, who opposed the resolution because we know nothing officially of any change in the actual condition of Missouri. If we knew nothing on that subject, said Mr. L., it would be reason enough for inquiry that there is out-of-door conversation on the subject. We must not act on such information, but was it ever before heard that we must not inquire into any matter because it has been spoken of out-of-doors only? The practice of every day was different. But, if official information was necessary, the House had that information. It had information, from the constitution presented by Missouri, that, at a certain time, the authority of the United States was to determine, and that of a new State to commence. He did not here speak of the question of right in regard to the people of Missouri, but of the question of fact. It was true that there was a question of fact presented by this resolution, but it was also true that there was a question of law, and nothing was more usual than, in regard to questions of law, to refer them to the committee of this House consisting of legal men, constituted to consider such questions, being the committee to which it was proposed to refer this resolution.

Mr. STORRS explained, that he had reserved the question of the expediency of an inquiry into this matter. His objection to acting on the subject now was, that it appeared to him the proper course would be, first to call on the Executive.

Mr. ARCHER said he acceded to the proposed postponement, only because, as the mover of the resolution, he felt bound to do so. If not thus obliged, he should have voted against postponement. The objections of the gentleman to the resolution, he said, were not consistent—one gentleman opposed it because it proposed an inquiry into facts; another because it proposed an inquiry into a matter of law. Both objections could not be sound. He believed, he said, in conclusion, that the responses to this resolution would be very easy indeed; and he must be allowed to indulge the remark, that, in the reluctance of gentlemen to act on the subject, he found a confirmation of his belief that the answer could be easily given.

The question on laying the resolution on the table was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 91 votes to 58, as follows:

A new member, to wit, from the State of Pennsylvania, DANIEL UDEN, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Joseph Heister, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 9.

Missouri—Anomalous Condition.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 4th instant, in relation to the judicial condition of the Territory of Missouri.

On the question being taken, "Will the House now consider the said resolution?" it was determined in the negative—yeas 66, nays 78.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11.

Limitation of the Naval Force, and Inquiry into Naval Pensions.

Mr. COBB submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of limiting by law the number of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to be annually employed in the service of the United States; and also into the expediency of reducing the number now in actual service.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the pensions now allowed under the acts of Congress, to certain persons in the land and naval service of the United States, on continental establishment, during the Revolutionary war; [so that hereafter the pension allowed to each officer shall be twelve dollars per month, and to the privates five dollars per month.]

The first of these resolutions was agreed to without a division.

The second met with great objection, in consequence of which Mr. COBB modified it so as to make the inquiry general, by erasing the words in brackets.

On the resolution thus modified, there were yeas 53, nays 59. So the resolution was not agreed to.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 12.

Amendment of the Journal—Missouri Question.

The first entry in the Journal of yesterday was read, in the following words:

"Mr. Lowndes presented three memorials of the Senate and House of Representatives of Missouri—one praying that the purchasers of public lands may be permitted to apply the payments already made to such of their entries as the said payments will cover, at two dollars per acre, relinquishing the residue of the land to the United States—another praying that persons entitled to the right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands, may be permitted to make payment for said lands within the times heretofore prescribed by law, or prompt payment, at the option of the persons holding such pre-emption right—the other, praying that the right of pre-emption in the purchase of public lands may be extended to certain settlers therein described; which memorials were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands."

Mr. ROBERTSON, conceiving that Missouri had, in this entry, been styled a Territory, objected to her being so styled; but, on examination, finding it was not so, waived a motion he was about to have made to amend it.

Mr. COBB, however, adverting to the terms of the memorial, said, that it appeared to be from the Senate and House of Representatives of "the State of" Missouri, though not so stated in the Journal. Mr. C. moved to amend the Journal in this particular, by inserting the words "the State of," before the word "Missouri."

When the reporter entered the Hall, Mr. BARBOUR was up, arguing in favor of an amendment, which would make the Journal conform to the fact, which, he contended, it did not as it now stood.

Mr. ANDERSON expressed his opinion that the Journal, as it stood, expressed truly the fact of a memorial being presented from Missouri. Though it might have been more distinctly stated, yet the omission of the words proposed to be inserted did not take from Missouri the character of a State, it being a frequent mode of expression in regard to other States, to speak of them without the prefix of "the State of." Mr. A. also suggested a wish that his friends should not press the objection they had set up, by way of obtaining a decision of the Missouri question, on a motion to amend the Journal.

Mr. ROBERTSON made some remarks in favor of the motion. The memorials, he said, professed to be from the Legislature of the State of Missouri. If Missouri had not been considered as a State, of course the memorials in that shape would not have been received. Having been received as memorials from the State, why should not the fact be correctly stated on the Journal?

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, was in favor of the proposed amendment, on the general ground that, if it took place, the Journal would correspond more precisely with the fact than in its present shape.

Mr. WARFIELD said, that a decision in favor of the proposed amendment would not express the sense of the House, either in one way or the other. Conceiving that the entry on the Journal, as it now stood, was an entry of that description which would explain sufficiently what was the nature of the memorial, he was opposed to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, proposed, in order to obviate the difficulty, to insert in the Journal the words "purporting to be," a memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, &c.

Mr. COOK was opposed to the proposed amendment. If made, he said, it would decide no principle. If Missouri was not a State, calling her so would not make her so. It would be an equally appropriate amendment to style her the Republic of Missouri, as her convention had styled her in the preamble to the constitution which had been formed for her government, &c.

Mr. COBB, in reply to a wish which had been expressed, that he would withdraw his motion, said that he could not consent to do it. He wished the Journal to conform, as it ought, to the fact. Three memorials had been presented from a body, organized under a constitution of government, formed by virtue of a law of Congress authorizing the people of Missouri to form a State government. In that shape having been presented, in that and in no other shape could the memorials have been received; and the Journal ought to state the fact as it occurred.

Mr. BALDWIN was sorry, he said, that any discussion should have arisen as to the description of any paper presented to the House in the shape of a memorial. It had been the uniform practice, in making up the Journal, to give to memorialists the name which they themselves assumed. By way of illustration, he referred to the memorial presented at the present session from persons styling themselves the National Institution for the protection of domestic industry, from the delegates of agricultural societies, from the delegates from various interests at Philadelphia, &c., all of which, without investigating the merits of the pretensions of the respective memorialists, had been announced in the Journal in their own language. We pay that respect to petitioners, said Mr. B., that we designate them as they choose to designate themselves. The announcement on the Journal of their designations, was, properly, a mere recital of what they chose to call themselves. If the principle were now to be introduced, that every person or association of persons were to be held to prove that they really are what they profess to be, it would involve the House in endless difficulties. He was therefore in favor of the amendment proposed by Mr. COBB.

Mr. RANDOLPH, after a preliminary remark or two, not distinctly heard from the pressing of members around him, said that he rose to introduce a precedent applicable to this occasion, which, he trusted, would be received with all the respect due to so high and transcendental authority. The conduct, said he, which this Government has to this instant pursued towards the State of Missouri, is sanctioned by the conduct which was pursued towards these States when colonies, by His Britannic Majesty and his faithful Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled. What was their language after our independence was declared? What was their conduct which led to the long and bloody war which terminated in the acknowledgment of our independence? The very language which we are holding, and the very conduct we are pursuing towards Missouri. The parallel, said Mr. R., runs on all fours. In our extreme tenderness for the rights and privileges of the colored citizens, we have already brought into jeopardy the rights and privileges of our white fellow-citizens as well as of those colored ones who are the objects of our solicitude. Mr. R. said he had intended to abstain, as he had until now abstained, from taking any part or lot in this affair. But when he saw the Congress of the United States pursuing a course of conduct in servile imitation of the British Parliament, he could no longer refrain. He would stake his salvation, he said, dear to him as that was, that, if the constitution of Missouri had contained an inhibition of slavery, the House would never have heard of the objection now raised to it; and, were he to engage in the discussion of it, he would take that ground. However that might be, he said, it was a more important matter that the Journals of this House should contain the truth. An honorable member behind him had uttered the sentiment, the other day, that it was proper that petitions to this House should contain the truth. It was of infinitely more importance, Mr. R. said, that the Journal should contain the truth; and he pronounced that the Journal for yesterday, in its present mutilated, mangled and garbled state, did not speak the truth. It holds out that, said he, which we know to be false. And is it a mere matter of form that we should send out to the people, as the record of our proceedings, a paper which contains, on the face of it, a palpable and atrocious falsehood?

Amendment of the Journal—Missouri Question.

Mr. LITTLE called for the reading of the memorial; it was read in part, when Mr. L. expressed himself satisfied, and said he was sorry the Chair had departed from the uniform practice and regular rule in recording the proceedings of the House.

Mr. RHEA was in favor of the proposed amendment. It was the duty of the House, he thought, to see that facts were correctly stated on the Journal. This House had, in its public acts, styled Missouri a State; and why should she not be so called on the Journal? He read the caption of one of the memorials to show that it purported to be from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Missouri, in General Assembly, &c. The Journal, he said, ought to describe the memorial as it really was.

The question on Mr. Cobb's motion was then taken—yeas 76, and nays 76.

The yeas and nays being equal in number, the SPEAKER declared his vote with the yeas. So Mr. COBB's motion was rejected.

On this result being declared—

Mr. PARKER, of Virginia, rose. The vote which had just been taken, he said, was, with a few exceptions, of that geographical character which had marked the whole proceedings in regard to Missouri. For his own part, he said, he did not at first consider this question as involving any matter of principle; but, being a new member, he had referred to the Journal, and he found that, in all cases of memorials from States, they have been stated to be from States; and that the same uniformity of practice prevailed as to memorials from Territorial legislatures. He saw no reason why a deviation from this uniformity of practice should have occurred in this particular instance of Missouri, and not in any other. There was, he said, something in it—he did not say what it was—but he was for consistency, at all events, in the records of the Congress of the Union. He was for the records of this House speaking, in the words of the law, the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Under this impression, as the House had refused to acknowledge Missouri to be a State, and as she must be a territory, if she be not a State, he moved to insert in the Journal, before the word "Missouri," the words "the Territory of."

Mr. BRUSH objected to this amendment, for reasons which he assigned at length. He was of opinion that Missouri was constitutionally and politically a State, and not a territory. But, as it was the custom of this Government to give to its territories a first and second grade of government, preparatory to their assuming the rank of a State of the Union, he did not see why it could not give to them a third, fourth, or fifth grade of government. He considered Missouri to be in a grade between territorial dependence and the condition of a member of the Union; which idea he illustrated by reference to the situation of the State of Vermont, before she adopted the Federal Constitution.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, apprehended that this proposition would operate as a trap question, producing embarrassment without benefit, and expressed his hope that the mover would withdraw it.

Mr. LIVERMORE made a few remarks to this effect: that the House ought to regard the substance and not the shadow; that the name was of no importance to the actual condition of Missouri. When the question should present itself in a proper form, he was ready to decide it; but it could not be affected, either in one way or the other, by the appellation which should be given to Missouri on the Journal of this House.

Mr. MEROER was gratified that this motion had been made. As this was the commencement of our intercourse with the people of Missouri, he was desirous that every step of it should be marked. Mr. M. made some further remarks, in the course of which he expressed his regret that the course of the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. Cook,) had been, in his view, disrespectful to Missouri.

Mr. Cook disclaimed any intention to speak disrespectfully of the people of Missouri, whom, on the contrary, he said, he held in high respect; and he sincerely hoped that Missouri would be admitted into the Union, and soon.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, said, that, on inspecting the Journal, it appeared that the original entry in it corresponded with the caption of the memorial, in which the word State is employed. As the Journal now reads, moreover, in the part speaking of the public lands, the words "within the said State" had been erased in two instances, to avoid the word State, which made the whole entry absurd, inasmuch as the memorial is made to apply not to purchasers of land "within the said State," which words were erased, but to purchasers of land throughout the United States. Mr. B. said he would therefore ask whether the Clerk had undertaken to make these alterations.

The SPEAKER then stated from the chair, that it was the practice that the Journal should be written by the Clerk. The rules of the House made it the duty of the Speaker to "examine and correct the Journal before it is read." If, being so examined and corrected by the Speaker, it should not, in the opinion of any member, be correct, it was competent for any member to move to amend it, and for the House, should such be its pleasure, to direct it to be amended. In the present instance, the presiding officer had thought proper so to correct the Journal, as that it should not be taken either to affirm or deny that Missouri was a State, that being a question on which the House was greatly divided in opinion.

Mr. TRIMBLE requested the Clerk to state the date of the petition, in order to show that the petition was not posterior to the decision of this House against declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union, and that therefore Missouri had not assumed a name which had been denied to her by Congress. Mr. T. expressed his satisfaction that Mr. Cook had explained his meaning; having believed, until he had made it, that his observations in regard to Missouri had been ironically intended. Mr. T. did not by any means consider the present motion as a trap, but as a serious proposition, which gentlemen would not find it easy to dispose of. There were members of this House who believed that Missouri was yet a territory. Mr. T. said he was not one of them; but those who did believe so, would of course vote for the resolution. He was obliged, he said, to the gentleman from Virginia, for having suggested what he had done in regard to the parallel between the proceedings of the British Parliament during our Revolution, and those of the present Congress. He did remember himself many instances in which the petitions of the people of these States were refused to be received in Parliament, because the petitioners did not correctly describe themselves. He remembered the letter of Washington was refused to be received, because it purported to come from General Washington. Had not the people of Missouri a right to baptize themselves by such name as they chose? Mr. T. said he regretted that the Chair should have thought itself under the necessity of altering the Journal. The subject, in itself not very important, had been made so by the alteration of the Journal, which alteration it seemed had been made by the Speaker. It appeared to betray an unreasonable jealousy on this subject, to say the least of it. He begged the Speaker's pardon, he said—he did not mean to say that he felt this jealousy; but, in the course which he had taken, there was an overweening caution—an appearance of a jealousy which ought not to have been betrayed towards this people. Mr. T. said he trusted gentlemen would not feel much difficulty in voting on this question. We find, he said, that the question just taken, small as it was, has drawn a line across the United States. Let the Journal stand as it ought to do. Do not tell the people of Missouri, We are so jealous of you, we are fearful of your thrusting yourself into the Union, and partaking at the sacred board and drinking of the cup of wine. Do not say to them, We are so apprehensive you will come to the communion table by the name which you give yourselves, that we will give you no name. Mr. T. said he should vote against the proposed amendment, because, in his opinion, Missouri was a State, and not a territory. Those who held the other opinion must be compelled to vote in favor of this proposition, or acknowledge that their ground was untenable.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, said, in regard to this motion, he did not, when up before, mean to insinuate that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. PARKER) had meant to set a trap for others. He might have laid a snare without designing it. For himself, Mr. E. said, he believed Missouri was a State. He feared that the motion of the gentleman might be adopted, and that the misnomer would be entered on the Journal. For no other reason had he wished the motion to be withdrawn. He should vote against the motion with pleasure, because he believed Missouri had lost her territorial character, and could not be otherwise than a State.

Mr. PARKER said he was placed in a difficult situation, by the application to him to withdraw his motion. Other friends were opposed to his withdrawing it. He had concluded to persist in it. It was not intended as a trap for any one. Had it been so intended, he did not know but that he might have found illustrious examples. It was not a question of mere form. The state of the vote just taken, proved that it was not. The question in fact, as voted upon, had been, Is Missouri a State or a territory? If she was a territory, as she had been voted not to be a State, why reject this proposition so to designate her? I say, said he, she is a State; and were I a citizen of that State, I would never, at your suggestion, strike out that clause in the constitution to which objection has been made. If I found it convenient to myself to do so, I would; but I would not do it on your recommendation, even for the important boon of being admitted in the Union. I would rather be trodden down by the armies from the North and East, and, if you could get them, from the South, than yield this point; and I avow it in the face of the world. If ever on earth a people has been maltreated, it is this people. There seemed, Mr. P. said, to be a suppression of something on that Journal; because the very words which had been stricken out of it were to be found in the caption of the memorials. Why are they suppressed? For the purpose, evidently, of implying the other way. He was not for this mode of dealing; he was for having the facts stated in plain English, that all might understand them. Mr. P. said he wanted to hear no more of precedents here—he had heard more than enough of them; but if a matter was to stand for precedent, even as to the form of the Journal, he wished it should be a precedent either one way or the other, and not a mere equivocation.

Amendment of the Journal—Missouri Question.

Mr. ROSS said he was aware that the House had involved itself in some difficulty by the reception of the petitions in the form in which they were presented, as being from a State. They ought not to have been received in that form. Missouri, Mr. R. said, was either a territory or a State. If she be a State, she is a State known to the Constitution of the United States. She is not one of the old original thirteen States. Has she ever been received into the Federal family as a State? She has not. Does she assume the character of a State without being so received? Does she tell you, We were once a territory, but we have thrown off our territorial character, and assumed that of a State without your authority? If this doctrine is to be tolerated, said Mr. R., away with your forms of territorial government at once. Let your territories at once assume the character of States. If Missouri be a State, she must be a lawful State. By what law is she made a State? It was sound orthodoxy in politics, that there cannot be a State within the territorial limits of the United States, without the authority of the Congress of the United States. Missouri was not a State by that authority, and he was perfectly ready to vote and declare his opinion that Missouri is now a territory.

Mr. RHEA referred to the act of the last session of Congress, to show that Congress had authorized the people of Missouri to form a State government, and assume such name as they might think proper. They had assumed a name accordingly, and Mr. R. said it could not be taken from them except by law. This House, then, had given them the name, which was now refused to them on the Journal. Nay, at this very session, a joint committee of the House, appointed to consider the subject, had reported a resolution, declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union. With respect to the Journal, Mr. R. said, the Speaker had a power over it analogous to that which a court has over the presentment of a jury—a power to alter it in manner or form, but not in substance. Mr. R. here required the Clerk to read the Journal, as it was before it was altered by the Speaker this morning.

The SPEAKER pronounced that it was not in order to read any Journal, as the Journal of the House, but that which had been corrected by its presiding officer.

After a few further remarks, to the same effect as the preceding, Mr. RHEA took his seat.

Mr. PLUMER said he had voted against the motion to insert the word "State," and he should vote against this, because he considered it not advisable or proper to decide incidentally a main question, and one which was much contested. To avoid affording precedents, for precedents had been already quoted from the Journal, he thought it proper to leave the Journal in its present shape, neither affirming nor denying any thing. He should, therefore, vote against the amendment now under consideration, as he had against that first proposed.

Mr. LOWMEDE rose, in consequence of a suggestion from Mr. ROSS, to say, that when he yesterday presented these memorials, he distinctly stated, in audible words, that they were from the State of Missouri. He did not mean to enter into this question; but, he said, in the anxiety to escape one difficulty, the object of one of the memorials, at least, was presented on the Journal differently from what that object was. It was necessary that the object of each petition should be stated on the Journal of the day on which it was presented. By the erasure of the words "within the State" twice, where it ought to have occurred on the Journal, the objects of the memorialists were perverted. But he did not mean to enter into the discussion, having only risen to state the fact which occurred yesterday.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, the House had decided one-half of the question respecting Missouri. They had decided what she is not, and must now say what she is. He put the question to gentlemen of the majority, whether they could, after their former votes, hazard the assertion that Missouri is not a territory, which they must do by voting against this amendment? If they did not now declare her a territory, the course they had hitherto pursued, stood condemned by their own votes, because every man knows that Missouri is either a territory or a State. He hoped, he said, that gentlemen would not shrink from the consequences of their own vote. He called upon them to stand to it. If they refused to do so, he should consider their refusal, as he did their refusal the other day to consider the resolution offered by him, as a proof that they were not willing to meet the consequences of the votes which they had given. He appealed to the pride of gentlemen to meet this question. One word more—Who are the memorialists? In what light must we consider them? In the character which they profess—in that which they assume. Can you, said Mr. A., receive a paper which these people present to you, and fashion it according to your conceptions, and not according to theirs? Must you not pursue the course, if you do not receive it as offered, of rejecting it altogether, as suggested by the gentleman from Ohio? His honorable colleague had said that the conduct of this House towards Missouri equalled the tyrannous proceedings of the British Parliament towards this country. Mr. A. said, it not only equalled, but went beyond it. If, said he, you can change the character of the memorialists, I should like to know whether you cannot likewise alter their prayer, and make it unlike the prayer they intended? And would any man say that this House could receive a petition from any quarter, and make it what it was not intended to be?

Mr. ANDERSON said his friends, he apprehended, would, in the course they were now pursuing, find themselves in the situation in which men are very apt to be when they act under the influence of passion, rather than of reason—in the wrong. It is always wrong to fight where you cannot but sustain defeat. It is always wrong for a minority to irritate a majority; and this motion could have no other effect but to irritate. It is the essence of determination that it prove something. But the vote on this motion would prove nothing. Nothing would be gained by it, and nothing would be lost. How can that be substance, which, whether lost or won, means nothing? No ingenuity could make of it any thing but a matter of words.

As to the subject of the main question, not now presented, no man could feel more anxiety than he; no man's mind was more excited, by day and by night, on that subject. By conciliation, said he, we may succeed in ultimately procuring what I consider a correct decision on it; by exasperation we are sure to fail. I deny, said he, that the vote which has just been taken, proves that Missouri is not a State. It proved nothing else but that, in the opinion of those who voted against the amendment, the description in the Journal is sufficient and intelligible. Mr. A. deprecated all attempts to exasperate the majority, as injudicious and impolitic; it was not by such a course that the object of the friends of Missouri could be attained.

Mr. BARBOUR assured the gentleman from

Kentucky, that, as far as he had, any thing to do with this subject, he was not acting under the influence of exasperation, but of an earnest wish to do what was right. If gentlemen were not disposed to express any opinion on this subject, the proper course would be to propose an indefinite postponement. But, if a direct vote were taken on the proposed amendment, no reason satisfactory to him could be assigned for voting against it, except that Missouri is not in fact a "territory." Gentlemen called it by different names; but, call it by what name they would, a memorial had been presented from two organized branches of what he called the Legislature of the State of Missouri. For what purpose? Did the Representatives of the people of that State mean to intrude into the councils of the nation in regard to all the public lands, within our almost illimitable bounds? Certainly not; and yet, by the erasure of the words "within the said State," their memorial was made to bear that construction. This observation, Mr. B. made, to show that this was not a mere dispute about words. With regard to the question before the House, he thought it one of considerable importance. If nothing had been done to the Journal, if it had followed the recital of the memorial, there would have been some plausibility in the remark that it was unimportant. But, by the alterations which had been made, a new description had been given to the memorial; and the decision of the House had the effect of expressing a determination to get rid of the description which the memorialists gave to themselves and to their memorial, &c. With regard to the precedent, Mr. B. said, if the Journal were permitted to stand in its present shape, it would afford a much stronger precedent than many which are introduced to influence the decisions of this House. In conclusion, Mr. B. made some remark, which caused the Speaker to repeat his decision, that "there is no Journal but that which is before the House as corrected by the presiding officer, and read by the Clerk."

Mr. CORB said, as he was desirous to hear the Journal read as originally written, he must appeal from the decision of the Chair on this point.

The question on the appeal having been stated from the Chair—

Mr. LOWNES expressed his regret that his friend from Georgia had made this appeal, and his hope that it would not be pressed to a question. If it were determined that the Journal should be read as first written, the principle would apply to the whole detail of composing the Journal, and thence to the minutest particulars of it, which would show that the Journal, as presented to the House in form, was the only Journal of which the House properly had cognizance, &c.

Mr. CORB withdrew his appeal.

Mr. MEXCEB was called up by what had fallen from Mr. ANDERSON. In the course which he had taken, Mr. M. said, the last sentiment of his heart was disrespect to the majority of the House. It was awful anxiety, and not passion, which he felt on this subject. Much less did he wish to draw the House into a discussion whether Missouri is a State or not, on a motion to amend the Journal. Mr. M. said he was sorry that any question had arisen involving the Chair; he thought, with the Speaker, that what had passed out of the House in regard to this Journal, ought not to be known in it, and that the corrected form of the Journal only ought to be considered as before the House. He deprecated any thing like irritation as much as any one. Nothing but a sentiment of mutual forbearance, of good-will to each other, of high respect and confidence, could lead the House to correct decisions on so difficult a subject as the main question respecting Missouri. That was, he said, a subject of great importance. If Missouri was not a State, all her present proceedings were contrary to law. If it were so, and under her laws a man was convicted of a crime, and punished with death, it was murder! Every sentence of a court was void, and every verdict of a jury. Every act of her Legislature, superseding the regular course of the laws of the United States, was treason! He implored of gentlemen to pause before they finally pronounced a decision which would be crowned with such terrible results.

JANUARY, 1821.]

Amendment of the Journal—Missouri Question.

Mr. WARFIELD said he should of course vote against this motion, on the same grounds as he had voted against the preceding one, viz: that the alleged and proposed alteration of the Journal was neither important nor material; that the alteration objected to had been made by the competent authority, and that there was nothing in it which required the interposition of this House; that, if it could be made to touch the main question with regard to the actual relation of Missouri to the Union, that was a question which it would not be proper to decide in the manner in which this question had been submitted to the House.

The question being then taken on the motion to insert the words "the territory of" before the words "Missouri," in the clause of the Journal first above recited, it was decided by yeas and nays. The yeas were Messrs. MALLARY, ROSS, STRONG, of Vermont, and UPHAM. All the other votes, 150 in number, were in the negative.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR then moved to amend the entry in the Journals by inserting, after the words "public lands," the words "in the late Territory of Missouri."

Mr. ROSS moved to amend the amendment by striking out of it the word "late."

Mr. BARBOUR showed that this motion presented precisely the same question just decided in the negative by a vote of 150 to 4. His object was merely to give a correct recital of the memorial. Suppose it were a memorial from the late Bank of the United States, and it were proposed to strike out the word "late," the House would see how essentially the fact would be varied by such an alteration, &c.

Mr. STORES, on inspecting the Journal and memorial, expressed his impression that the entry, as it stood, was not incompatible with the contents of the memorial.

Mr. WARFIELD considered this again as a mere matter of form, and thought it perfectly immaterial whether it was inserted or not, as he thought of the first proposition. As, however, the House appeared to be in no manner relieved from difficulty by the decisions already made, he moved, in order to get rid at once of any difficulty on the subject, to reconsider the vote on the first motion, which was, to insert the words "the State of," before Missouri.

The question on reconsideration having been stated—

Mr. BROWN spoke in expression of his satisfaction at the question being again presented, and in support of the principle, that, where there was an attempt to violate personal or political rights, resistance was a duty, not to be departed from for any views of conciliation.

Mr. ROSS expressed his astonishment at this motion for reconsideration, and, without accusing any one of inconsistency, said he should consider himself extremely inconsistent had he voted against the motion at first, and then moved to reconsider it.

Mr. ROBERTSON expressed his pleasure that there was again a prospect that the Journal would be made to conform to the fact, which he argued to show that it did not at present.

Mr. FOOR said, that the last vote showed that the insertion of these words would decide nothing, and need therefore not be objected to, inasmuch as only four members of the House had voted Missouri to be a territory, though so many were known to believe her to be a territory.

Mr. WARFIELD defended himself from the insinuation of inconsistency. He considered it the right of every man to change and to retract his opinions on conviction. With regard to his legislative proceedings, he said he held himself amenable to those who did him the honor of giving him a seat here, and he held himself responsible nowhere else. He assigned reasons why he had made his motion, arising from the maze of perplexing questions in which, by disagreeing to the first motion, the House seemed to be getting deeper and deeper involved.

The question on Mr. WARFIELD's motion for reconsideration of the first vote was then decided by yeas and nays—yeas 71, nays 77.

So the House refused to reconsider the first vote of to-day.

Mr. BARBOUR, who had withdrawn his motion, to make way for that of Mr. WARFIELD, now renewed it, as stated above; and

Mr. ROSS renewed his motion to amend it, by striking out the word "late." The House, he said, had just solemnly decided, the second time, that the memorials were not from the State of Missouri—yet this amendment proposed to describe it as being from the late territory, &c., meaning from the State of Missouri.

Mr. BARBOUR asked of the gentleman whether the House had not, with equal solemnity, and by a vote of 150 to 4, decided that Missouri is not a territory; and whether his amendment, if it succeeded, would not be in the teeth of that decision?

The question was then taken on Mr. Ross's motion, and negatived by a large majority.

Mr. STORES moved to amend Mr. BARBOUR's amendment, so as to read, "in the United States," instead of "in the late Territory of Missouri."

Mr. RANDOLPH in rising said, that the errors of the wisest men are not the least. The House had just refused to strike out the word "late" from the amendment under consideration, and had, of course, decided that it should be retained; so that, if the amendment of the gentleman from New York prevailed, it would read, "in the late United States!" How was it competent for the gentleman from New York to move, as a substitute for the amendment of his colleague, a recital not according to the words of the petition, but such as he wished the words of the petition had been? If the recital was to correspond with the fact, the House should reinstate the words of the memorial, the erasure of which had led to all this—he would not say what; but, if he were anywhere else, he would say—shuffling and cutting.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, made a point of order, whether the motion of Mr. STORES was not a substitute for that of Mr. BARBOUR, and therefore out of order.

The SPEAKER decided that the word "late," though the House had refused to strike it out by itself, might be stricken out in connection with other words, as now proposed. He also decided that the motion of Mr. STORES, to strike out a part, but not the whole, of Mr. BARBOUR's amendment, was not a substitute so as to bring it within the rule; illustrating it by a reference to the common practice of moving to strike out the whole of a bill, except the enacting clause, in order to introduce a bill in a different form. He, therefore, pronounced Mr. STORES's motion to be in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. STORES's motion, and decided in the negative.

During the past and following proceedings, various ineffectual attempts were made to procure an adjournment.

Mr. COOK moved, in order to get rid of this question altogether, to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, in a speech of some length, protested against the postponement. The Journals, he said, were distorted, and not made up as they ought to be, because the word Missouri occurred in them. What is Missouri? said he; is it a river? Is it a tribe of Indians? Why should we shrink from reciting her proper title on the Journal, when we find she has presented us a constitution of State government? Will we suffer it to be said, that sectional feelings have operated to prevent us from correcting our Journals, so as to make them what they ought to be? If this question was not connected with Missouri, would there be any hesitation in making the proposed amendment? Mr. J. went on to say, that he trusted the House would go on and vote, that the Journals should declare the truth. I wish, said he, the Journal to show why we are opposed to correcting the Journals, and who we are that oppose it, and not to give these questions the go-by, as now proposed.

Mr. BEUSH demanded, whether it was in order to move to postpone indefinitely a motion to amend the Journal.

The SPEAKER decided that it is in order. There were, he said, certain forms of questions prescribed by the Rules of the House, and their relative rank assigned them. It was not for the Chair, but for the House, to judge of the propriety of those questions, when proposed. Being proposed, it became his duty to propound them to the House.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, objected to this decision, and demanded whether, as a proposition to amend could not be postponed without postponing the main question, which, in the present case, was the Journal, it was in order thus to postpone the Journal?

Mr. EUSTIS suggested for consideration whether every difficulty could not be avoided by directing the whole of the memorials from Missouri to be inserted on the Journal, instead of a description of them.

The SPEAKER decided that the motion to postpone a question to amend the Journal is in order. The Journal, he said, is a subject on which no question is to be put, until a question is made by a proposition to amend it. A motion to postpone that question, therefore, it being the only question, was evidently in order.

Mr. COOK disclaimed any intention to evade the question. He had made the motion to postpone, in order to get rid of irritating and unnecessary debate. As he had failed in this object, he withdrew the motion for postponement.

The question recurring on Mr. BARBOUR's motion to amend the Journal—

Mr. ANDERSON called for the reading of the memorial, to show that the amendment was not necessary, and might be dispensed with.

Mr. CULBRETH said he had been accidentally absent this morning, on the vote to insert the word State, as applied to Missouri, and he wished he could have an opportunity to record his vote on that principle. At first he had thought that the present question would afford him that opportunity; but, during the discussion, he had examined the Journal and the memorial, and he was convinced that the amendment, if agreed to, would make the prayer of the memorial what it is not. He should therefore vote against it.

The question was taken on agreeing to Mr. BARBOUR's motion to insert "the late territory of" before the word "Missouri," and decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 79.

So the motion was rejected.

As soon as this decision was pronounced, several persons addressing the Chair at once, a motion to adjourn obtained the preference.

Before the question was put, a member inquired whether an adjournment now would preclude any amendment of the Journal of yesterday on to-morrow?

The SPEAKER decided that it would, unless a motion to amend it were the unfinished business at the time of adjournment on this day.

The question on the motion to adjourn being decided affirmatively, here ended the controversy respecting the Journal.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13.

Journal of the House—Missouri Question.

Mr. REID, of Georgia, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: The resolutions which I hold in my hand were prepared yesterday, and should have been then submitted, but for the anxiety of the House to adjourn, and the lateness of the hour. They are now presented, not with any view to promote or prolong excitement, because I believe excitement to be unfavorable to correct legislation; nor do I intend any remark which I may offer to be disrespectful to the officer chosen to preside over the deliberations of this House. Self-respect, if there were no other reason, would not permit me to pursue such a course; but I desire to mark, by an expression of the opinion of the House, an event which, were I more conversant with legislative proceedings, I would say, is the most extraordinary of its kind to be found in parliamentary annals.

The Constitution of the United States requires both Houses of Congress to keep a Journal of their proceedings, and, for the purpose of giving effect to this provision, the usage of the House and the acts of Government have made it the duty of the Clerk to keep a correct account of the daily proceedings, while, by the rules of the House, it is made the duty of the Speaker to "examine and correct the Journal" of the Clerk. But, that no error may escape unnoticed, and that the history of our transactions may be entirely faithful, the Journal of the preceding day is read daily, in the face of the House. Is this a mere ceremony, a form, which adopted without object, may be suspended without injury? It appears to me to be altogether of substance, because both the Speaker and the Clerk are mere agents in the compilation of the Journal, and, consequently, the House is entitled to the supervision of their conduct. Every member, having sworn to support the constitution, which requires the House to keep a Journal of its proceedings, is deeply interested—as much so as the obligation of an oath can make him—in the proper performance of the duties, which, in this respect, devolve upon the Clerk and the Speaker. If then an error be produced, whether by the negligence of the Clerk or the supposed corrections of the Speaker, the House surely possesses the power to apply the corrective by amending the Journal—restoring it to its original shape, or in such other manner as its wisdom may devise.

What shall be done upon the present occasion will best be known by a resort to the facts as they exist. They are these: a member presents, in his place, a memorial from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Missouri; he announces, as is his duty, the purport and the character of the petition; the document is received by the House, referred to one of its committees, and the Clerk, as he is bound to do, minutes the transaction among the occurrences of the day. The Speaker, when he comes to perform his duty, erases the words "State of," and, when the corrected Journal is presented to the House, it recites, that the member presented the memorial of Missouri. Now, the question is—has the Speaker performed his duty, under the rule of the House, or has he acted without the pale of the authority which that rule conveys to him? If the erasure be within the rule, there is an end of the matter, and I am trespassing unnecessarily upon your patience, and doing injustice to the Speaker. But, if the Speaker has altered without correcting your Journal, his act is void, because it is beyond his authority, and is itself an error, which demands the correction of the House. Did the Speaker, when he applied his pen to the Journal, describe the fact as it had taken place more truly than it had been described by the Clerk? No, sir. The Clerk stated what had happened exactly as it did happen. Now, the rule is—the Speaker shall "examine and correct" the Journal. The power to correct implies the existence of error. There was no error, not even the slightest mistake. The Speaker had, then, no duty to perform, and any other journal than that in which the Clerk had truly recorded the proceedings of the House is not the true, but a spurious journal. The act of the Speaker was gratuitous, and without warrant.

But it may be said, as I think it was yesterday, that the Speaker is to be justified, because he had stated the actual fact. That is to say, he has refused to designate Missouri as a State, because she is not a State. I know that there are varying opinions; that some gentlemen consider Missouri a State; others, quasi a State; others a Territory; while there are some who do not clearly express what their opinions are. With this subject, I have at present no concern. Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof. The question is not, whether the true quality of Missouri should appear upon the Journals; but whether it shall appear as represented in her memorial, in the announcement of the member presenting that memorial, and in the act of the House receiving it. If an individual, arrogating a title to which he has no claim, present his petition to the House, and it be determined to listen to his plaint, no one will contend that the Clerk or the Speaker, in making up or correcting the Journal, has a right to inquire into the legitimacy of the dignity assumed. It is not their duty to ingraft the fact upon the Journal, contrary to the representation of the petitioner, and the determination of the House to hear him in the character he has chosen to adopt; but it is their duty to detail events as they actually occurred, although these may involve falsehoods, and misrepresentations.

Sir, if Missouri had presented herself in borrowed feathers, it was the duty of this House, by plucking them from her, to have exposed her in the nakedness of her deformity. If she assumed a rank incompatible with your dignity, or a tone and a style too lofty, you should at once have taught her language more humble, and admonished her, that she was not yet fitted to occupy the station to which she aspired. But, did you do this? No, sir. Whatever may be the matter or the manner of her memorial, you received it. That it was received, was noted by the proper officer, under your order; and you referred it for investigation to a committee. Now, these are solemn measures adopted by the House, and, I ask, have they been rescinded by the same authority? No; not by the alteration of your Journal; an alteration not governed by any known rule prescribed by this body. Is it come to this? Shall the officers of this House frame the Journals of the House according to any vague notions of propriety which they may entertain? If, indeed, they have this power, they may mould, and alter, and garble, and destroy, until your diary shall wear the semblance of romance, rather than of history. If we yield them such a power, we are apostates from the true faith; we are no longer the representatives of freemen; we are ourselves slaves, and, what is worse, willing slaves.

It may certainly happen that the House, from inadvertence, or some other cause, may be led into mistake, and may order that to be recorded which should not of right have a place. It may then be the duty of the Speaker to point out the impropriety, leaving it to be corrected at the will of the House. He cannot go further; he cannot alter the solemn acts of the House, upon the presumption that they were irregularly or unadvisedly done.

I have heard it suggested that this is a little matter; which does not deserve our consideration. If it be so, why were words so harmless and unimportant stricken from the Journal? Their very insignificance should have protected them; the more especially as they corresponded with the fact as it transpired. But it is not a good reason against resisting any innovation, to say that it is so slight nothing is to be feared from

it. A delegated authority should be jealously watched, or it will rapidly extend itself beyond its prescribed boundaries. We are told in Arabian story that a mist, rising from the bosom of the ocean, which the gentlest breeze might have dissipated, took to itself consistency and form, and became a monstrous and fearful giant. It is thus with the encroachments of power—at first scarcely perceived, at last not to be opposed. Constant attrition will waste even the rock of ages.

Before I sit down, I would controvert a doctrine which has received the sanction of high authority. It is, that the House has no authority to ask the reading of the original draught of the Journal, because none other can be read than that corrected by the Speaker. Sir, it may be shown—I think it has been shown—that the House is the ultimate judge of the correctness of its own Journal, and it has a right to inquire, whether the Speaker has corrected it, as he has the power to do, or altered it without authority. How, then, is the House to exercise this right, if you withhold the data upon which its decision must be founded? Shall members inquire among themselves for the facts, with a view to the correction of mistakes or faults? One will answer, he was absent; another, he was engaged; a third, he was inattentive.

Apply to the Clerk, and he will say his duties are so numerous, and so many the subjects he is forced to record, that, if he must shut his eyes to the Journal, he can give you no account of the matter; but, if you will allow him to read from the Journal itself, he can divest it of interlineations and erasures, and tell you how it originally stood. It is only by a comparison of the Journal, after it has received the correction of the Speaker, with what it was in the hands of the Clerk, that you can be prepared to decide upon the propriety or impropriety of their corrections. Suppose a mischievous or malignant individual were, covertly, to find access to your records, and should vitiate them by blots and scrawls. When you sought to restore them to their true shape, would you not call upon the Clerk to decipher to you their original reading? The case is perfectly parallel, if an officer of the House have so altered the Journal that it no longer retains its true form.

I have considered it a duty to say thus much, by way of preface to the resolutions I offer. I will only add, if the Speaker has done that which he ought not to have done, it comports with the dignity of the House to assert its own rights. Let us ever cling to truth and justice, and resist even their slightest violation with the utmost pertinacity.

Mr. R. then handed the following resolutions to the Chair:

Resolved, That it is the duty of the Speaker, under the rules of the House, to examine and correct the Journals of the House.

Resolved, That the House possesses the right to inquire into and decide upon the propriety of any correction which may be made by the Speaker.

Resolved, That the erasures made by the Speaker in the Journal of the 11th January are alterations and not corrections, inasmuch as the Journal, in its original form, corresponds with the fact intended to be described, viz: that a petition from the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Missouri was presented by a member from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER having propounded the question, "Will the House now proceed to consider these resolutions?" it was decided—yeas 47, nays 96.

So the House refused now to consider the resolutions.

TUESDAY, January 16.

MONDAY, January, 22.

Treasury Report.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following report:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 19, 1821.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the fourth instant, instructing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House "a statement of the money in the Treasury on the first of January, 1821, together with a statement of the money in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for the War and Navy Departments, on that day," I have the honor to state, that there was in the Treasury on that day the sum of $1,076,261 18, and in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent for the War and Navy Departments, the sum of $1,050,378 25, viz: For the War Department, $151,373 29; and for the Navy Department, $799,004 96.

Of the sum of $1,076,271 18, in the Treasury on the first of January, 1821, $500,000 were paid by the Bank of the United States, on the 30th of December, 1820, but which were payable on the first day of January thereafter, and were estimated in the receipts into the Treasury for 1821. If this sum is deducted, the amount in the Treasury on that day will be $576,271 18. If it is considered a part of the receipts of 1820, the estimated receipts for 1821 will be diminished by that amount. With this explanation, it will not be material whether it is placed to the credit of the one or the other year; the general result of the two years will be the same.

The receipts of the fourth quarter, with the exception of payments made at Mobile and New Orleans, in the two last weeks of December, 1820, and in the whole month at most of the land offices, are ascertained to be $4,045,585 99. In the annual report, the receipts of the fourth quarter were estimated at $3,430,000; the actual receipts, therefore, exceed those that were estimated by $615,585 99, and by $115,585 99, if the payment made by the bank on the 30th of December be deducted from the receipts of 1820.

If the sum of $615,585 99 be added to the sum of $5,417,830 83, which was stated in my letter of the 21st December, 1820, to be the aggregate means for the fourth quarter of that year, the amount at the disposition of the Treasury, in that quarter, will be augmented to $6,033,416 82.

It is ascertained that the payments from the Treasury, during that quarter, have amounted to $4,957,145 24, which, being deducted from the estimated means of that quarter, will leave in the Treasury, as already stated, on the 1st day of January, 1821, the sum of $1,076,271 18. But if the $500,000, paid by the bank, be deducted from the receipts of 1820, the balance on the 1st day of January, 1821, will be, as has already been stated, $576,271 18.

The demands upon the Treasury during the year 1820, in order to complete the service of that year, and to effect the objects for which the several appropriations were made, and which are not included in the foregoing sum of $4,957,145 24, which amounts to $4,707,987 96, viz:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous, (being the difference between the sum of $1,407,213 56, estimated to be paid in the fourth quarter, and the sum actually paid,) - - -	$855,905 20
Public debt, - - -	2,076,918 15
War Department, - - -	665,164 61
Navy Department, - - -	1,110,000 00

Which leaves an excess of demand beyond the money in the Treasury of $3,631,716 78, and of $4,131,716 78, if the payment made by the bank be deducted from the payments into the Treasury in the year 1820.

It may be proper to observe, that, if the sum of $2,076,918 15, of the Louisiana stock, has not been pressed for payment, it has been the result of forbearance on the part of the holders of that stock, and of confidence in the faith of the nation, that such forbearance will not operate to their injury. The other demands upon the Treasury, which were estimated as a charge upon it in the fourth quarter of the year 1820, and which are not embraced in the estimates of the expenditure for 1821, and which constitute a part of the deficit above stated, will, it is presumed, be demanded of the Treasury.

It will be perceived that the sums in the hands of the Treasurer, as agent of the War and Navy Departments, exceed the estimate of them, annexed to the estimates of the service of the year 1821. These moneys are drawn from the agent, as the demands upon the respective departments are presented, or requisitions from the disbursing officers of those departments are received. The amount drawn from the agent depends, therefore, upon contingencies over which the heads of those departments have no control, and may exceed or fall short of any estimate made by them for any definite period of time.

It may be proper, also, to state, that, in contemplation of law, money is not considered to be in the Treasury until a warrant is issued by the Secretary and receipted by the Treasurer, for the sums paid by the receiving officers into the bank; but, for the practical purposes of the Treasury, all sums paid into bank to the credit of the Treasurer are considered by him to be in the Treasury. Generally, the warrants covering the money received on account of the Government are issued quarterly for all sums received during the quarter. These warrants are usually issued about two months after the expiration of the quarter, as the payments made into the banks which are the depositories of the public money are not ascertained sooner.

The statements which accompany this letter are explanatory of the views which it presents, or afford information connected with them, which it is presumed may be useful.

I remain, with respect, &c.,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

Hon. JOHN TAYLOR,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The report was read, and, with the documents, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Reduction of the Army.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

Mr. McCULLOUGH moved further to amend the third section of the bill (as recited on the Journal of the 18th instant) by expunging from the fifth and sixth lines thereof the words following, viz: "each with the rank, pay, and emoluments of a colonel of cavalry, as heretofore prescribed by law;" and also, from the eighth and ninth lines thereof, the words "with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum;" and also, after the word "purchases" in the tenth line, the following words: "whose compensation shall not exceed two and a half per centum on the public moneys disbursed by him, nor the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum; and also, from the thirteenth and fourteenth lines, the words "to be compensated as heretofore;" also, after the words "surgeon general," in the sixteenth line, the words "with a salary of two thousand dollars per annum;" and also, after the words "apothecary general," in the seventeenth line, the words "with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars per annum;" and to add to the section the following words, viz: "the said several officers to hold the rank, pay, and emoluments which now are, or heretofore may be, prescribed by law."

After considerable debate, in which Messrs. McCULLOUGH, RICH, McLEAN, BURTON, FLOYD, BRUSH, and MERCER, took part, the motion of Mr. McCULLOUGH was negatived, first on the question of inserting, and then on striking out the existing compensations.

Mr. BRUSH then moved to strike out the word "general," after "Quartermaster," so that there should be a Quartermaster without the addition of "general," the rank of general being proposed to be taken from the office.—Negatived.

Mr. EVERTS moved an amendment, the object of which was to place the deputy commissaries and quartermasters on the footing on which they will be found to stand in the amended bill, instead of that in which they stood in the original bill.

This motion was agreed to, 51 to 47.

The question having been then stated on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. MERCER addressed the House, each at great length; the first in favor of the bill, the latter against it.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Baker, Ball, Barbour, Bayly, Beecher, Brown, Bryan, Buffum, Burton, Butler of New Hampshire, Campbell, Cannon, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Crafts, Crawford, Culpeper, Cushman, Dane, Dennison, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of North Carolina, Eustis, Fay, Fiaber, Floyd, Foot, Garnett, Gray, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Hostetter, Jackson, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Kendall, Kinsley, Lathrop, Lincoln, Livermore, Macclay, McCoy, McCreary, McCullough, Mallary, Marchand, Meigs, Metcalf, Monell, Montgomery, R. Smyth of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Storrs, Street, Strong of New York, Udree, Wallace, Wendover, and Whitman—47.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow, as amended.

THURSDAY, January 23.

Reduction of the Army.

The engrossed bill for the reduction of the Military Peace Establishment, was read a third time.

Mr. SIMKINS rose, and spoke against the passage of the bill, and in reply to the gentlemen who had supported it.

Mr. FLOYD made a few explanatory remarks.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, assigned the reasons why he should vote against this bill, though not opposed to a proper reduction of the Military Establishment.

Mr. EVERTS replied to Mr. SMITH, and defended the bill in regard to some of its details.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, opposed the bill in toto, in its objects and in its details, as contrary to the public interest.

Mr. RICH briefly assigned the reasons why he should vote for the bill.

Mr. CLAY stated the reasons why he thought the interest of the country called for the passage of the bill.

The question on the passage of the bill was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—109 to 48, as follows:

Commodore Perry's Family.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. Foot in the chair, on the bill reported at the last session of Congress, for the relief of the family of the late Oliver Hazard Perry, and to provide for the education of his children at the public expense.

The bill having been read through—

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, who declined occupying the time of the House by speaking on the subject, the blanks in the bill were filled, so as to make the proposed allowance to be $350 per annum for the mother of the late Commodore Perry, $400 for his widow, (during life, or until in remarriage,) and $150 for each of the children, until they arrive at twenty-one years of age. The whole amount proposed to be annually appropriated being $1,880, the estimated amount of half the pay which Commodore Perry, whilst living, would have enjoyed whilst on separate command.

Mr. HARDIN moved to strike out all the bill except the enacting clause, and insert, in lieu thereof, a provision, allowing to the family of Commodore Perry half-pay for the term of five years, being, Mr. H. said, the amount which they would have received had Commodore Perry fallen in battle.

On this motion there arose a short debate.

The motion of Mr. HARDIN was negatived, on a division, by apparently a large majority.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill.

The House having concurred in filling the blanks as reported from the committee—

Mr. HARDIN renewed the motion he had made in Committee of the Whole, and demanded the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays being taken, there were, for the amendment 62, against it 82.

So it was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAY, though decidedly in favor of the object of the bill, objected to that part of it proposing an allowance of $380 per annum, during life, to the mother of the deceased; and, on his motion, that part was stricken out.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved a reconsideration of the allowance of $400 per annum to the widow of Commodore Perry, with a view to make it $780, by adding to it the $380 just stricken out; so that the amount to the family should be the same, though the distribution would be different.

The motion of Mr. R. was negatived, by a vote of 69 to 52.

On the question for ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, the yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. BRUSH, there were, for the bill 76, against it 62.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24.

Fugitive Slaves.

Among the papers offered during the presentation of memorials to-day, was the following, presented by Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky:

Whereas it is represented to the present General Assembly that many negroes and persons of color, the property of citizens of this Commonwealth, have escaped from their lawful owners into the province of Canada, and are there protected from recapture by the subjects of His Majesty the King of Great Britain, residing in said province of Canada: And whereas the practice of concealing and countenancing slaves that thus escape from their lawful owners, tends greatly to the injury of the people of this State, and, if persevered in, may lead to unhappy consequences between the subjects of his said Majesty's Government and the citizens of the United States:

Resolved, therefore, That it is the opinion and desire of the present General Assembly, that the Government of the United States invite the attention of the British Government to this subject, and, if practicable, procure arrangements to be made, on the part of that Government, for the restoration of such fugitive slaves as shall have heretofore escaped, or may hereafter escape, from their lawful owners, (being citizens of the United States,) into any of his said Majesty's North American dominions. And the Governor is requested to transmit to the Executive of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, copies of the foregoing resolution.

The SPEAKER stated that, according to the rules of the House, this resolution could not be received, not being "addressed to the House;" though the subject might readily be brought before the House in a different form. Upon which, Mr. B. withdrew the resolution, with the intention of presenting the subject to the House in a different shape.

Admission of Missouri—Mr. Eustis's Resolution.

The House then, on motion of Mr. EUSTIS, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, and it is hereby declared, That, the — day of — next ensuing, the State of Missouri shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever: Provided, That so much of the 26th section of the 3d article of the constitution of said State, presented to Congress at the present session, as makes it the duty of the Legislature to pass such laws as shall be necessary "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State, under any pretext whatsoever," shall, on or before that day, have been expunged therefrom.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. EUSTIS stated the objects he had in view in moving this resolution to be, to remove the only objection which he had to the admission of Missouri into the Union; to give facility and despatch to the admission of the State into the Union, and thereby to preclude the possibility of this question ever again coming before Congress. These were his only motives, and he had, in moving the resolution, acted without consulting with any one else. Foreseeing a difficulty in prescribing the mode in which the amendment might be made, he had left that a question for separate consideration, in order to obtain a decision on the principle of the resolution. Having introduced the resolution with a sense of duty, should it not meet with the approbation of the House, he should be entirely satisfied with having in proposing it, performed what he believed to be his duty.

On motion of Mr. EUSTIS the blanks in the resolution were filled with the first of October next.

Mr. FOOT moved to postpone the resolution, in order to take up that from the Senate, under the impression that doing so would facilitate a final decision on the subject.

Mr. LOWMYER suggested that in all probability nothing would be gained by this course, as the same question now before the House might, and probably would be, brought up by a motion to amend the resolve in the Senate.

The motion to postpone was negatived.

No debate arising—

The Chairman put the question to agree to the resolution, and it was negatived by a large majority.

The committee then rose and reported their decision to the House.

The SPEAKER put the question on agreeing to the amendments made in committee, (by filling the blanks in the resolution.)

It being objected that the report of the committee had been to reject the resolution—

The SPEAKER decided that no committee, whether select or of the whole House, has the power of rejecting any bill or resolution referred to it. Bills and resolutions are referred to committees to be discussed and amended or not, and not to be agreed to or rejected in form, though sometimes virtually rejected by striking out their vital parts.*

The decision was objected to by Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. BARBOUR, and Mr. COBB, but justified by Mr. SERGEANT, and in part at least by Mr. LOWMYER. In the end, however, no appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair.

The House having agreed to the amendment made in Committee of the Whole—

The question was then taken, "Shall the resolution be engrossed, and read a third time?" and determined in the negative—yeas 6, nays 146.

So the resolution was rejected.

After a pause—

Mr. CLAY rose, and gave notice, that, if no other gentleman made any motion on the subject, he should on the day after to-morrow move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take into consideration the resolution from the Senate on the subject of Missouri.

THURSDAY, January 25.

Occupation of the Columbia River.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee appointed on the 19th ultimo to inquire into the situation of the settlements on the Pacific Ocean, and into the expediency of occupying the Columbia River, made a detailed report, accompanied with a bill to authorize the occupation of the Columbia River, and to regulate the intercourse with the Indian tribes within the United States and territories thereof; which bill, by leave of the House, was reported, read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the resolution of the 19th of December, 1820, to inquire into the situation of the settlement upon the Pacific Ocean, and the expediency of occupying the Columbia River, report: That they have carefully examined the subject referred to them, and, from every consideration

* "If it be a paper referred to them, (a committee, whether select or of the whole,) they proceed to put questions of amendment, if proposed, but no final questions on the whole; because all parts of the paper, having been adopted by the House, stand of course, unless altered or struck out by a vote. Even if they are opposed to the whole paper, and think it cannot be made good by amendments, they cannot reject it, but must report it back to the House without amendments, and there make their opposition."—Jefferson's Manual.

Occupation of the Columbia River.

which they have been able to bestow upon it, believe, from the usage of all nations, previous and subsequent to the discovery of America, the title of the United States to a very large portion of the coast of the Pacific Ocean to be well founded; nor have they been able to ascertain that any other Government than Spain has made claim to any part of it, from Cape Horn to the sixtieth degree of north latitude.

When this continent was first made known to Europe, by the bold and enterprising genius of Christopher Columbus, it seemed for a long time conceded that the Spanish monarchy, which alone could be prevailed upon to listen to his plans and propositions, was most entitled to the benefits resulting from the successful issue of his undertaking. Though Ferdinand and Isabella, who, at that time, filled the throne of that country, did not rest their title upon the tacit consent of other nations, or even upon their armies or fleet, which was, at that period, formidable, and well provided; but, instructed by the example of the Portuguese, who had obtained a grant for all countries east of the Azores, from pole to pole, they obtained a similar grant from the Roman Pontiff of all the territories they wished to occupy west of the same point, as the superstition of the times conferred on him a right of dominion over all the kingdoms of the earth. Thus, in virtue of his power, as the vicar and representative of Jesus Christ, did Alexander VI., in 1498, grant to the Crown of Spain, in full right, all the countries inhabited by infidels, which they had or should discover.

Enormous as the power was, which the Popes then exercised, it was recognized and submitted to by the monarchs of that day, and considered as having vested in Spain a title which they deemed completely valid, and authorized her to extend her discoveries and establish her dominion over a great portion of the new world. The Spanish Crown, as well as individuals, the subjects of that power, continued to fit out ships for voyages of discovery, and, in the space of a few years, had visited various parts of the coast of America, from the Gulf of Mexico, to many degrees south of the equinoctial line, taking possession, according to the custom of that day, in the name of the Spanish King. Nor was their zeal for discovery confined to the Atlantic shore alone; parties, under daring and enterprising leaders, penetrated far into the interior of the continent, and even to the shores of the Pacific Ocean, wresting by violence the rich Empires of Peru and Mexico from the peaceful and legitimate sovereigns who reigned over them, and annexed them to the Crown of Spain, by the triple title of conquest, discovery, and the grant of the Pope.

So well satisfied do the rest of Europe seem to have been of the rights of Spain, derived from such high authority, that they permitted her to progress unmolested in her career of discovery and conquest for many years, until she had acquired the undisputed possession of most of the Atlantic coast of South America, and the whole shore of the Pacific, as high as the northern extremity of California, and, as they affirmed, after they came in possession of Louisiana, to a point far to the northward of that.

Though discoveries were frequently made of countries among the most beautiful and fertile, where nature seemed to invite the industry of man to the enjoyment of luxuriant abundance, yet none seemed to arrest the attention of either Government or people, but those which contained the precious metals; this morbid thirst for gold may be the cause why no settlements were made north of California, as no metal of that description is believed to be found in that region.

About this time it became the interest of the British Crown to think differently on the subject of religion from the See of Rome, and, separating entirely from it, assumed the right of annexing to their Crown all the territories discovered by their subjects, and of bestowing them by charter upon individuals. To this end, grants were issued by Elizabeth in the year 1578 and 1584, the one to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, the other to Sir Walter Raleigh, which were limited to a certain number of leagues, but those issued in 1606, 1608, and 1611, by James I., in the charters for Virginia, were declared to embrace the whole extent of country from thirty-four to forty-five degrees of north latitude, extending from sea to sea, always excepting the territories of any Christian Prince or people.

It is believed that when these charters were granted by the Monarchs of England, they were not well apprised of the extent of country they were giving away, but from their reservations, in regard to the title of Christian Princes or people, they were apprised of the title of Spain upon the western ocean, though not informed of its extent; as it is evident from the words Christian and infidel often occurring, both in the charters of the Monarchs and the bulls of the Pope, the legitimate sovereigns, as well as people of this country, in that day, were considered as possessing no rights. With whatever care they avoided collisions with each other respecting territory which might produce a war with a power equally skilled in the military art with themselves, they were not scrupulous in dispossessing the natives of both Americas of their country, all of whom were as brave, as generous, and magnanimous as themselves, and some of whom as far advanced in civilization and the arts of peace, though not professing to be Christians, or skilled in war.

The opinion of Europe undergoing another change upon the subject of discoveries in unknown regions, they were now reduced to a more definite and reasonable extent, consequently, in a few years, a third mode of obtaining territory came to be admitted by all as the basis on which they could safely rely for a just decision of their claims, should difficulties present themselves; and one which, to a moderate extent, gave to all nations the benefit of their own labors. By this rule, too, all the territory thus acquired was vested in the State rather than the Crown, which Spanish jurisprudence, under the authority of the Pope, seemed to consider.

Hence, the power which discovered a country was entitled to the whole extent of soil watered by the springs of the principal river or water course passing through it, provided there was settlement made, or possession taken, with the usual formalities, in the name and on the behalf of the Government to whom the individual owed allegiance. Though the tacit consent of all seemed to yield the sovereignty from sea to sea, where no settlement or express possession was had of an intermediate country; and such right was held good to the whole extent, but not wholly confirmed until another settlement was made at a distinct point upon the same territory beyond the water of the first, or so distant as not manifestly to encroach upon the establishments of the coast; other powers, though, might avail themselves of the failure of the first to occupy another principal stream, or distant point, and become thereby vested with a full right of sovereignty. This seems to have been the condition of America until the close of the war of 1812; since which time all treaties have yielded to the different powers, in full right, all they claimed, either by settlement, or from the failure of others to occupy the principal streams when they might do so. There is now no longer territory to be obtained by settlement or discovery; and if there should be any difficulty, it will be where the different limits of the different powers shall be fixed.

Impressed with a belief, that, under this mode, valuable possessions might be added to the French monarchy, it is presumed Sieurs Joliet and Marquette penetrated the unknown wilderness from Canada, and discovered the Mississippi so long ago as the year 1673, and explored it down to the Arkansas. Perhaps, encouraged by their success, a few years after, Hennepin visited those regions, and pursued that river to its mouth. His representations, with other considerations, two years after, induced M. de la Salle and M. Tonti to descend that river with a considerable force to the Gulf of Mexico, and they are believed to have built the fort during that trip, the bricks and other remains of which are now to be seen on the first high ground on the west side of the Mississippi, below the mouth of the White River.

After this period, in 1685, M. de la Salle, being on his return from France, landed on the west side of the Rio Colorado, in the bay of St. Bernard, and planted a considerable colony there, taking possession, in due and solemn form, in the name of the French King. Such were the discoveries which gave to France the country called Louisiana, from the Rio Grande del Norte, being the next great river to the west of that settlement, along the mountains of Mexico and Spain west, as the western limits, and California as the eastern boundary. That France, and all other nations interested in its boundary, considered it in the same light, is ascertained in various ways, to the conviction of the most incredulous.

In consequence of these settlements and discoveries of the French, Louis XIV. granted, by letters patent, in the year 1712, to Anthony Crozat, the exclusive commerce of that country, and defines its boundary, declaring that it comprehends all lands, coasts, and islands, situated in the Gulf of Mexico, between Carolina on the east, and Old and New Mexico on the west. The French title to these boundaries is further established by the Chevalier de Champigny, who lived in the country, and declares Louisiana to extend to the Rio Grande del Norte, and the mountains of Mexico. This appears to be the opinion of other writers, who, it is presumed, had the most intimate knowledge of the subject, and among them we find that intelligent statesman, the Count de Vergennes, in a work entitled an Historical and Political Memoir of Louisiana, where he says, it is bounded by Florida on the east, and by Mexico on the west. The same extent is assigned to it by Don Antonio de Alcedo, an officer of high rank in the service of Spain, entitled "Diccionario Geografico Historico de las Indias Occidentales ó America." Don Thomas Lopez, geographer to the King of Spain, in a map published in 1762, is of the same opinion, which is supported by the opinion of De Lisle, of the Royal Academy of Paris, in the year 1782.

Upon the testimony of so many respectable writers, many of whom were in the employment of both France and Spain, not to mention the authority of

Du Pratz, it is believed the United States may with safety rely, they having, by the Treaty of Paris of 1803, become possessed of the French title. If, however, there exists any obscurity in the boundary of that province, Spain, with whom it is supposed the title conflicts, has no right to claim any benefit arising from it, as all the writers and geographers above referred to agree in fixing Mexico, New Spain, the Rio Grande del Norte, and the mountains of Mexico, as the true boundary anterior to the treaty of 1763. If she, then, by treaty, obtained from France that country, with these limits, as asserted by France, and different ones not being stipulated for by her, she cannot now, with any shadow of justice, propose others. Moreover, Spain, by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, retroceded this same country to France, with the same extent of boundary it had when originally in her possession, thereby confirming to France, without doubt, all she originally claimed particularly, as no notice is there taken of the invalidity of the original French title to the full extent of their claim; at all events, it is believed, if there was difficulty in regard to it, during this last transfer would have been the time to adjust it; or, by the law of nations, it is thought, as well as candor and good faith, she has not, or ought not, to be permitted to insist upon other boundaries. That law, in one place, declares, that "if the party making them (meaning grants or cessions) fails to express himself clearly and plainly, it is the worse for him; he cannot be allowed to introduce, subsequently, restrictions which he has not expressed."

It is proper, before this part of the subject is passed over, to remark, that, from the examination of the best records of the times, from the discovery of America until the year 1763, the bull of the Pope rather gave a title to the country, the coast of which had been examined by the Spaniards, than confirmed, beyond the participation of other nations, the hemisphere west of the Azores; but, where an extensive coast had been discovered by them, and no settlement attempted previous to 1763, that coast, and its extended interior, has been considered the property of the nation so discovering it; or discovering the interior, the unoccupied coasts becomes a part.

Great Britain, as was her interest, maintained for a long time the old notion of a right to grant by charter all the countries from sea to sea, where it did not interfere with the territory of any Christian Prince or people; and her obstinate adherence to that system is considered as largely contributing to the production of the war of 1755, when she was opposed by France and Spain, as granting away almost all Mexico and the French possessions, both claiming much of the intermediate country, and the coast of the Pacific. Great Britain, at the close of that war, abandoned her pretensions, and gave manifestations of her sincerity, by revoking the first charter granted to Georgia, and in the second, in 1764, limited it to the Mississippi, and agreed, in 1763, to limit her whole territory to that river in the west.

Where territory has been acquired, as already shown, upon any coast, and the same coast is actually settled, or occupied by another power, at such a distance as not manifestly to encroach upon the first, the point equidistant from either is considered as the utmost limits of each. This principle, it is believed, was fixed and settled by all the most important treaties which have engaged the powers of Europe in affairs appertaining, in any way, to possessions in this country, and, it is believed, was acted upon and sanctioned, not only by the treaty of 1763, but, in some measure, by that of Utrecht, in 1713.

Occupation of the Columbia River.

Spain, by virtue of her original discovery, and actual settlement in Mexico, together with her title to Louisiana, claimed the Pacific coast of North America, as high up as the sixtieth degree of north latitude; and, to enforce her claim, in the year 1789, sent a ship-of-war up the coast to capture or drive from those waters several English vessels fitted out in the East Indies by English merchants, upon their own authority, and at their own risk, to trade with the natives in that quarter. This service was performed by Martinez, of His Catholic Majesty's navy; and, in the year 1790, became the subject of a message from the British King to his Parliament. Although much debate ensued, and some resentment was expressed towards Spain for her treatment of the British subjects, who were made prisoners, yet no claim was alleged on the part of England to territory there. Great Britain, in the course of that transaction, seems to have recognized the claim of Spain, and was willing to treat for the enjoyment of privileges on that coast, which she obtained, and was, by stipulations, invested with the further right to fish even as low down as the Gulf of California.

The Spanish monarch, being in possession of the French title, regardless of that which the United States had obtained, according to the mode last adopted, felt great confidence in his negotiations with the British Government, in the year 1790. But the territory, the title to which gave that confidence, has since, by the Treaty of Paris, come into the possession of the United States, and it is believed the Treaty of St. Ildefonso confirmed to France the full extent of boundary originally claimed, Spain taking no notice of the original error, if any existed.

Under this view of the case, the United States, being possessed of the title of France, and, by a just application of the law of nations, that of Spain too, if she ever had any, leaves them the undisputed sovereignty of that coast, from the sixtieth degree of north latitude down to thirty-six, which is believed to be the situation of the mountains of Mexico, alluded to in all the authors and charts before referred to. If, however, there should remain a doubt, that doubt is relieved by a reference to the subordinate principle recognized by the Treaties of Utrecht and Paris, in 1763. When we know that all the formalities deemed necessary in the possession of a newly discovered country have been complied with on the part of the United States; that, in the years 1785-'6, an establishment was made at the mouth of the Columbia River, by Mr. Hendricks, the full and entire benefit of whose courage, enterprise, and success, results to this Union; and that at a later day, in 1805, Messrs. Lewis and Clark, in executing the desires of this Government, again visited the Columbia and the Western ocean, twelve miles from which they built Fort Clatsop, yet to be seen—these establishments made by the United States, not so near the settlements of California as manifestly to encroach upon them, entitle them to the whole country north of Columbia River. And, in applying the principle known to govern in such cases, the point equidistant from the Spanish actual settlements and the mouth of that river is the true point at which a line drawn separating the two countries should commence. The actual settlements of Spain are believed to have been, at that time, upon the Colorado of California, in latitude 32° north; but, even supposing the point to be the extreme south of the claim of the United States, which is believed to be 86°, then the line of separation would fall at 41°. And, if any doubt arose as to the claim of the United States to the full extent of the Spanish title, to the north of Fort Clatsop, so high as 60 degrees of latitude, there could remain no doubt as far as the equidistant point, which would be at the completion of the 53d degree of latitude, leaving us twelve degrees of coast on that ocean.

From every information that can be obtained, worthy to be relied upon, our coast on the Pacific, for years past, has been the theatre of much individual enterprise, stimulated by the rich returns of numerous whale ships, and the great profit of the fur trade, together with the flattering accounts of Messrs. Lewis and Clark, relative to the resources of the interior, though no regular trade or well-organized system of commerce existed until the year 1810, in the course of which year a vessel was fitted out in the city of New York, well supplied with provisions and seed of every description necessary in a permanent occupation of the coast, which they contemplated. This little colony consisted of a hundred and twenty men when it arrived in the Columbia; and after ascertaining its soundings, they removed some miles above Fort Clatsop, and built the town of Astoria, where a portion of them cultivated the soil, whilst the others engaged in the fur trade with the natives. The soil was found to be rich, and well adapted to the culture of all the useful vegetables found in any part of the United States; as turnips, potatoes, onions, rye, wheat, melons of various kinds, cucumbers, and every species of pease. In the course of a year or two, it was believed their interest would be promoted by cultivating and securing the friendship and confidence of the tribes inhabiting the waters of that great river; to which end, the town of Astoria was maintained by about thirty men, whilst the rest established themselves at five other points, to become fixed stations, to raise their own vegetables, trade with the natives, and receive supplies of merchandise from the general depot of Astoria, and to return to it the fruits of their labor. One of these subordinate establishments appears to have been at the mouth of Lewis's River; one at Lantou; a third on the Columbia, six hundred miles from the ocean, at the confluence of the Wantana River; a fourth on the east fork of Lewis's River; and the fifth on the Multnomah. Thus situated, this enterprising little colony succeeded well in all their undertakings, nor met with but one misfortune, which seemed to partake largely of that kind which had, for a long time, so certainly and so unseen, been inflicted upon our Western inhabitants; this was the loss of the Tonquin, a vessel they had taken from New York, whilst trading down the coast, where, in time past, she had been, in common with the ships of some European Powers, enjoying the friendship and confidence of the natives. This confidence had by some means been destroyed, and, whilst they induced many of the ship's company to go on shore, many of their own number went on board the ship, and suddenly attacking the crew, the whole were destroyed, as well as the vessel. This, though a great affliction to the survivors on the Columbia, did not dishearten them, as other vessels were expected soon to arrive, and, with these expectations, they continued their trade, which, becoming profitable, they were the less inclined to abandon. But the operations of the war of 1812, which took place between the United States and Great Britain, were destined to mar their prosperity. That Government, it appears, despatched a vessel of war called the Raccoon, to destroy or possess Astoria, which, by the assistance of the Indians, influenced by the Northwest and Hudson's Bay Companies of fur traders, they were easily enabled to do; and have, from that period to the present time, continued to reside at it, as well as on the river above, though a messenger or agent was sent by the authority of the United States to receive, and did receive, that post from them, at the close of the late war.

From every reflection which the committee have been able to bestow upon the facts connected with this subject, they are inclined to believe the Columbia, in a commercial point of view, a position of the utmost importance; the fisheries on that coast, its open sea, and its position in regard to China, which offers the best market for the vast quantities of furs taken in those regions, and our increasing trade throughout that ocean, seems to demand immediate attention.

The fur of every country which has produced it, has been ever esteemed one of its most valuable commodities, and has long held a rank among the most profitable articles of commerce; it was much sought for even in the days of Tatila, a Visigoth, who reigned in Italy about the year 522, at which time they drew their supplies from the Suetons, who inhabited that part of Europe called Sweden. The Welsh set a high value on them as early as the time of Howel Dda, in 940, and, from its being first an article of dress, used only by the poorer class of the community, it by gradually extending itself came to be one of luxury of the highest value, in which kings and princes vied with each other in their costly magnificence and display; their clothes were not only fashioned of them, but even their tents were lined with the finest varieties. Such was the display of the Cham of Tartary, when he was visited in his tent by Marco Polo, about the year 1252. It had become so much in use, and so high in price, that Edward III., in the year 1337, deemed it expedient to prohibit its use to any but those who could afford to spend a hundred pounds a year, without detriment to their property. At that day, having exhausted those parts of Europe which had supplied them, the price increasing with a growing demand, they were obliged to seek them elsewhere, and procured their supplies from the north of Asia. This, for a long time, poured into the adjoining parts of Europe, immense sums, as it was in that direction they were brought to market. This trade, so valuable to that part of the world, had no competition, nor were other sources of supply even known until Francis I. of France, in the year 1514, sent Jacques Curtis, of St. Maloes, to make discoveries in this country. That gentleman entered the St. Lawrence, and exchanged his merchandise for fur, which was the commencement of a feeble trade, that was continued until the year 1608, when Samuel Champlain went some distance up that river, and laid the foundation of the town of Quebec, as a trading establishment, and commenced a system which, however, did not greatly flourish until about the year 1649. But very soon after that country came into the possession of England, this trade was cherished and greatly increased, and the dominion of the Hudson's Bay enabled her not only to supply Russia itself, and all Europe, but even to send it to Turkey, and round the Cape of Good Hope, to distant China. That trade which had destroyed all competition, and, in the hands of well-regulated companies, was capable of enriching an empire, had yielded a part of its profits to the skill and industry of individuals upon our western shore; that skill and that industry has withered, not for the want of fostering care, but justice and protection.

The fur trade of Canada has long been conducted by well-organized companies; and, although they encounter infinite difficulties, yet the great profit of their business enables them to overcome them, and to divide a considerable percentage. All those articles intended as supplies for the Indians are shipped at Montreal and carried far into the interior, through lakes, and rivers, and difficult streams, until they arrive even in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountains. The increasing wealth derived from this source, induced a large increase of capital, and corresponding exertions to obtain a more extensive knowledge of the rivers and lakes through which their merchandise was to be carried, and a more extensive acquaintance with the natives, among whom they were eventually to be disposed of for furs, the produce of the labor of the savage. With views of this kind, small parties have been despatched, at different times, from the year 1774 until the year 1793, to examine the rivers of the West. At the period last mentioned, one of those parties, under the direction of Alexander McKenzie, penetrated even to the Western ocean, thereby greatly adding to their stock of useful knowledge in that branch of commerce, which they have not failed duly to appreciate. Notwithstanding the great difficulties which the British furriers encounter, from the embarrassment of their commerce by their different systems of exclusive privilege, these companies find it a source of vast profit, far exceeding any thing known in the United States; this, too, when the merchandise is so much advanced in price, from the distance and the numerous obstructions. The enhanced value of the articles, and their difficulties in transporting them, may be fully understood, when it is known the tract of transport is equal to three or four thousand miles, through more than sixty lakes, some of them very considerable in extent, and numerous rivers, and the means of transportation are bark canoes. Furthermore, these waters are interrupted in at least a hundred places, by falls and rapids, along which the trader has to carry his merchandise on his back, and over a hundred and thirty carrying places, from twenty or thirty yards in extent to thirteen miles, where both canoe and cargo have to be conveyed by the same means.

These are some of the obstructions which the Northwest Company encounter: yet their exports from Quebec alone are valued at more than a million of dollars annually, without reference to those brought to the United States, and shipped from New York and Philadelphia direct to China, rather than incur the cost and delay in procuring them a passage to London, and thence to India, in the ships of the East India Company. Indeed, it appears that many of the goods of that company, destined for this trade, particularly on the coast of the Pacific, are shipped to Boston, and immediately reshipped in American vessels, for the benefit of drawback. These vessels are sometimes employed to make a voyage for them from the mouth of Columbia to Canton. To illustrate more fully the increasing value of this trade, it is only necessary to observe, that from Quebec, in 1803, there were exported the skins of six hundred and fifty thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine quadrupeds, ninety-three thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight of which were the beaver. Since that time they have extended their trade beyond the Rocky Mountains, and have, as has already been observed, established themselves at the mouth of the Columbia. The amount of their export from that port cannot be ascertained, but it is thought to be of great value. The Hudson's Bay Company is believed to be considerable, and, from a state of former depression, is fast becoming the rival of the other, but for several years past have withdrawn their traders from the west side of the Rocky Mountains; they have fewer difficulties to overcome in arriving at the highest point of navigation than the Northwest Company. Their route is through the Hudson's Bay, the Nelson River, to Lake Winnipeg; thence, by passing other lakes, they ascend the Red River to their establishment, which is within ninety miles of the Missouri River, at a point called the Mandan villages. This river takes its rise in the Rocky Mountains, in about the forty-third degree of latitude, and observes a course north and northeast towards Hudson's Bay, until it arrives at the Mandan villages, a distance of nearly twelve hundred miles, when it turns short to the south, without any apparent cause, and joins the Mississippi; the water running to the Hudson's Bay at that point, approaching within one mile, and no hill or high ground to separate them, of any magnitude. Yet, notwithstanding the many advantages which the Hudson's Bay Company possessed over the Northwest Company, the Earl of Selkirk, the patron of the former, and a man of uncommon enterprise, was exceedingly desirous to obtain the privilege of supplying his establishments upon the Red River, by ascending the Mississippi to the St. Peter's; thence to its source in Stone Lake; then, by a short portage, through open woods and a level country, to his stations; or, taking the route by the Missouri to the Mandan villages, thence by a portage of ninety miles, to his place of destination. The exports of this company, for a short time past, have been very little less than those of the Northwest Company.

Occupation of the Columbia River.

The committee, from carefully examining all the facts connected with the subject referred to them, are well persuaded that the situation of the United States is such as to enable it to possess all the benefits derived from this trade, which, in the hands of others, amounts to millions; many of whose trading establishments east of the Rocky Mountains are within the acknowledged limits of this Republic, as fixed by the Convention of London of the 20th of October, 1818; and, it is believed, that no power, with the exception of Spain, has any just claim to territory west of them, or on the Pacific. The dependence for subsistence of many of those establishments, is upon the buffalo beef hunted by the Assiniboin Indians, who inhabit the country between the river of that name and the Missouri; their hunting ground is far within our boundary. To succeed in procuring to the people of the United States all the wealth flowing from this source, it is only necessary to occupy with a small trading guard the most northeastern point upon the Missouri River, and confine the foreigners to their own territory; at the same time occupying, with a similar guard, the mouth of Columbia. The great profit derived from this trade by the Canadian companies, when we know the distance and obstructions in their rivers, and in the various streams they ascend in carrying it on, the advance of price consequent upon it becomes rather a matter of amazement than otherwise, and inclines us to examine our own rivers with a view to the same object. Instead, however, of those formidable obstructions, we find a smooth and deep river, running through a boundless extent of the most fertile soil on this continent, containing within its limits all those valuable furs which have greatly enriched others; a certain, safe, and easy navigation, with a portage of only two hundred miles, uniting it with another river, equally smooth, deep, and certain, running to the great Western ocean. Thus are those two great oceans separated by a single portage of two hundred miles! The practicability of a speedy, safe, and easy communication with the Pacific, is no longer a matter of doubt or conjecture: from information not to be doubted, the Rocky Mountains at this time, in several places, are so smooth and open, that the labor of ten men for twenty days would enable a wagon with its usual freight to pass with great facility from the navigable water of the Missouri to that of the Columbia; the actual distance from river to river several hundred miles from their source, that is, from the great Falls of Missouri to the fork of Clark's River, is one hundred and forty-nine miles; the distance, therefore, of two hundred miles is to good navigation on the Columbia, which is the only river of any magnitude upon that whole coast, north of the Colorado of California, though there are several good harbors, secure and safe for vessels of any size.

The region of country from the ocean to the head of tide water, which is about two hundred miles, is heavily timbered, with a great variety of wood well calculated for shipbuilding, and every species of cabinet or carpenter's work; though there is a heavily timbered country thence for two hundred miles further, yet it is of a lesser growth, and quality not so durable: at that point commences the plain country, when the soil becomes more thin, and almost without wood, until it arrives at the table lands below the mountain. Though the soil of this region is not so good as in any other part of this great valley, yet it produces grass of the finest quality, and is emphatically called the region favorable to the production of the horse; this noble animal, so far surpassing all others in usefulness, courage, and swiftness, is here produced in greater perfection than even in Andalusia or Virginia. But, independent of all the wealth which may be derived from the fur trade of that river and the Missouri, the security, too, which the peace of this country would find in the influence which the American traders would obtain over the native, is the increasing commerce in the Western ocean. There is no employment so well calculated to make good seamen as the whale fisheries, which are known to be more profitable on this coast than any other; at the same time, the oil is far preferable to that taken on any other coast, being clear and transparent as rook water. While so many of our citizens are industriously engaged in the various branches of trade in those seas, more valuable to this country, it is believed, than any other: while all nations who have claims upon that coast, and some who have none, are anxious to occupy some position upon it, even at a vast expense, to enable them to participate in its benefits, we have neglected to extend to it any portion of our care, though it appears, from the best information, that there is at this time eight millions of property owned by citizens of this Republic in the Pacific Ocean.

Russia, whose dominions on the Asiatic coast oc-copy nearly the same position upon that side which ours do on this, has long been well informed of the great and increasing value of that commerce; and while she has been nowhere visible, not even to the powers of Europe, only as she has of late taken part in a few memorable enterprises, she has been felt everywhere. No labor, care, or expense is avoided to make tributary the four quarters of the globe; forts, magazines, towns, cities, and trade, seem to arise on the coast as if by magic; with an army of a million of men, she sits not only in proud security as it regards Europe, and menaces the Turk, the Persian, the Japanese, and Chinese, but even the King of Spain's dominions in North America are equally easy of access, and equally exposed to her fearful weight of power. Her watchfulness is ever in advance in discerning the most practicable avenues to profitable commerce. In the midst of all her busy arrangements she has not neglected the opportunity of possessing herself of two important stations on the American shore of the Pacific—the one at a place called New Archangel, in about 59 degrees of north latitude, the other at Bodiga Bay, in latitude 38 degrees, 34 minutes. At the former of these military positions, for the protection of her commerce, it is presumed, she has incurred much expense, and built a fort of great strength, situated upon one of the best harbors on the coast, standing upon a point of land projecting into the little bay, giving something of the appearance of a conical island in the centre of it; this fort is well supplied at all times with provisions and military stores, mounting one hundred and twenty cannon, carrying balls from eighteen to twenty-four pounds weight. That at Bodiga is well constructed and supplied with cannon, and has a good harbor; at this point they have ammunition and merchandise in abundance, and find the Indian trade at this post as well as New Archangel very considerable; besides the fine condition of this fort and its defences, they have many field-pieces, some of brass, of the finest construction, in good order and well mounted.

All these supplies have been conveyed to those places through immense oceans, round Cape Horn, which would have appalled any but Russian policy and perseverance.

The light articles destined for this trade are transported from St. Petersburg in sledges, which will perform in three months that which would require two summers of water-conveyance to effect; their communications are open to Kamtschatka, to Fort St. Peter and St. Paul, by Okhotak, in the Pacific, where they have the finest harbor in the world; the distance is estimated at ten thousand miles. The nation which can encounter such journeys as these, often through seas of ice, and storms of snow so terrible as to obscure an object beyond the distance of a few paces, to prosecute any branch of commerce, must be well and fully informed of its value. That the objects she has in view may not, by any event, be taken from her grasp, after encountering such vast difficulties, she has found it expedient to occupy one of the Sandwich Islands, which not only enables her effectually to maintain her positions, but to command the whole northern part of the Pacific Ocean. These islands, lying just within the tropics, in the direct course from the lower coast of North America to Canton, are well supplied not only with all the fruits of that climate, but with every vegetable and animal known in this country.

It is worthy of remark, that among other advantages which the Russian position on the opposite coast possesses, is, that a voyage from Kamtschatka to Japan can be made in an open boat, as it is a continued chain of islands from the Okhotak sea until it arrives at its place of destination.

Your committee are well persuaded that, by a little care and small expense, the citizens of this Republic might reap all the benefits of this trade, not only profitable now, but from every view of the subject there is a strong probability that it will increase for many years.

Were an establishment made at the mouth of Columbia, which should be allowed to take with them their women and children, there can be no doubt of success, as so many years' experience of the English fur companies have amply shown this mode has the most powerful effect in separating the minds of the men from pursuits which often in frontier countries lead to strife, as it gives them a local interest and feeling, and makes them even more vigilant and prudent in the discharge of all their duties. It is believed that population could be easily acquired from China, by which the arts of peace would at once acquire strength and influence, and make visible to the aborigines the manner in which their wants could be supplied. The coast of the Pacific is, in its climate, more mild than any part of the continent in the same parallel, and many vegetables on that shore grow in great abundance in the native forests, which are likewise natives of China.

It is known that when the Spanish Government, in 1789, sent their ships of war up the coast to capture the British vessels which were intruding, they found seventy Chinese, whom the English had procured to emigrate, that they might be employed in the mechanic arts; and, though the people of that country evince no disposition to emigrate to the territory of adjoining princes, it is believed they would willingly, nay, gladly, embrace the opportunity of a home in America, where they have no prejudices, no fears, no restraint in opinion, labor, or religion.

The committee cannot doubt that an establishment made on the Pacific would essentially benefit the natives, whilst it would give this country the advantage of all its own treasures, which otherwise must be lost forever, or rather never enjoyed; and, from all that can be ascertained relative to its present and increasing value, of more profit to this country than the mines of Potosi.

From the best information which can be had, it appears that the Indian trade on the Missouri, below the Mandan villages, is worth about $120,000, and that on the Mississippi is valued at $250,000, making the sum of $370,000 annually. They have reflected upon this trade, and that prosecuted by the whalers on that coast, and are irresistibly drawn to the conclusion, that they are the most valuable to this nation, and demand its care and attention in a high degree. This trade, unlike any other, originates its own capital, and may fairly be said to bring into the United States $370,000 every year, where not one dollar previously existed, and adds that much to the wealth of the community as decidedly as though it had been fished from the bottom of the rivers in gold and silver, as it is in the market of China, or any other market, capable of purchasing as much; and if, with that amount in furs, a vessel should sail from the mouth of the Columbia to Canton, which is a voyage of from fifty to seventy days, she would return with that in exchange which would sell for perhaps double that amount, thereby contributing to the comfort, enjoyment, and accommodation of the community, $740,000, which is the result not of a profitable voyage, but a creative trade.

It is believed that a shipment of tobacco, flour, or cotton, bears no comparison, in point of profit, with this, as they are properly the rough manufactures of the country, and the result of considerable capital, and the cargo brought back in return for them, in European or other fabrics, is only an increased value they receive by being exported and returned to us in that shape. Hence, the exportation of $370,000 worth of tobacco or cotton, should it return to us $740,000 in European silk and cloth, is still the original cargo of tobacco or cotton, as nothing but these have been paid for them; but, in the first instance, he who manufactures either the tobacco, flour, or cotton, is compelled to take into consideration the capital employed, and then the balance is his gain; but in the fur trade and the whale fisheries, there is in the one little capital, in the other none.

Under the strongest belief that by a new organization of the system of Indian trade, comprehending a settlement on the Columbia River, great benefits would result to the citizens of the Republic, whilst the aborigines would be better protected and provided for by instructing them in agriculture and the minor branches of the mechanic arts, the committee ask leave to report a bill.

Naval Peace Establishment.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed, on the 11th instant, to inquire into the expediency of limiting by law the number of seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to be annually employed in the service of the United States, and also into the expediency of reducing the number now actually in service, made a report thereon; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union. The report is as follows:

That, by an act of Congress, approved the 3d of March, 1801, a Naval Peace Establishment was fixed by law, providing the number of ships which should be kept in constant service, in time of peace, and that the residue should be laid up in ordinary, with a sailing-master, certain petty officers, seamen, and marines attached to each vessel thus laid up; authorizing the President to officer and man the vessels to be retained in actual service, as he might direct, limiting him, however, to two-thirds of the then present complement of seamen and ordinary seamen, (by which the committee understand the two-thirds of the then full crews of the ships retained,) limiting the number of captains, lieutenants, and midshipmen, to be retained in the navy service in time of peace, and authorizing the President to discharge all the other officers in the navy service of the United States. That, by another act of Congress, approved April 21st, 1806, the President was authorized to keep in actual service, in time of peace, as many of the frigates and other armed vessels of the United States, as, in his judgment, the nature of the service might require, and to cause the residue to be laid up in ordinary in convenient ports; and the President was authorized to officer and man the public armed vessels in actual service in time of peace as he might direct; but the act just referred to limited the number of captains, masters commandant, lieutenants and midshipmen; it limited, too, the number of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to nine hundred and twenty-five, and authorized the President to appoint, for the vessels in actual service, as many officers of the grades therein mentioned as might, in his opinion, be necessary and proper. That, by another act approved March 3d, 1807, the President was authorized, in addition to the then present Naval Peace Establishment, to employ a number of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, not exceeding five hundred, should the exigency of the public service require it. That, by another act, approved January 31st, 1809, it was provided that, in addition to the frigates then employed in actual service, there should be fitted out, officered, and manned, four other frigates by name; and that the President might equip, man, and employ, in actual service, as many of the public armed vessels, then laid up in ordinary, and gunboats, as, in his judgment, the public service might require; and, for the purpose of carrying the provisions of the said act into effect, the President was authorized, in addition to the number of petty officers, able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, then authorized by law, to appoint, and cause to be employed, three hundred midshipmen, three thousand six hundred able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to be engaged to serve for a period not exceeding two years, but subject to be sooner discharged. That, by another act, passed June 28th, 1809, the President was authorized, in the event of a favorable change in the foreign relations of the country, to cause to be discharged from actual service, and laid up in ordinary, such of the frigates and public armed vessels as, in his judgment, a due regard to the public security and interest would permit. That, by another act of Congress, passed March 30th, 1812, the President was authorized to cause to be immediately repaired, equipped, and put into actual service, three frigates by name; and it was provided, that the officers and seamen of the navy might be increased so far as was necessary to officer, man, and equip, the vessels so to be put into service. That, by another act of Congress, passed January 2d, 1813, it was provided, that the President should cause to be built, equipped, and employed, four ships, to rate not less than seventy-four guns, and six to rate forty-four guns each; and the number of commissioned and warrant officers, petty officers, able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to be employed on board each of the said ships of seventy-four guns, was fixed by the act; the crew, so far as it consisted of seamen and boys, was limited to two hundred able seamen, and three hundred ordinary seamen and boys. That, by another act, passed March 3d, 1813, the President was authorized to have built, manned, equipped, and commissioned, for service, six sloops of war, and, also, to have built or procured, as many sloops, to be employed on the lakes, as the public service might require; and by the second section of the last-mentioned act, the President was authorized to appoint such officers, and to employ such number of seamen, as might be necessary for such vessels as were authorized by law to be put in commission, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The committee have thought it proper to give to the House a brief view of the progress of legislation in relation to this subject, and they believe the foregoing sketch substantially to present it. Upon a reference to the various acts of Congress before referred to, it will be found that, both in the years 1801 and 1806, there was a Naval Peace Establishment fixed by law, limiting not only the number of seamen and boys, but of officers also. It will be found, too, as your committee believe, by reference to dates compared with the history of the country, and indeed to the language of some of the acts of Congress themselves, that the subsequent provisions, in relation to the Naval Establishment of the United States, had reference directly to what either then was or probably soon would be, the relation of the country to foreign Governments; in short, that they looked directly to a state either of actual or probable war.

Your committee understand the resolution referred to them to relate to the number of seamen and boys necessary to be employed in time of peace, and whether that shall be fixed by law. In the present state of things the only limitation upon the number of seamen is to be found in the appropriation bill, which, in effect, annually limits the number to be employed by the amount of the appropriation annually made for that object. Your committee believe, that the proper office of the appropriation bill, is, as far as practicable, to provide means for objects authorized by existing laws; there are, indeed, cases which, on account of the contingent or uncertain character of the expenditure, constitute exceptions to this rule; but, in general, the rule is considered as a sound one.

Your committee would further remark that, in investigating this subject, they have extended their inquiries beyond the mere scope of the resolution, into the propriety of fixing a Naval Peace Establishment, embracing as well the number of officers as ships to be kept in the service of the United States in time of peace; and they beg leave shortly to submit some of their reasons for thinking that there should be a Peace Establishment in the Navy as well as the Army. Although, by the Constitution of the United States, the President is Commander-in-chief of the Army and Navy, yet it belongs to Congress to "raise and support" the one, and to "provide and maintain" the other; the power to provide and maintain implies that of determining the quantum; a question the decision of which ought not to be left, in the opinion of your committee, to the Executive Department, and yet, in practice, it is in effect left to Executive decision; for, as has been before remarked, there being no permanent law in force limiting the number of officers, ships, or men, to be kept in service, the only limitation is in the amount of appropriation; and your committee believe that in practice the amount of the estimates has generally been appropriated, without discussion in Congress as to the necessity of them. Whatever confidence we may have in the Executive, it seems not to be right, in principle, to leave to its discretion, in effect, the decision of a question which belongs to the Legislature.

Your committee believe that in Great Britain, though the number of seamen is not fixed by a permanent law, yet it is settled by the annual vote of Parliament. If there were probable danger of war, or difficulty in our foreign relations, it might not be inexpedient to fix the number of seamen by a permanent law, but, in the present circumstances of the country, it seems to your committee it may be done. It will be remembered it is a Peace Establishment which is contemplated; when war shall come, or even upon its probable approach, both the Army and Navy will doubtless be placed upon a footing suited to the then altered state of the country.

Your committee would further remark, that an additional reason with them for inclining to a Peace Establishment, is to fix the number of officers who, they believe, in many grades, are too numerous, and yet for all whom, unless their number shall be reduced by law, an appropriation must be made.

Your committee are aware that this is a difficult and delicate subject; the officers of the Navy in the recent war not only distinguished themselves, but, by breaking the charm of invincibility belonging to the British Navy, contributed much both to our glory and our solid strength as a nation. The committee are also aware that many of them have devoted some of their best years to their profession; yet, if the interest of the country requires a reduction, painful as the duty is, it is one which ought to be performed. In relation to the number of ships to be retained in service, the reasons which would prove the propriety of fixing the number of seamen, would apply with full force to them; indeed, it is another state of the same question, in substance, since, if the number of seamen be fixed, no more vessels will be employed than they can man; and the fixing a certain maximum of seamen is considered a more judicious course than to fix the number of ships, inasmuch as the President will then be left at liberty to use such classes of vessels as may, in his opinion, be best adapted to the nature of the service; the aggregate of the guns, however, being limited by the number of men allowed to man them.

Your committee have said, that they consider the officers of many of the grades as too numerous; they will now proceed to state the grounds of their opinion. They have not for a moment entertained the idea of paring down the officers of the Navy to any thing like a mere sufficiency to officer the ships to be actually retained in service in time of peace; it is obviously impossible, upon this subject, to select any given number, and show that it is precisely the right one; some reasonable rule must be adopted.

Your committee have acted upon the principle that, whilst, on the one hand, the mere number of officers necessary for the vessels in actual service is not sufficient, with a view to the future progress and prosperity of the Navy, on the other, it would be entirely out of the question to employ, in time of peace, as many as would officer our whole Navy, built and to be built, in time of war. They have, therefore, selected what they consider a medium between these extremes; it appears, by the Naval Register of 1821, that the total number of guns of our ships, which are built, equipped, and launched, (which description includes the three line-of-battle ships Ohio, North Carolina, and Delaware, which are believed not to be equipped,) amounts to seven hundred and ninety-seven, of all classes of vessels, gunboats included.

Your committee have thought that, if we retained in service in time of peace a sufficient number of commissioned and warrant officers to officer all those upon the War Establishment, it would afford a liberal Peace Establishment. Bringing the number of officers to this standard, the committee find that there are various ranks in which the present number considerably exceeds that which would be required by the rule just stated; they will descend to particulars in a few grades, in which the excess is relatively most considerable; thus, upon this scale, there is an excess of fifteen post captains; of twenty masters commandant; of seventy lieutenants; of twenty-seven surgeons; of more than forty sailing-masters. There are, perhaps, two or three grades in which an allowance of a few more than even this scale would produce, might be judicious; amongst them, probably, might be placed the midshipmen, who may be considered as constituting the nursery of the future commanders of our ships; this, however, would only vary the result in an inconsiderable degree. The committee forbear to go into further detail upon this subject, because, if the House should adopt the principle, the detail could be presented in a bill.

Missouri—Resolution from the Senate.

[H. OF R.]

As to the seamen, if it should be decided to fix the number by law, the resolution then directs the committee to inquire into the expediency of reducing the number now in actual service. Upon this subject the committee would remark, that it will be seen, by adverting to a letter from the Navy Department, under date of the 11th December, 1820, amongst the printed documents, that the whole force of the vessels of war in the actual service of the United States, amounts to about three hundred and thirty-five guns, distributed as is mentioned in the same letter. Your committee incline to the opinion, that the following diminution of that force may be made without injury to the public service, viz: instead of corvettes and a sloop on the coast of Africa, whose object is the suppression of piracy and the slave trade, three of the schooners authorized by the act of the last session would be sufficient, making a deduction of 34 guns; instead of a 36 gun frigate in the Indian Seas, the corvette Cyane of 28 would be sufficient, making a deduction of eight. If to these deductions be added the force of the Macedonian and Ontario, of which the one is returning after being replaced by the Constellation, and the other is proceeding to take the place of the Peacock, amounting together to 54 guns, the whole force which would remain after these deductions from that now in service, would be 289 guns; but suppose an additional number of 36 guns to be included for any contingent service, such, for example, as the replacing of a vessel returning from a cruise, then the whole force which, according to the views before presented, would be necessary, would be 275 guns: to man this force upon a War Establishment, if the committee have not erred in calculation, would require 856 able seamen, 802 ordinary seamen, and 195 boys; to this add, according to a document of the last session, for the ships in ordinary, navy yards, and navy stations, 287 able seamen, 814 ordinary seamen, and 67 boys; and the aggregate is of able seamen 1,143, of ordinary seamen 1,116, and of boys 262; total of able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, 2,521. The estimate from the Navy Department for the service of the year 1821, embraces 1,322 able seamen, 1,307 ordinary seamen, and 293 boys; making an aggregate of 2,922; from which it would seem that, if the force suggested by the committee be retained in service, there might be a reduction of about 411, viz: 187 able seamen, 191 ordinary seamen, and 31 boys.

Upon the whole view of the subject, the committee beg leave to recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That a Naval Peace Establishment ought to be fixed by law.

Missouri—Resolution from the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and the resolution from the Senate, for admitting Missouri into the Union, with a caveat against the provision, if there be any, which conflicts with the Constitution of the United States, was taken up.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out the proviso (or caveat) from the resolution, but waived his motion for the present, to accommodate Mr. CLAY, who wished to address the committee on the whole subject.

Mr. CLAY then delivered his sentiments at large on the present state of this question. He was in favor of the resolution from the Senate, and should vote for the resolution, even though more emphatically restricted against any supposed repugnance of one of its provisions to a provision of the Constitution of the United States, the existence of which, however, he did not by any means admit.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded—

Mr. RANDOLPH renewed his motion to strike out the proviso, and spoke for about fifteen minutes in support of it.

Mr. LOWNDES deprecated the motion, as going to present to the House the naked question which it had already decided in the negative, and as preventing a decision upon the proposition as it now stands.

Mr. BARBOUR assigned the reasons why he should vote against the motion; himself regarding the proviso as useless and unnecessary, but willing to retain it to gratify gentlemen who were of a different opinion.

Mr. SERGEANT inquired whether it would be in order, this proviso being stricken out, to move to introduce a different one.

The CHAIRMAN decided that it would.

The question was then taken on striking out the proviso, and decided in the negative, 82 to 54. So the proviso was retained.

Mr. STEVENS assigned the reasons why he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the resolution by adding to it another proviso, that it be taken as a fundamental condition on which said State is admitted into the Union, that so much of the constitution as requires the Legislature to pass laws to prevent the migration of the free people of color thither, shall be expunged from the constitution of the State within two years from this time, in the mode prescribed for amending the constitution. [This would admit Missouri into the Union forthwith on the condition stated.]

Mr. FOOT observed, that he could not consent that the question be taken on this resolution, with a certain prospect of its rejection, without making one effort for an amicable settlement of this distracting question. I have, therefore, said he, risen for the purpose of offering an amendment to the resolution—not with the vain hope that this particular amendment will be adopted, but with a sincere desire (if I know my own heart) to afford to gentlemen an opportunity of proposing such modifications of the amendment as will unite the votes of a majority of this committee, who appear to be desirous of admitting Missouri into the Union upon terms which will not compromise principle.

It is due from me, and the committee will expect, a candid and plain statement of my views of the effect which will be produced by its adoption. The majority of this House have already decided that the constitution of Missouri does not contain a provision which, in their opinion, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It has not been proposed by any gentleman to revive the question of restriction, so much agitated at the last session; and it may be presumed no such intention exists. This amendment proposes the admission of Missouri into the Union upon a certain condition. The act for the admission of Louisiana into the Union, furnishes a precedent for the course now proposed. The condition proposes that Missouri shall expunge the offensive article from her constitution, in the manner provided by her constitution for its amendment, and give sufficient time for the amendment, without the trouble and expense of calling a convention for the purpose.

Mr. BALDWIN having expressed his intention to vote for this proposition—

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the amendment by adding words to this effect: "so far as the same (the clause of the Missouri constitution) tends to deprive citizens of each State of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." This motion, however, he subsequently withdrew.

It being suggested, that other gentlemen had amendments which they wished to propose, and that it would be well to have them all presented to-day, so as to be examined and compared—

Mr. SERGEANT rose, as it might be supposed, from the question he had put, that he had an amendment to offer, to say that he had not; that he should vote for every amendment which should bring the resolution nearer to what he wished, but with a clear determination, for which he would hereafter assign his reasons, to vote against the resolution, however amended.

Soon after this, the committee rose, without coming to any decision; and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 30.

Missouri—Resolution from the Senate.

The House having then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the resolution from the Senate, for the admission of Missouri into the Union, was resumed—the motion of Mr. Foote being under consideration; which motion is to strike out the proviso to the Senate's resolution, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Provided, That it shall be taken as a fundamental condition, upon which the said State is incorporated in the Union, that so much of the 26th section of the 8d article of the constitution which has been submitted to Congress, as declares it shall be the duty of the General Assembly "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, or settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever," shall be expunged, within two years from the passage of this resolution, by the General Assembly of Missouri, in the manner prescribed for amending said constitution.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, spoke as follows:

I do not rise, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. B., to revive the discussion of the question of restriction, as it has been called, which was very elaborately argued and determined at the last session, nor for the purpose of provoking further debate upon the several questions, relative to the admission of Missouri into the Union, which have been thoroughly investigated during the present session. I am aware, sir, that the patience of the House, and I fear the patience of the people we represent is much fatigued, if not exhausted, by the numerous editions of the same arguments which have been delivered upon the subject now under consideration. But, sir, as the subject comes from the Senate in a new shape, and as I seldom trouble the House on any occasion, I shall be permitted briefly to assign the reasons which will govern my vote on this question before the committee.

Sir, the resolution under consideration, if possible, is more exceptionable than that which was reported by a committee of the House, and rejected. Those who doubted whether any provision in the constitution of Missouri contravened the Federal Constitution, might support the former resolution, but cannot, I apprehend, agree to the resolution from the Senate now before the committee; because it admits and avoids the very point or matter in controversy. Sir, if you pass this resolution, you proclaim to the world a disregard of the sacred obligations imposed by the constitution of your country. The language of the resolution implies your right to examine and judge of the constitution of Missouri, and, also, that it is, or at least may be, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and waives the solemn obligation of supporting that sacred instrument.

Sir, if we must receive Missouri into the Union, under her present form of government, I hope we shall not, by the admission, convict ourselves of a breach of the constitution, and fix the mark of the beast upon our foreheads. The guilt of sinning against the constitution of our country, is not concealed by the magical proviso in the resolution, nor does it obviate in any degree the objection, or remedy the evil of which you complain. By this mode of procedure, if the constitution of Missouri had been throughout repugnant to the Constitution of the Union, or, as the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. STEVENS) said, a perfect monarchy, you might admit Missouri into the Union, protesting against the form of her government, or so much as might be supposed anti-republican in its features. Sir, I protest against this mode of legislating, by exclusions of conclusions, as it has been called by some learned doctors in politics, whereby the rights of citizens may be sacrificed, and the Constitution of the Union suspended.

JANUARY, 1821.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) said, admitting the clause of the constitution of Missouri, respecting free negroes and mulattoes, to be incompatible with the Constitution of the United States, it could not be an objection to her admission into the Union; because the legislators of Missouri would be bound by an oath to support the Federal Constitution, which would be paramount to the oath to support their State constitution, and of course would never make any enactment pursuant to that clause. Besides, he said, if they did enact any law in pursuance of that clause in their constitution, it would be declared void by the Courts of the United States. But, sir, though I admired the eloquence, the candor, and love of country, which that honorable gentleman exhibited in this discussion, I was not convinced by his argument.

The members of this House, as well as the legislators of Missouri, are under a sacred obligation to support the Constitution of the United States; and the act of Congress authorizing Missouri to form a constitution provides, in order to her admission into the Union, that her constitution shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. But, without this provision in the act, it is as much the duty of Congress to examine her form of government, and determine whether it is compatible with the constitution of the Federal Government, as it is to consider the same question on the passage of any law. Congress is the proper tribunal to decide this question, and cannot absolve itself from this sacred obligation by leaving it to the courts of the United States. But, if it were in our power, I would not turn this question over to the judiciary sooner than I would pass a law without inquiring whether it was within the constitutional powers of Congress, and trust wholly to the courts. Sir, would you admit a new State under a constitution giving its legislature power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to raise armies and declare war, and trust to the judicial authority of the United States to vacate the laws which might grow out of such powers, and to keep the administration of such State government within the pale of your Federal constitution?

If the judiciary could remedy all the evils which may grow out of the constitution of Missouri, I am not disposed to neglect my duty, and disregard the rights which are guaranteed even to the black man. The rights of the colored citizens, and it has been demonstrated by my friend from Massachusetts (Mr. EVANS) that there are many such in the Northern States, are as sacred as those of the white citizens.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) said, that a limitation or restriction upon the power of the Legislature of Missouri might be imposed, by adding to the resolution under consideration a provision, that no law should be enacted under the clause in question, to affect the rights of citizens of other States. But, sir, that gentleman must be aware that such a provision, though it be made a fundamental consideration of the administration, can have no force or effect against her will. No act of Congress can qualify or make void any article of her constitution after or at the time of her admission. Such a provision is no more than a naked proposition, which Missouri will be at liberty to accept or reject, and without her assent would be inoperative and futile.

Sir, though I am sincerely desirous to terminate the discussion, and settle the question at the present session, I cannot adopt such a provision, and trust to Missouri to expunge the offensive clause in her constitution.

Some conversation passed between Mr. LOWNDES and Mr. FOOT, as to the mode of proceeding.

Mr. FOOT observed he was very glad the gentleman from South Carolina had disclaimed any intention of applying his remarks to him. He appealed to that gentleman, or any member of this House, to point out a single instance in which any proposition made by him was designed or calculated, either to embarrass any subject or involve the House in difficulty, as suggested by the gentleman. He had uniformly opposed any attempt to effect an object by indirect legislation or by stratagem. He considered that the correct course in legislation was to meet every subject in an open, fair, and direct way, and he would never shrink from responsibility; and he assured the gentleman his object in proposing the amendment to the resolution, in preference to making it a distinct proposition, was, that he considered this the most regular course which could be adopted, and, in his opinion, most likely to effect the object which seemed to be wished by a great majority of the House.

With these impressions he could not consent to withdraw the proposed amendment, nor for a moment abandon the hope that on this, as a basis, the propositions of gentlemen might, by affording an opportunity for a free interchange of opinions, eventuate in the adoption of some amendment to the resolution by a large majority of this House, by which Missouri might, during the present session, be admitted into the Union; and, as the difference between the two sides of the question seemed not insurmountable, since gentlemen had distinctly disclaimed any intention to revive the question of restriction, he could not but cherish the hope that confidence and harmony would soon be restored in the national councils, and through the Union.

Mr. STORRS, after a few introductory remarks, moved an amendment to Mr. Foor's amendment, which was, to strike out all of the latter, after the word "Union," in the third line, and in lieu thereof to insert the following :

"And to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State impairing or contravening the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured to citizens of other States, by the Constitution of the United States: And provided, further, That the Legislature, acting under the constitution already adopted in Missouri as a State, shall, as a convention, (for which purpose the consent of Congress is hereby granted,) declare their assent by a public act to the said condition before the next session of Congress, and transmit to Congress an attested copy of such act, by the first day of the said session."

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, said he rose for the purpose of protesting against these proceedings, and opposing his voice to the assumption of enormous powers by this House; powers so great that the oldest statesmen, a few little years ago, would have trembled to assert. You have made deep inroads into the constitution, and if you now assume the power to legislate over a new State, I know not how soon you will exercise it over others; and I, as a Representative from an old State, can never consent to such usurpations.

Mr. COBB assigned the reasons why he could vote for neither of the amendments.

Mr. ROSS stated the reasons of his opposition to the resolution from the Senate, in any shape it was likely to assume.

Mr. HARDIN, in an earnest desire to see the question settled, was willing to agree to both the amendments.

Mr. RHEA, after making some remarks, moved the committee should rise, with a view to demanding the previous question, which would preclude all debate and amendment, and present to the House a naked and direct question on the resolution from the Senate.

Mr. CLAY earnestly opposed this course, as going to close the door on the spirit of accommodation.

The motion for the committee to rise was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. CLAY, then, after an earnest appeal to all parts of the House to bring to the future discussion of this subject minds prepared to harmonize, and forever settle this distracting question to mutual satisfaction, and expressing his desire more fully to examine Mr. STORRS's proposition, to see whether he could bring his mind to assent to it, as he wished to do, moved that the committee now rise, in order to have the several propositions for amendment printed.

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY then gave notice he should again call up the subject to-morrow.

Mr. LOWMEYER wished it deferred until Friday next, to give more time.

Mr. CLAY said he would compromise with his friend for Thursday. He did not like the idea of taking up this question on Friday.

Mr. COBB said that he proposed, at a future day, to offer the following amendment, which he now read, to follow the word "Union:—"

"That the Legislature of the State of Missouri shall pass no law impairing the privileges and immunities secured to the citizens of each State, under the first clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States."

This amendment was ordered to be printed, as well as the others.

THURSDAY, February 1.

Missouri—Resolution from the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution from the Senate, declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, and the amendments proposed thereto.

The whole day was spent in animated debate, and interesting proceedings.

The amendment moved by Mr. Foor, was to strike out the proviso of the resolution from the Senate, and, in lieu thereof, to insert the following:

"Provided, That it shall be taken as a fundamental condition, upon which the said State is incorporated into the Union, that so much of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution which has been submitted to Congress, as declares it shall be the duty of the General Assembly 'to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever,' shall be expunged within two years from the passage of this resolution, by the General Assembly of Missouri, in the manner prescribed for amending said constitution."

Mr. STORRS had moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the whole of it, after the word "Union," in the third line, and inserting the following:

"And to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State, impairing or contravening the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured to citizens of other States by the Constitution of the United States: And provided, further, That the Legislature acting under the constitution already adopted in Missouri as a State, shall, as a convention, (for which purpose the consent of Congress is hereby granted,) declare their assent, by a public act, to the said condition before the next session of Congress, and transmit to Congress an attested copy of such act by the first day of the said session."

After much debate, the motion of Mr. STORRS was negatived—80 votes to 61.

Mr. HACKLEY then moved to strike out all Mr. Foor's amendment, after the word "Union," and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"And to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State, to prevent such free negroes or mulattoes from entering into, and settling in, said State, as may be citizens of any of the States of the Union: And provided, further, That the Legislature, acting under the constitution already adopted in Missouri as a State, shall, as a convention, (for which purpose the consent of Congress is hereby granted,) declare their assent, by a public act, to the said condition, before the next session of Congress, and transmit to Congress an attested copy of such act by the first day of the said session."

After debate, the motion of Mr. HACKLEY was negatived—70 to 66.

Mr. COBB then moved the amendment previously suggested by him, viz: to strike out so much of Mr. FOOT's amendment as follows the word "Union," and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"That the Legislature of the State of Missouri shall pass no law impairing the privileges and immunities secured to the citizens of each State, under the first clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States."

After debate, this motion was negatived—74 votes to 65.

The question was then taken on Mr. FOOT's motion to amend as above, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

Mr. McLANE then moved his amendment, as stated; and then, after having previously several times refused to rise, a motion to that effect prevailed, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 2.

Report on Gold Coin.

Mr. WHITMAN, from the select committee, appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the relative value of the gold hereafter to be coined at the Mint of the United States, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill. The report is as follows:

The committee who were directed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the relative value of gold hereafter to be coined at the Mint, have attended to that subject, and beg leave respectfully to report, that they are of opinion the value of American gold, compared with silver, ought to be somewhat higher than by law at present established. On inquiry, they find, that gold coins, both foreign and of the United States, have, in a great measure, disappeared; and, from the best calculation that can be made, there is reason to apprehend they will be wholly banished from circulation, and it ought not to be a matter of surprise, under our present regulations, that this should be the case.

There remains no longer any doubt that the gold coins of the United States are, by our laws, rated at a value lower than in almost any other country, in comparison with that of silver. This occasions the gold to be constantly selected, when it can be obtained, in preference to silver, whenever required for remittance from this to foreign countries; and, at the same time, prevents those who have occasion to remit to the United States from doing it in gold. Hence there is a continual and steady drain of that metal from this country, without any correspondent return, which must continue while there remains any of it among us. The importations of it will be confined to small quantities, and from countries from which nothing better can be obtained.

There have been coined at the Mint of the United States nearly six millions of dollars in gold. It is doubtful whether any considerable portion of it can, at this time, be found within the United States. It is ascertained, in one of our principal commercial cities, quite in the vicinity of the Mint, that the gold coin in an office of discount and deposit of the Bank of the United States there located, in November, 1819, amounted to $165,000, and the silver coin to $118,000. That, since that time, the silver coin has increased to $700,000, while the gold coin has diminished to the sum of $1,200, one hundred only of which is American. And it is stated that the vaults of the State banks in the same city, having a capital in the aggregate, as is believed, of nearly eight millions, exhibit a similar result. It is scarcely to be doubted, that, on examination in the other commercial cities, similar additional proof would be furnished.

It now becomes a question of serious import, to be decided by the nation, whether a gold currency be at all desirable, or whether it should wholly give place to silver? By some a silver currency is deemed the most eligible. They contend that our circulating metallic currency should be ponderous, and inconvenient of transmission; that it would, in such case, remain in the country, and stationary.

On the other hand, it is believed, by your committee, that a more portable currency may be, on many accounts, and in many instances must be, much more convenient, and in some cases absolutely necessary. It cannot be denied, that the lighter and smaller the currency, in proportion to its value, the greater will be the accommodation in the negotiations between the great extremes of the Union. In proportion to this facility, the price of exchange will be lessened; commercial transactions would thus be carried on at an enhanced profit to all concerned. Moreover, in time of war, it will never fail to become requisite to make use of specie in payments and remittances; and these will be demanded, almost exclusively, at the extreme borders and frontiers of the Union. In such case gold furnishes a medium which will not only be light and convenient, but which can be transmitted with secrecy, thereby avoiding the risks incident to war and commotion. Those who carry their recollections back to the incidents of the late war, cannot fail of being forcibly impressed with this idea.

Our empire is widely extended, and becoming more so; and, at the same time, sparsely settled. The transmission of large sums, especially in time of war, if in ponderous silver, must be extremely inconvenient, and oftentimes attended with great danger. It would seem, therefore, that as currency, the gold coin has, in this country, manifest advantages over that of silver.

But there is another particular not unworthy of consideration. We have before stated that the gold coins are worth, in foreign countries, more, in comparison with silver, than in our own. The average of this increased value is believed to exceed six-tenths of a dollar in every fifteen dollars. In Spain and Portugal, three half eagles are worth sixteen dollars; in Cuba, seventeen; in the West Indies, generally, sixteen; in England, fifteen and one-fifth; in Holland, fifteen; and in France, fifteen and a half. These calculations may not be precisely as stated, but are believed to be nearly accurate.

In the United States, before the establishment of the present Government, it has heretofore been ascertained by a committee of Congress, that, by custom, the value of gold has been considered as equivalent to about fifteen and six-tenths of its weight in silver. This, without doubt, arose from finding this to be the average of the different values affixed to the gold in different foreign countries.

Why it was thought proper, on establishing the Mint of the United States, to reduce this value to fifteen for one, it is not now material to inquire. It is sufficient to know, from unhappy experience, that its tendency is to rid us of a gold currency, and leave us nothing but silver.

Your committee, therefore, in conformity to the foregoing sentiments, ask leave to report a bill.

The bill was twice read and committed.

Missouri—Resolution from the Senate.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the Senate's resolution for the admission of Missouri.

The following amendment proposed on yesterday by Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, being under consideration, viz: to strike out the proviso to the resolution, as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the assent of Congress to any provision in the constitution of Missouri, (if any such there be,) which contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

And in lieu thereof, insert the following:

Provided, That nothing in the constitution of the said State of Missouri shall be construed to authorize or make it obligatory on the Legislature to pass any law denying to the citizens of each State any of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States: And provided, further, That no law of the said State shall be construed to deny to the citizens of each State any of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.

A long debate took place, not so much on this particular amendment as on the whole subject of the evils of slavery, the rights of the South, the balance of power, the nature of the obligations and benefits of the Union, &c.

Mr. CAMPBELL rose and said, he was not ignorant of the anxiety of gentlemen on all sides of the House, to have the question now under discussion determined. Notwithstanding he felt this anxiety in common with others, he hoped a disposition to cultivate patience a little longer would be indulged, particularly when a member not in the habit of obtruding, wished to be heard.

Mr. C. said, the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) who presented the amendment now under consideration, had evinced so much candor, and so often repeated his invitations to those disagreeing with him on the main question, to meet him in the spirit of amity on his proposition to amend, that he would offer his reasons why he could not. What, Mr. C. asked, is the object of the amendment? If he understood its import, it is intended, at least indirectly, to alter the constitution of Missouri. If not to expunge the exceptionable clause, certainly to give it, or any act passed in conformity thereto, such an interpretation as the convention never intended. Whence does Congress derive this immensity of power? Or on what occasion has the employment of it been indicated? This doctrine is very different from that for which the gentleman at the last session so ably contended. At that time it was alleged we had no right to intermeddle with the constitution of a State about to apply for admission into the Union. If Congress be competent to interfere in any way, with one clause of the constitution of Missouri, an interference with another, and indeed with every other, would be equally admissible. Mr. C. said he considered the amendment a perfect cipher, and so would it, if adopted, be deemed by the people of Missouri. To any such modification their consent would be indispensable. And how was this to be obtained? Mr. C. said he knew of no way but through another convention, and he defied gentlemen to point out any other legitimate mode. Mr. C. said Missouri is unrepresented here; and if she were, who could believe her representation vested with power to enter into any compact binding on her, relative to her constitution?

Mr. C. said it had been remarked by many of the friends of Missouri, and by none with greater energy than by a distinguished member from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) that if the constitution of Missouri be incompatible with the Federal Constitution, it is so far void, and the legitimate tribunal for the decision of the question is the judiciary. This is a position, he said, to the correctness of which he could not in conscience subscribe. It was so repugnant to his views that he must reject it as most dangerous in practice. By an act of the last session we authorized the people of Missouri to form a constitution, which, among other conditions, was required to be in conformity to the Constitution of the United States. A constitution has been framed and submitted to us for inspection—inspection for what purpose? Certainly that we might decide upon its provisions, which if not repugnant to the rule prescribed, she would be entitled in good faith to admission—if repugnant, she must suffer rejection, with however much pain accompanied. To come to a decision in this manner, Mr. C. said, he conceived it to be the duty of Congress; a duty, from the performance of which, he could assure gentlemen he felt no disposition to shrink, by remitting it to the Judiciary. Is not the question fairly before us, and how can we evade a direct and unequivocal answer, regardless of consequences? Should Missouri be admitted, and that part of her constitution to which objection is made be brought to bear upon the rights of an individual, he believed the court ought to and would interfere. This he had always understood was peculiarly the province of the judicial department, where the constitutionality of an act was called in question. It was a power which he hoped would always be prudently exercised.

Missouri—Resolution from the Senate.

Mr. C. said he was willing, if it were thought necessary, to vote for another act or resolution to enable the people of Missouri to call a convention to form a new constitution, or to alter the present one in such a way as to obviate objections. Or if she chose to do this without the assistance of Congress, he for one would not be disposed to take advantage of the circumstance.

Mr. C. said, as he now had the opportunity, he would declare, he had yesterday listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) with impatience. That gentleman had assigned sundry reasons why the subject should be postponed until the commencement of the next Congress, when it could be settled more to the satisfaction of the nation. He thought the question was fully understood, as well as the bearings it would probably have upon our national character; and he, for one, was prepared to decide the naked proposition of admission or rejection. The gentleman has alluded to a strife for power, and if he understood him, he meant a power which was to be acquired by a new party. Such considerations, Mr. C. said, should have no influence on him in pronouncing judgment on a constitutional question. What, he would ask, could the new party, which it is supposed is now springing up, profit him, or the State which he assists to represent? Should it increase and attain full stature, could the North-west expect favors which are now denied?

Mr. CUSHMAN, of Maine, spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Not being habituated to parliamentary debate, and possessing a set of nerves easily disconcerted, I but seldom lift my voice for or against any thing. But, on this occasion, I have strong inducements to depart from my usual silence. Besides the right which I have, in common with others, of expressing my opinions, I now have reasons peculiar to myself. A man suspected of high crimes and misdemeanors—the high crime of a patriotic ambition—the misdemeanor of endeavoring to preserve the Union entire, by preserving the balance of its parts, may surely claim the right to be heard in his own defence.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that I am opposed to slavery in every form. And I contend against its extension on what I conceive to be the purest principles of humanity. It appears to me to be fraught with the most deleterious evils. It cannot but have an effect, in some instances, injurious to the finer feelings of the heart. I know, Mr. Chairman, that there are high-minded gentlemen, who not only seem to deny to the African the capability of becoming a citizen in this country, but also are inclined to refuse him a place on the roll of human beings. I shall attempt no learned analysis to prove that a negro is a man. I shall not contend that he is possessed of an organized human body, to which there is superadded a rational soul. The definition of man, by an ancient philosopher, is sufficient for my purpose—Animal bipes implume. If this definition be correct, it will follow that a negro is a man. He is certainly an animal with two legs; and though he may have something resembling wool, he is also without feathers—which corresponds to the definition given. And, if a man, he is "endowed with certain inalienable rights:" for, in the first article of the political creed of our country, it is declared to be a "self-evident truth, that all men are created equal." But, however this may be, it will be agreed that an African is endowed with a degree of sensibility—that he is susceptible of pleasure and pain—that many of the race are capable of strong sensations of gratitude and love. If so, these feelings, by their condition even in this country, must be injured to a degree at which humanity cannot but recoil. Who, unmoved, could behold the anguish of conjugal attachment, the yearnings of parental affection, the pathetic cries and tears of filial tenderness, which cannot but be felt and expressed, when husband and wife, parent and child, brother and sister, are forcibly separated from each other, and transferred, like beasts of burden, or as insensible property, from owner to owner! Sir, could I even reflect with indifference on such scenes of agony and human woe, I should be ashamed to claim kindred with the human race; and even blush to call God my heavenly Father. Slavery, sir, in our country, admits of no apology but stern imperious necessity. There is no color of excuse by extending to increase the evil.

But, though I contend against the spread of slavery, on humane principles, yet I never insinuated that these were my only motives. I have also strong reasons of policy. It is not, in my opinion, wise or safe to spread over a new country a population which, instead of adding, must impair its physical strength. A slave is neither a soldier, nor a seaman, nor an artisan, except of the lowest kind. Many of them are but menial servants, who do not reproduce the food which they consume. The earth, in general, is not so well cultivated by slaves, nor made to exhibit those scenes of fertility and beauty which are to be seen where the owners are the cultivators of the soil. Nor can a section of country, where the population consists but in part of slaves, furnish such numbers, for common defence, as can be spared in a free State, where every able-bodied man is a soldier. It is known that in all our wars, some of the slaves are too much inclined to go over to the enemy. This, to be sure, is wrong—but it is in a degree natural. For, according to Mr. Jefferson, if a slave has any country, it is not that in which he is holden in bondage. Allured by the hope held out by an insidious foe, they are ready to engage in some work of mischief or blood. Hence, in times of danger or invasions, a country so circumstanced, instead of furnishing its fair proportion of soldiers to oppose a public enemy, might retain somewhat of its physical strength at home for purposes of safety—to suppress domestic insurrection—to protect their wives and children, their altars and their firesides. It would be peculiarly impolitic to place our frontiers—those inlets of an invading foe—in such jeopardy.

The territories of the United States, the common property of the nation, are to become constituent parts of our Republic. Every portion of the Union, therefore, must feel a deep interest, that the population of the States, which are to be formed out of these territories, especially if the West is destined to be the seat of the empire, should consist, not of slaves, who might endanger the public safety, but of citizens—enlightened, virtuous, enterprising citizens—able to contribute to the ornament and defence of our common country.

It is, sir, in the nature of man, especially of irresponsible bodies of men, and all triumphant majorities are irresponsible when fortified by power, to be forgetful of right. Those but seldom obtain justice, who are not in a situation to cause its claims to be respected. The soundest maxims of policy require that no section of our country should gain such an enormous ascendancy as to give the law to the rest. It would, in time, crush the other under its feet. To guard against such an abuse, there should be preserved a balance of power—yes, sir, a balance of power. At the repetition of the phrase gentlemen seem to take the alarm. As if struck with a panic, they almost lose the balance of their minds, to say nothing of the harmony of their good feelings. The balance of power! exclaim gentlemen, in astonishment—as if they saw in it an ill omen, portentous of direful events—some dreadful calamity impending over our Republic. What do you mean, say they, by the balance of power? I mean, sir, in the nation, something like that equilibrium preserved in the natural world by the operation of the centripetal and the centrifugal forces of nature—the action of the one, and the reaction of the other. As on this equilibrium depends the order and harmony of the natural system, so on a balance of power resembling this depends the safety of our confederated Republic. But if gentlemen are displeased with this illustration, I will attempt another—I mean, sir, something in our Federal system, resembling the barriers which prevent the ocean from overflowing the land—fixed by the Almighty, when he said to its turbulent waters, “Hitherto thou hast come, but thou shalt proceed no further—and here shall thy proud waves be stayed.” This balance of power has been highly useful in other countries. When it has been entirely broken down, the consequence has been fatal to nations, as it has lately been seen in the convulsions of Europe. But fortunate, sir, for the world, by the magnanimous policy of the Emperor Alexander, this balance was restored, and nations, as the result, are beating their swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks, and seem to be inclined to learn war no more! I believe, sir, that a balance of power would not be without some salutary effect in this nation. It might restrain the intemperance of inordinate ambition in individuals, and check the proud assumptions of aspiring States. But, sir, to return from this seeming digression into which I have been led by the observations which have been made in the course of the debate, I have further to say, that the Northern and Eastern portions of this Union, for the purpose of preserving it entire, at the adoption of the Federal Constitution, submitted to an evil for which they could provide no speedy remedy. Our country was then bounded by the Mississippi, and little was to be apprehended, as the condition of the States was at that period, from an overgrown power, derived from a slave population. But could it have been foreseen that a territory west of that river, larger than the old thirteen United States, would have been added to our country, out of which new States, almost to infinity, were to be formed, with the privilege of holding slaves, I am persuaded that neither Massachusetts, nor any part of New England, and perhaps none of the now free States then extant, would have consented, on such terms, to have come into this Union.

Mr. TYLER said that he had, during the present session, maintained a profound silence on the interesting topic which had so long engaged the attention of the House and nation; that nothing but the exposé which had been made to the House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) could have induced him now to present himself to the notice of the House upon a subject so hackneyed. The remarks made by that gentleman were of a character so novel and alarming, that it would not become him to pass them by unnoticed. The gentleman (Mr. SERGEANT) had talked about the balance of power. What is it that the gentleman means by this language? Had he well weighed it before he gave it utterance? To his mind the gentleman had conjured up a fearful fiend. He had told us that no danger was to be apprehended from keeping alive this question. He had cried “peace, peace,” when he had presented himself as fighting under the banners of a fiend from which Mr. T. turned with fear and dismay. Look on the page of history, and tell me (said Mr. T.) what has been the most fruitful cause of war, of rapine, and of death? Has it been any other than this struggle for the balance of power? Desolation has, in all ages, marked its existence, and hecatombs of slaughtered victims have been raised to appease its fury. Sir, said he, it is a monster that feasts on the bodies of mangled carcases, and swills on human blood. And has it come to this, that we are now to enter into this struggle for power? And against whom do gentlemen propose to carry on this war? Against brethren—members of the same common family. It might be natural to wish to elevate ourselves to a superiority of power in reference to foreign nations; but it is unnatural, to say the least of it, for one section of a common country, to entertain a wish of the sort in reference to the rest. Equality is all that can be asked for, and that equality is secured to each State of this Union by the constitution of the land. But what is the character of the power sought now to be obtained by the gentleman and his associates? Do they want to secure to the non-slaveholding States a preponderance in the National Legislature? We have been told correctly by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) that they already have the preponderance of twenty odd votes. This, then, it is obvious, cannot be the power, for the acquisition of which they are ready to undertake this crusade against the South and West. I, said Mr. T., follow but the inference which the member from New York (Mr. STORRS) has drawn, when I express the hypothesis, that it must be a power of a different character which gentlemen are in pursuit of. It may be their purpose to elevate to high stations some particular favorites.

Missouri—Resolution from the Senate.

But what can a majority of this House hope to gain by this unhallowed struggle? It is a game at which only a few can win, and all that will remain to the majority of the actors in this drama will be the slave-like privilege of worshipping at the feet of an idol. And has it come to this, that, instead of looking to the advancement of our country's happiness, we shall now use our efforts to advance the political views of an individual? I should be willing to sacrifice myself on the altar of my country, for the common good. I idolize the institutions of this highly favored land; but I never will consent to become the idolater of any man on earth. I know but of one rule to govern me in selecting men for office, and it is found in the wisdom, intelligence, and virtue of the candidate. Whether he be born in Massachusetts or Virginia, is a consideration unworthy of being taken into the estimate. If, then, there be a man in this House or nation, governed by motives of a different character, in the name of virtue and patriotism, I demand that he shall abjure them.

The gentleman, (Mr. SERGEANT,) as another reason for postponing this question to the next session of Congress, urged the propriety of submitting it to the people, and intimated that they might be dissatisfied with a decision now. No man, said Mr. T., holds in higher reverence the wishes of the people than I do. The wishes of my constituents on any subject other than a constitutional question, would be my law. But they have elected us to act for them, and on this subject they leave us uninstructed. While it would but answer the end of our agency here to bow to their will, when properly expressed, it would be worse than degrading for us to hesitate about acting, lest we might incur their displeasure. In such a case as this, what would be the weight of their displeasure? Our country is agitated from one end of it to the other; a state of things exists calculated to fill the mind of the patriot with awful forebodings of the future; a breach has been made in the affections of this people for each other, which every day serves but to enlarge. Is there a man who hears me, who would not be willing, like another Curtius, to devote himself to destruction to heal this breach? Would you prefer the ephemeral popularity of the hour to the renown which lasts for ages? Our lineage would give the lie to such a slander. No, sir; let us not delay to settle this question, and forever. The gentleman tells us the majority alone will make a sacrifice by voting for any proposition of compromise. What is the fact? The South contends that Missouri should be instantly admitted into the Union; the North cannot agree to this, because it describes something in the constitution repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The answer to this objection has been repeated over and over again. If such, in truth, be the fact, let her come into the Union, and the Constitution of the United States will vindicate its own supremacy. Your objection, however, still remains unshaken, and you propose that she shall be admitted, upon the condition that her Legislature shall pass no law violatory of the Constitution of the Union. We meet you on this half-way ground, and close in with your proposition. Now, sir, where is the sacrifice of principle on either side? You guard the constitution from infraction, and we have no hesitancy in uniting with you in this good work. If, then, gentlemen are sincere in the objection which they raise, that objection may readily be removed, and I will still entertain the hope that this session will not terminate without the final adjustment of this odious subject.

The question being taken on agreeing to the proposed amendment, the Chairman pronounced the division to be in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 78.

The committee then rose, and reported the amendment to the House; and the question being put on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, the vote was—yeas 79, nays 88.

The resolution from the Senate being then again read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the State of Missouri shall be, and is hereby declared, one of the United States of America, and is admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the assent of Congress to any provision in the constitution of Missouri (if any such there be) which contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States which declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

Mr. STORRS moved to amend the same as follows, viz: Strike out from the word "declared" the balance of the resolution, and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"To be admitted into the Union as one of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, on the first day of the next session of Congress: Provided, That it shall be taken as a fundamental condition upon which the said State shall be incorporated into the Union, and to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State, which shall impair or contravene the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured by the Constitution of the United States to any persons who now are, or hereafter may be, citizens of other States, or to prevent such persons from removing to, and settling in, said State: And, provided further, That the Legislature, acting under the constitution already adopted in Missouri as a State, shall, as a convention, (for which purpose the consent of Congress is hereby granted,) declare their assent by a public act to the said condition, before the next session of Congress, and transmit to Congress an attested copy of such act by the first day of the next session of Congress."

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the motion by striking out the words "on the first day of the next session," where they first occur; and the motion was agreed to—78 votes to 71.

Mr. FLOYD moved to amend the amendment so as to make it read "citizens of the United States," instead of "citizens of other States." This motion was negatived by 79 votes to 70.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend the proposed amendment by striking out of it the words "or to prevent such persons from moving to and settling in said State." This motion was negatived by 79 votes to 70.

Mr. BARBOUR then moved to amend the said amendment by striking out the following words, viz: "That no law shall ever be enacted by the said State which shall impair or contravene the rights, privileges, and immunities, secured by the Constitution of the United States to any persons who now are, or hereafter may be, citizens of other States," and, in lieu thereof, inserting "that no law which may be passed by the said State shall be so construed as to impair or contravene the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured to citizens of the other States by the Constitution of the United States."

On the question being taken so to amend the amendment, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. CUTHBERT having called for a division of the question on Mr. STORRS's amendment, so as to take it first on agreeing to the following words:

"To be admitted into the Union as one of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, on the first day of the next session of Congress: Provided, That it shall be taken as a fundamental condition upon which the said State shall be incorporated into the Union, and to be of perpetual obligation on the said State, (in faith whereof this resolution is passed by Congress,) that no law shall ever be enacted by the said State which shall impair or contravene the rights, privileges, or immunities, secured by the Constitution of the United States to any persons who now are, or hereafter may be, citizens of other States"—

The question was so taken accordingly, and decided by yeas and nays—yeas 75, nays 92.

So the first part of the amendment was rejected, and the remainder fell to the ground of course.

Mr. S. MOORE then moved to amend the resolution of the Senate by striking out the proviso thereto annexed, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Provided, That the following conditions be taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the said State is incorporated into the Union, namely: that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted by the people of Missouri to the consideration of Congress, shall, as soon as the provisions of said constitution will admit, be expunged, or so amended that it shall not be applicable to citizens of any State in this Union; and that, until expunged or so amended, no law passed in conformity thereto shall be construed to extend to any citizen of either State in this Union.

The motion was negatived—ayes 56.

Mr. Clay's motion for a Committee of Thirteen.

Mr. CLAY, then, seeing that all effort at amendment had failed, and anxious to make a last effort to settle this distracting question, moved to refer the Senate's resolution to a committee of thirteen members.

This motion was agreed to, and the following gentlemen were appointed a committee accordingly:

Messrs. Clay, of Ky.,	Messrs. Archer, of Va.,
Eustis, of Mass.,	Hackley, of N. Y.,
Smith, of Md.,	S. Moore, of Pa.,
Sergeant, of Pa.,	Cobb, of Ga.,
Lowndes, of S. C.,	Tomlinson, of Ct.
Ford, of N. Y.,	Butler, of N. H., and Campbell, of Ohio.

SATURDAY, February 3.

Mr. McLANE submitted the following resolution, which of course lies on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the bounties and allowances paid to fishing vessels each year, from the commencement of the Government to the present time.

Appropriation Bill—Missouri in it.

On opening the first item of this bill, the Missouri question was discovered lurking in it!

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, having moved to fill the first blank in the bill with $314,866, to defray the expense and compensation to the Senate and House of Representatives, their officers, and attendants—

Mr. COBB moved to fill the blank with a smaller sum, presuming that the sum moved by Mr. SMITH was founded on estimates including the Delegate from Missouri. As there was no each Delegate recognized on the floor of the House, the appropriation ought to be diminished accordingly.

A good deal of desultory debate followed on this proposition, the leading features only of which are sketched below.

Mr. BUTLER, of Louisiana, inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whether the sum which he had proposed was intended to cover the pay for the Senators from Missouri.

Mr. SMITH said, the sum was proposed in conformity with the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, and was not predicated on any additional expenditure, as the State of Missouri had not been admitted. But at any rate the sum would be sufficient, because there was always, from the absence, the sickness at home, or the death of members, a considerable surplus left.

Mr. McLEAN said, the gentleman from Missouri did not present himself as the Delegate, but as the Representative from that State. Mr. McL. went on to remark, that this question about Missouri met them at every step, and in every shape; and it really would be better to postpone this bill, and, indeed, all other important bills, until that embarrassing question could be settled. With that view he moved that the committee now rise, and report progress.

Mr. TYLER coincided in opinion with Mr. McLEAN, and hoped the motion would prevail, especially as the public interest could not suffer from a little delay in passing the bill.

Mr. BALDWIN hoped the committee would not rise. The clause in question did not go into items at all, and it could not, therefore, well give rise to the question concerning Missouri, which had been started by the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion for the committee to rise was negatived—ayes 81.

Mr. TREMBLE spoke, to show that Mr. COBB would gain nothing, if he should even carry his motion to reduce the appropriation. The appropriation was made as though Missouri was a State; if she were not admitted into the Union as such, she must be abandoned altogether, or must be legislated for as a territory, and that question would with more propriety come up in another part of the bill, making provision for the Territories. He thought it not necessary, therefore, to impede the bill by pressing this motion.

Mr. COBB observed, in substance, that the sum proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was either too large or too small. If intended to provide for Missouri as a State it was too small, as it did not provide for the Senators; and if otherwise, it was too large. He did not wish to bring up at all the question concerning the present character or condition of Missouri, but he did not think it right to appropriate for a Delegate unless for the Senators also.

Mr. LOWNDES remarked, that whether they took the larger or the smaller sum was immaterial, as either would be sufficient for the object in any event; there being always a balance of the appropriation left from this branch of the expenditure. The adoption, therefore, of either sum proposed, could involve no question relative to Missouri.

Mr. McOULLOUGH did not conceive that the appropriation involved the Missouri question at all. They made appropriations for the Senate and House of Representatives generally, without undertaking to say who were Senators and members. Such as were so would come forward and receive their pay, and no others. This appropriation was intended for the current year; if Missouri should be admitted, her members in both Houses would be paid of course; if not, the money would remain in the Treasury.

Mr. TREMBLE said, the gentleman had told the committee how the members were to be paid if that State should be admitted; but suppose Missouri should not be admitted, Mr. T. asked, how her Senators and members were to draw their pay then?

Mr. McOULLOUGH was understood to say, in reply, that if the State were not admitted, her Senators could not be paid under this appropriation; and that it would require a special vote of Congress to authorize them to draw pay.

Mr. LIVERMORE, by way of obviating all difficulty, moved an amendment, containing a separate appropriation of the necessary sum for the Senators and member from Missouri.

This motion was agreed to—yeas 50, nays 44.

South American States.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the General Appropriation Bill.

Mr. CLAY moved the amendment, which he a few days ago intimated it to be his intention to propose to the bill, and was as follows:

“For an outfit and one year’s salary to such Minister as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any Government of South America, which has established and is maintaining its independency on Spain, a sum not exceeding $18,000.”

Mr. CLAY followed his motion with a speech of more than an hour’s length in its support.

Mr. LOWNDES submitted briefly the reasons why he conceived the adoption of the proposition at this time inexpedient, and the mode of obtaining the object improper.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, spoke at large against the motion.

When Mr. R. had taken his seat—

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, advocated, decidedly and earnestly, an immediate and unqualified recognition of South American independence.

Mr. STEVENS, of Connecticut, followed on the same side, and spoke at some length in support of the amendment.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, also advocated, at some length, the adoption of the proposition.

Mr. CULPEPER, of North Carolina, stated succinctly why he should vote for the amendment.

Mr. CLAY again occupied the floor some time in reply to Mr. LOWNDER, and in a zealous support of the proposition.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, briefly offered the reasons which influenced him to oppose the proposition.

The question was then taken on adopting the proposed amendment, and decided in the negative. For the amendment 78; against it 77.

The committee then rose and reported the bill and the amendments made thereto, to the House.

WEDNESDAY, February 7.

A new member, to wit, from North Carolina, WILLIAM S. BLACKLEDGE, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of Jesse Slocumb, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

SATURDAY, February 10.

Missouri—Mr. Butler's Proposition.

Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, submitted the following joint resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of Missouri be, and they are hereby, authorized to form a new constitution, or to alter the constitution which they have already formed and presented to Congress, in such way and manner as they may judge most proper, and submit the same to Congress, for the purpose of being admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. TOMLINSON said, the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire was certainly entitled to the deliberate consideration of the House, and, for the purpose of affording gentlemen an opportunity to examine the proposition, Mr. T. moved that it be laid upon the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Report from the Committee of Thirteen.

Mr. CLAY, from the Select Committee, to whom the subject was referred, delivered in the following report and amendment:

The select committee to whom was referred the resolution from the Senate declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit to the House the following report:

That they have entered upon the discharge of the duty assigned them by the House, with the most anxious desire to arrive at a conclusion which would give general satisfaction; that, in the prosecution of this purpose, it seemed to them to be useful to ascertain, in the first place, by a full and frank comparison of opinions among themselves, whether any, and what, conditions ought to be prescribed to the admission of Missouri into the Union; that, on making this comparison, the opinion appeared to be nearly unanimous in the committee, that no other conditions ought now to be required than those which were specified in the act of the last session of Congress, providing for the admission of Missouri into the Union; and that, considering all the circumstances attending that act, the settlement which it made of the question of restriction ought not to be disturbed; that this opinion limited their subsequent inquiry to the consideration of the single question, whether the constitution which Missouri has formed for herself, contained any thing in it which furnished a valid objection to her incorporation in the Union? And, on that question, they thought that there was no other provision in that constitution to which Congress could of right take exception, but that which makes it the duty of the Legislature of Missouri to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from going to and settling in the said State. In regard to that clause, the same diversity of opinion existed among the members of the committee which had been previously manifested in the House—one portion believing it liable to an interpretation repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and the other thinking it not exposed to that objection, or that, if it were, the exceptionable interpretation was superseded by the paramount authority of the Federal Constitution.

With these conflicting opinions, the committee thought it best that, without either side abandoning its opinion, an endeavor should be made to frame an amendment to the Senate's resolution, which, compromising neither, should contain an adequate security against the violation of the privileges and immunities of citizens of other States in Missouri; and, a majority of the committee thinking that such security could not be sufficiently afforded without some previous act to be done by the Legislature of Missouri, the amendment was finally agreed upon, which they now beg leave to report.

According to this amendment, Missouri is to be admitted into the Union upon the fundamental condition, that she shall never pass any laws preventing any description of persons from going to and settling in the said State, who now are, or hereafter may become, citizens of any of the States in this Union; and, upon the Legislature of the said State signifying its assent to that condition, by a solemn public act, which is to be communicated to the President of the United States, he is to proclaim the fact, and thereupon the admission of the said State into the Union is to be complete, without any further or other proceeding on the part of Congress. To prevent, however, this amendment from being considered as impairing any right which may appertain to Missouri, in common with other States, to exclude from her jurisdiction persons under peculiar circumstances, (such as paupers, vagabonds, &c.), a further proviso is added, declaring that nothing in the said amendment is to be construed to take from Missouri, when admitted into the Union, the exercise of any right or power which the original States may constitutionally exert.

The modification which the committee thus respectfully recommend of the Senate's resolution, is the result of a spirit of concord, under the guidance of which they have anxiously sought, without the sacrifice of principle on either side, to reconcile the variant opinions among them. There cannot be a doubt but that Missouri, solicitous as she must be, to participate in all the high advantages of our excellent Union, will eagerly seize the opportunity of testifying her attachment to the Federal Constitution, by giving the solemn pledge which she is asked to make, to respect the privileges and immunities which it secures to citizens of other States—a pledge become necessary, in the opinion of a large and respectable portion of the House, by the terms which she has employed in a clause of her constitution. Nor will there be a doubt of the sincerity or efficacy of such a pledge. On the other hand, if, by postponing, for a short period, her admission into the Union—a circumstance every day less and less important, in consequence of the lapse of the time allotted to this session, those who thought her invested with a perfect right to be admitted, without delay, are not fully gratified, they will be consoled by the reflection that the amendment requires only the performance of a precise and simple act, which cannot be mistaken by the highly responsible officer to whom the judgment of its execution is confided; and the whole House must be gratified with any proper disposition of the subject, which will henceforth free the public deliberations from the agitation and disturbance to which it is but too likely always to give rise. And your committee believe that all must ardently unite in wishing an amicable termination of a question which, if it be longer kept open, cannot fail to produce, and possibly to perpetuate, prejudices and animosities among a people to whom the conservation of their moral ties should be even dearer, if possible, than that of their political bond. Sharing, as the committee do, largely in this sentiment, they respectfully submit to the House the amendment which they propose, in the hope that it will be received and considered in the same spirit in which it has been devised.

Strike out all after the word "be" in the third line of the Senate's resolution, and insert

"Admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the said State shall never pass any law preventing any description of persons from coming to and settling in the said State, who now are or hereafter may become citizens of any of the States of this Union: And provided, also, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday of November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof, the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete: And provided, further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to take from the said State of Missouri, when admitted into this Union, the exercise of any right or power which can now be constitutionally exercised by any of the original States."

The resolution, with the report, was, on motion of Mr. CLAY, ordered to lie on the table; and Mr. CLAY gave notice that he should call for its consideration on Monday.

South American Provinces.

Mr. CLAY rose, and submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence; and that it will give its constitutional support to the President of the United States, whenever he may deem it expedient to recognize the sovereignty and independence of any of the said provinces.

In offering this resolution, Mr. C. said he was influenced by the general solicitude which he felt on this subject, and by the conviction that there was a majority of the House in favor of an expression of a sentiment favorable to the cause of the people of the Spanish provinces. The vote of yesterday, to the contrary, was influenced, in a great degree, it was evident, by considerations of form. He had framed this resolution so as, he hoped, to be unexceptionable in that respect; and, though it did not go as far as he wished to go, it went to a certain extent in giving the countenance of this House to the exertions of the people of the South. Mr. C. said, as the subject was well understood, and he wished not to consume the time of the House, he should not debate the proposition, unless he should be obliged to do so by debate against it.

Mr. REXID moved that the resolution lie on the table, for consideration, as well because of the general importance of any proposition on this subject, and the propriety of acting on it with deliberation, as because the gentleman who was at the head of the Committee of Foreign Affairs (Mr. LOWMEDES) was this day absent.

Mr. CLAY stated that he had informed his friend at the head of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, who was absent from a temporary indisposition, that he intended to submit such a proposition as this to-day; and received for answer that he did not care about being present at the discussion, and did not wish to be sent for.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, made a few remarks, to show that the House ought to act with caution and deliberation on a proposition of this sort, which, for aught they knew, might compromise the peace of the country.

The question on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, resulted thus: For it laying on the table 71; against it 72.

So the motion was lost; and the question was stated on agreeing to the resolution.

Here arose a debate, which occupied the whole day.

Mr. WOOD first spoke in opposition to the motion; because it proposed to make needless professions, and was not therefore consistent with self-respect; because, if it had any object, it was an encroachment on the power of the Executive, and might produce a collision between the two departments of Government, which was much to be deprecated.

Mr. FLOYD referred to an early message of President Washington to Congress, to show that, at that time, the previous consent of Congress was thought necessary to the institution of foreign missions; thence, and from other considerations, arguing that this resolution, so far from interfering with the Executive prerogative, was a fair exercise of the undoubted rights of this House. Mr. F. also supported the proposition on the ground of expediency, and as going to counteract the policy of the Holy Alliance, by organizing a different policy on this side of the water, &c.

Mr. ARCHER required a division of the question, so as to take it first on the first member of the resolution. And the question was accordingly stated on agreeing thereto in the following words:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives participates with the people of the United States in the deep interest which they feel for the success of the Spanish provinces of South America which are struggling to establish their liberty and independence.

Mr. ROBERTSON deprecated the passage of the whole resolution as supererogatory, if not of injurious tendency. If it was intended only to apprise the Executive that this House would support him, that had been done by the vote of last session; if it was to express the sentiment of this House in regard to the subject, that too had been done by the vote of last session; and a repetition of such declarations could serve only to show a doubt of our own constancy. If, however, it was intended to goad the Executive into a departure from its hitherto wise policy on this subject, he was decidedly opposed to it, &c. Mr. R. concluded by saying, that as the proposition was divided, he should, though he deemed such a declaration wholly superfluous and unnecessary, vote in favor of the first clause of the resolution, and against the second.

Mr. WOOD then moved that the whole subject be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MONTGOMERY assigned the reasons why he should vote for the indefinite postponement, and, should that not prevail, against both branches of the resolution. He was opposed to the first part of it, as asserting what he did not know to be the fact, and what he did not believe to be the fact as regarded his immediate constituents—that the people take a deep interest in a matter wholly foreign to them. The second part of the resolution he wholly disapproved. He believed it to be the true policy of this country to stand aloof from this conflict, as the powers of Europe, more deeply interested, had done. Were we to engage in it, it was difficult to predict how it would end, &c. Mr. M. suggested, however, that the motion had an object something deeper than an expression of the opinion of this House, and that it might be intended to goad the President into a course of policy which his judgment did not approve, and which the nation did not wish for.

Mr. TYLER assigned the grounds on which, though he had voted against all the other propositions of the gentleman from Kentucky, he should vote for this. The first part of it, he said, asked him only to speak the sentiments of his constituents; and, knowing well their feelings on this subject, he could not hesitate to vote in the affirmative upon it. The second part of the resolution only proposed to declare, that the President of the United States enjoys so much the confidence of this House, that, whenever he should think proper to recognize the independence of any of the Southern provinces, it will support him in it. To this, Mr. T. had no objection. In voting for the whole proposition, he should only express the sentiment of his heart, a deep sympathy for a people struggling for liberty, &c.

Mr. WALKER expressed his sentiments decidedly in favor of the whole resolution. The subject, he said, was near his heart; and he would not hesitate to throw our weight into the scale of liberty. He enumerated several considerations which influenced him to this course, among which were the general duty of individuals and of societies to sympathize with and do good to one another; the similarity of the struggle of these provinces with Spain to that of our Revolution; the similarity, too, of their forms of government, &c. He was not afraid of trusting the President, and had no fear of committing him, by passing this resolution.

Mr. MERGER assigned the reasons why he was in favor of this resolution, and against the postponement. He disclaimed any want of confidence in the Executive; nor did the resolution go upon any such ground, but on the contrary, its very terms excluded such a conclusion. He considered it as differing widely in principle from the proposition to make an appropriation for sending a Minister or Ministers to South America. Adverting to the supposed power of the President to recognize the independence of a Government by receiving a Minister as well as by sending one, in which recognition the Senate would have no voice, it became this House, he said, to share a part of the responsibility which the Executive would incur by such a recognition. He doubted, himself, whether the President could recognize the independence of a foreign power, by receiving a Minister, without the consent of this House. By this resolution, without prescribing any thing to the President, that difficulty would be removed. With regard to his constituents, Mr. M. expressed in strong terms his conviction of the deep feeling which they entertain favorable to the South Americans. Though approving of the course of the President in regard to the colonies hitherto, more than he did of his course to the mother country, (alluding to the occupation of Florida during the Seminole war,) he should yet cheerfully vote for the whole resolution.

Mr. CRAIGT stated the reasons why, though

South American Provinces.

approving of the sentiments in the resolution, he could not vote for it. He considered the question to be the same in substance as that to which he yesterday gave a negative vote. So far as the provinces were engaged against the Spanish Government, they had his best wishes and sincere sympathy; but, he suggested, that, according to the best accounts we have, their struggle is more amongst themselves, and, so far, was one in which we could feel no sympathy. He expressed his surprise at the comparisons which had been so often made between the case of these provinces and that of our Revolution, between which the resemblance was at least remote. Believing that the power of recognition was confided to another branch of the Government, both competent and disposed to exercise it when proper, and for other reasons which he assigned, he was opposed to the resolution.

Mr. CORB assigned the considerations which induced him to doubt the propriety of passing this resolution, though entertaining a feeling of deep sympathy with the Southern provinces. He had, he said, almost a similar feeling in regard to the people of Old Spain, now regenerated and comparatively free. The relative situation of Spain and her colonies, he argued, was now essentially different from what it was two or three years ago. They were then struggling against a relentless tyranny; but there was now at least a probability (referring to the pacification between Morillo and Bolivar, and to other indications) that Old Spain would voluntarily do justice to the colonies. Mr. C. thought, therefore, it was not true policy at this time for this country to do any act on this subject, however inclined. For this consideration, and because he believed the Executive felt on this subject in the same manner as this House and the nation, and as he had indeed expressly said in his message, he saw no occasion for passing this resolution. It would be time enough to act, he argued, when the course of Old Spain was clearly marked out. If, however, the direct vote on the resolution was forced upon the House, he should vote for the first part, but against the second, believing that sound policy was opposed to it.

Mr. BALDWIN opposed the resolution, not from any hostility to its avowed object, but because it proposed to refer to the President an act which, in his opinion, it was not for him, but for the three branches of the Government collectively, to perform. If any thing was done on this subject, he wished it to be done by all the branches of the Government.

Mr. MACLAY opposed the resolution, although, were he to suffer his feelings to govern him, he should be in favor of it. The subject, he said, had been long before the Executive, and much deliberated upon. Before such a resolution as this was passed, Mr. M. argued, that gentlemen ought to be possessed of full information on the subject—of all the information which the Executive possesses, and by which its course has been influenced, that they might judge whether that Department had or had not performed its duty. Believing that it had done so, and would hereafter do so, he was against the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS defended the constitutional right of this House to express its opinion on any topic of public interest. So far from interfering with the Executive authority, he regarded such expressions of opinion as facilitating the exercise of that authority, this being a Government of opinion, and as it must be desirable to the Executive to know what public opinion is, &c. With regard to this measure being a goad to the Executive, Mr. S. suggested that there was no reason to apprehend that the Executive of this day was to be alarmed or driven from his course by any such measure. He was in favor of the resolve as an expression of the opinion of this House, on a point on which he had no hesitation in expressing his individual opinion.

Mr. BROWN said, that he did not rise to enter into a lengthy argument, nor would he have risen at all had there not appeared a difference of opinion between two of his colleagues, (Mr. CLAY and Mr. MONTGOMERY,) upon a point in which the character of his immediate constituents and the State at large, seemed to him much concerned. He meant no less than a diversity of opinion as to the sensibility of Kentucky to the cause of liberty, in which the patriots of South America were engaged, and to the protracted suffering of that oppressed people. His colleague, the honorable mover of this resolution, (Mr. CLAY,) believed that the people of Kentucky took a deep interest in the struggle of the patriots of South America. His colleague (Mr. MONTGOMERY) did not know that his constituents felt such an interest. Mr. B. said, that he was free to declare it as his belief that the people of Kentucky did feel a lively and strong interest for the success of the Patriot cause; and that he was led to this conclusion, whether he judged from the expressions of those with whom it had been his pleasure to mingle, the rumor of the country at large, from the entertainments given in honor of his colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) at which sincere thanks had been expressed for his disinterested ardor and fervid eloquence, in support of the cause of the Patriots; or whether he judged from the almost universal expression of the wish of the people for the success of the Patriots, at each successive anniversary of our independence, when, in the social and festive circle, the feelings of the heart have been most free and undisguised. He said, finally, to trouble the House no further upon this point, that, whatever might be the feelings of the constituents of his honorable colleague, (Mr. MONTGOMERY,) he would unhesitatingly pledge himself to the House, that the people of that portion of the State which he had the honor to represent, did take a warm and deep interest in the cause of South American liberty.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, stated several objections to the resolution, among which were the following: That it attributed to the President a power (that of recognition) too important to be exercised by any authority less than the three branches of the Government; that it proposed to make this House, incompatibly with the constitution, the adviser of the President, thus taking from him a part at least of his constitutional responsibility; that it would afford a bad precedent, which, in future times, may be used, through the influence of the President, in this House; that it proposes that this House should compromise its successors in office, which it could not do, and which it was therefore improper to attempt, &c.

Mr. COOK opposed this resolution, though he had yesterday voted in favor of Mr. CLAY's proposition, because it proposed an empty declaration, after refusing an efficient act. So far from believing that such a resolution as this would aid the cause of the South American Patriots, he believed it would inspire them with contempt for the course of this House. It was saying, in connection with yesterday's vote, we wish you well, very well, but not as much well as eighteen thousand dollars.

Mr. CLAY then delivered a speech of half an hour's length in support of his motion. He opposed to one another the objections to the resolution, to show that they would not stand together, and therefore denied their claim to respect taken separately. He quoted the precedent of the resolution of Congress to support the President in any consequences which might follow the dismissal of the British Minister, Mr. Jackson, some years ago, and alluded to other precedents of expressions of opinion by this House. He ridiculed and reasoned against the argument that this resolution would hurt the feelings of the Executive, or encroach on his authority. It was, on the contrary, he contended, assuming only a fair responsibility on the part of this House, and adding strength to the Executive. He referred to the vote of last session, and the counter vote of yesterday, which appeared to him imperiously to require the passage of this resolution. He protested against the argument of the gentleman from Georgia, drawn from the situation of Old Spain, as absolutely founded on the idea that the colonies ought to repass under the yoke of Spain. The argument which denied the power of one Congress to bind its successors, would, he contended, equally apply to the most important acts of legislation, such as declarations of war, &c. As to the sentiments of the people on this subject, Mr. C. said that was a matter of fact which each gentleman must determine for himself, and vote accordingly. For his own part, he had no doubt what were the sentiments of his constituents on this subject; and, repeating a sentiment thrown out by Mr. MERCEER, he said, if they did not entertain such sentiments, so help him God he would not represent them. If the matter of fact was certain, he could see no reason against avowing it. With respect to the mode of recognition of foreign powers, Mr. C. reviewed the various opinions which had been expressed at different times, as well as to-day, on this subject. He concluded that both Congress and the Executive had this power, but that the most regular, ordinary, and usual course was by the Executive; and it was, therefore, proper to assure him of the support of this House, &c. There was a peculiar propriety, Mr. C. contended, in this House moving in this business, being the immediate representatives of the people, and the cause of South America being that of the people, as being the cause of human liberty, &c. Mr. C. concluded by saying, if this proposition did not satisfy gentlemen, it was impossible for him to conceive in what shape a proposition on this subject could be placed, so as that they could vote for it.

Mr. KINSEY made a glowing appeal to the feelings of the House in favor of liberty, and to its sympathies for those contending for it. The sentiment of the country, he argued, could not be doubted, and it ought to be expressed. If war should come, said he, in consequence of the expression of our opinion, let it come. He trusted no man would shrink from the expression of his honest opinion from any such apprehension as that. In reply to the question cui bono—what good was to come of this? Mr. K. drew a vivid picture of the scenes of our Revolution, and of the vivifying effect of the news of the recognition of our independence by France. Was it no good, he asked, that we should be instrumental in elevating so large a portion of the human race to the same rank as we enjoy, and to a participation of the blessings of freedom and liberty? Mr. K. said he had confidence that this question would carry. It must carry; and it would meet with the decided approbation of the people of this country.

Mr. SERGEANT delivered his objections to the resolution, though believing that, if the question were taken on the first part of it only, there would be but little or no objection to it. His objections were, in general terms, that it expresses an individual opinion, and professes to give a pledge which must be utterly inefficacious; that it is not a legislative act, and is not to lead to a legislative act; that it contains a declaration by which neither this House, the President, nor the Senate, would be bound; that it would involve the House in difficulties on constitutional ground; that, if Congress wish a recognition, having the power equally with the Executive, they should effectuate their wish by a legislative act; that, if the opinion of this House was to be expressed, even that should not be done without due inquiry and examination of facts, none of which had been placed before the House in any thing like an official shape; that the House ought to take care not to lose sight, in acts of kindness and expressions of good will to other powers, of the duty which it owed to this nation—to the interests of the people whom they represent; that general and vague oral information was not a sufficient ground for Congress to act upon; that, if official information was before the House requiring it to act, its act should be something plainer than this, and presenting on its face a direct proposition; that its not doing so, caused it to be more lightly considered and voted upon than it ought to be; that, however independent of the Executive, as an individual, this House might be, yet, with respect to the Executive as a branch of this Government, it was important that this House should not disturb the harmony of the different departments of Government, as adjusted by the constitution itself, and that it should not rush from its sphere, and jostle the others in their course.

Mr. BATES assigned his reasons for voting for the resolution. His reason was, that the Executive would look at both votes of this House, that of yesterday, and that of to-day. The vote of yesterday approved his conduct in not sending a Minister; this resolution did the same, assuring him of the continued and consistent support of this House—and on that ground alone he should vote for it.

Mr. REID assigned the reasons why he should vote against the second part of the resolution, should it not be postponed, because, to pass it would be without object, because, in principle and spirit, it was a repetition of the vote of last session, and, therefore, unnecessary, the vote of last year not being rendered nugatory by the vote of yesterday, but perfectly reconcilable with it; that the resolution, if it proposes to bind not only this House, but its successors, makes a pledge which it may be impossible to redeem; that it pledges, moreover, a support to an unknown act—to an act which may or may not be unwise or pernicious to the public interest; that such a pledge was an acknowledgment of Executive infallibility which it did not become the House to sanction. With regard to the first part of the resolution, Mr. R. said, he should vote for it, if presented to him, believing it to correspond fully with the feelings and wishes of his constituents.

Mr. ROBERTSON concluded the debate by some remarks in favor of the indefinite postponement of the resolution, on the ground that, to act on the subject, would be a useless consumption of time, and, having already once expressed the same sentiment, (at the last session,) would be an undignified proceeding. With respect to the bearing of this resolution, in one way or another, in regard to the Executive, Mr. R. remarked that it somehow or other had happened that, during the four years he had been in Congress, he had never yet voted with the Executive on any administration question, unless the Army question was considered one. In this course he had not been influenced by any disposition to embarrass the Executive, but his personal opinion of what was right. But, he added, whilst he would never vote for any proposition to gratify the Executive, he would never give his vote for any proposition calculated to embarrass and perplex him in the discharge of his proper functions.

The question on indefinite postponement was then taken and decided in the negative.

Mr. Foor, in order to get rid of a subject on which he considered the time of the House to be unprofitably occupied, moved to lay the resolution on the table.—Negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. WOOD moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto a proviso to the following effect: "Provided, That this resolution shall not be construed to interfere with the independent exercise of the treaty-making power."

This motion was negatived.

The question on agreeing to the first clause of the resolution was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 184, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Beecher, Blackledge, Boden, Brevard, Brown, Brush, Bryan, Burton, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Claggett, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Crawford, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Dane, Darlington, Davidson, Dennison, Dewitt, Dickinson, Earle, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Fisher, Floyd, Ford, Fuller, Gray, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hall of North Carolina, Hardin, Hemphill, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hill, Hobart, Hooks, Hottel, Johnson, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Kendall, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lincoln, Maclay, McCoy, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Meigs, Mercer, Metcalf, Monell, R. So this clause was agreed to.

Mr. MACLAY then moved to amend the second member of the said resolution by prefixing thereto the following: "That it approves of the course heretofore pursued by the President of the United States with regard to the said provinces." And, the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative without debate.

The question was then taken to agree to the second member of the said resolution, to wit: from the word and, after the word independence, to the end thereof, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbot, Allen of New York, Allen of Tennessee, Anderson, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Ball, Bateman, Bayly, Beecher, Blackledge, Boden, Brown, Bruah, Bryan, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Case, Clark, Clay, Cocke, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Darlington, Davidson, Dewitt, Earle, Fisher, Floyd, Ford, Gross of New York, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hendricks, Herrick, Hibshman, Hooks, Hostetter, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Kinsey, Kinsley, Lincoln, McCreary, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Marchand, Meech, Mercer, Metcalf, Monell, R. So that clause was agreed to.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the proposition, as a whole, and carried in the affirmative; and a committee of two members was ordered to be appointed to lay the same before the President.

MONDAY, February 12.

Missouri—Report of the Committee of Thirteen.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CLAY, proceeded to consider the report of the committee appointed on the Missouri subject. On motion of Mr. C. it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. And, also on motion of Mr. C., the House forthwith resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, to take the subject up.

The amendment proposed by the committee having been read from the Chair—

Mr. CLAY gave a detailed account of the proceedings in the committee, of the difficulty which interposed, and of the considerations which led to the recommendation of this amendment. This statement of course corresponded with that contained in the report of the committee. Mr. C. then went on to obviate some objections to the report which had been made by the friends of Missouri, as well as by those opposed to her admission into the Union. Although those in favor of her admission into the Union could not succeed entirely in their particular views, Mr. C. was of opinion that they had, as regarded the report of the committee, nothing to complain of. At the same time, the report was calculated to obviate the objections of those who had opposed the admission of Missouri on the ground of the objection to her constitution, which had been avowed. Thus consulting the opinions of both sides of the House, in that spirit of compromise which is occasionally necessary to the existence of all societies, he hoped it would receive the countenance of the House. Mr. C. concluded by earnestly invoking the spirit of harmony and kindred feeling to preside over the deliberations of the House on the subject.

Mr. MALLARY moved to amend the amendment proposed by the committee, by striking out all of it, after the word "respects," and, in lieu thereof, inserting the following:

"Whenever the people of said State, by a convention appointed according to the manner provided by the act to authorize the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain territories, approved March 6, 1820, adopt a constitution conformably to the provisions of said act, and shall in addition to said provisions, further provide, in and by said constitution, that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever be allowed in said State of Missouri, unless inflicted as a punishment for crimes committed against the laws of said State, whereof the party accused shall be duly convicted. Provided, that the civil condition of those persons who now are held to service in Missouri shall not be affected by the last provision.

This motion was negatived by a considerable majority.

Mr. TOMLINSON addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Having had the honor to be one of the committee which reported the resolution now under consideration, and dissenting to that report, I am aware that it is a duty incumbent on me briefly to state the grounds of such dissent.

By the act, passed at the last session of Congress, the inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri, included within boundaries therein designated, were authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, for the purpose of being admitted into the Union. This act provided that such constitution, whenever formed, should not be "repugnant to the Constitution of the United States." The inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri, under the authority of the act to which I have referred, have formed a constitution, and have presented the same to Congress. For what purpose? That Congress may perform a mere ministerial act, and admit that people into this Union as a matter of course? No, sir; Congress have a higher duty to perform. It is the duty of Congress to determine whether that constitution be republican and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

On examining this constitution it is found to contain, under the title of "the legislative power," a provision that it shall be the duty of "the General Assembly, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever." This provision is deemed incompatible with, and directly repugnant to, the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Sir, I have not been an inattentive observer of what has passed on this subject, so deeply affecting the feelings of Congress and the nation, and I do not recollect that, either in this House or in the Senate, (if it be not out of order to refer to the proceedings of that honorable body,) any other objection has been urged, during the present session, against the admission of Missouri into this Union. This House, after an elaborate discussion, has solemnly determined that this objection is well founded, and has rejected the resolution for the admission of Missouri into this Union, reported by the committee to which her constitution was referred. This expression of the opinion of this House, repeated in a variety of forms, renders it unnecessary, and, I may add, improper, for me again to agitate this question. A majority of this House have determined that the constitution of Missouri does deprive citizens of some of the States of the privileges and immunities of citizens in that State. I shall, therefore, take it for granted, (which, indeed, the appointment and report of the committee, now under consideration, evidently do,) that the constitution of Missouri is repugnant to that of the United States, and subversive of the fundamental principles of this Confederacy. In my judgment, the Constitution of the United States does not contain a provision more important than that which is infringed by the constitution of Missouri. Admit the principle, sir, that a State may restrain the citizens in the several States from coming to, and residing within it, and this Confederacy is at an end. Believing, therefore, that the General Assembly of Missouri are required, as soon as may be, to pass laws, which will deprive persons who are citizens of the several States, of all privileges and immunities of citizens in the proposed State of Missouri, I have been compelled to refuse her admission into this Union. She has no right to such an admission. Missouri has not complied with the provisions of your act. She disregards the distinguishing feature of our constitution. On taking my seat in this House, I solemnly engaged to support the Constitution of the United States. Entertaining the opinion which I have avowed, can I admit Missouri into this Confederacy, with a constitution containing a provision directly repugnant to that which I have sworn to support?

To admit Missouri with such a provision, I must approve it; I must give it to it my sanction. Sir, the Constitution of the United States is the charter of our liberties, and must be preserved inviolate. I stand upon its verge, and no encroachment shall be made upon it with my consent. When a new member presents herself to be admitted into this Union, let her bow to the constitution; let her submit to its paramount authority. If she be not prepared to do this, she is unworthy of this high privilege; she does not deserve the destiny she seeks.

Sir, I feel as great anxiety to see this "distracting question" settled as the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. OLAY,) but it must be settled upon constitutional principles. There is danger that any other mode of settling this question, instead of allaying, will increase the excitement which it has occasioned throughout this nation. Sir, there are two parties to this great controversy, and any settlement which should prostrate the rights of either ought to be reprobated. Great as is my anxiety to see this matter put to rest, to effect it I will neither renounce my principles nor surrender the privileges of any portion of the citizens of this empire. If a settlement of this grave question take place, the good, and, I may add, the peace of this nation, demands that it be satisfactory to all its parts. A "compromise," sir, which shall bring Missouri into this Union, may, indeed, put an end to this dispute here; but, let me tell gentlemen, that if, in a settlement of this momentous question, the feelings of a large portion of this community shall be disregarded, the peace of the nation may not be restored.

To insure such a desirable and happy result, it must be settled upon a fair, and just, and constitutional basis. To such a settlement, and to no other, will I assent.

After a long debate, protracted to a late hour, the question was taken in Committee of the Whole on the amendment to the Senate's resolution, as proposed on Saturday by the select committee of this House, and was decided in the negative—78 to 64.

The committee rose and reported their decision to the House; and, the question being on concurring in that decision—

Mr. STORRS moved to postpone the whole subject indefinitely.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, rose, and said that he must ask pardon of the House for having risen at so late an hour, and after so much anxiety had been evinced to take the vote; that he had not designed to address the House at this advanced period of the debate, although, having prepared himself upon the merits, he would have been glad to have found an opportunity, without contending for the floor with those better qualified to do it justice, before the subject had been literally exhausted; and that he would not now incidentally have said a word, but that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, near to him, who had just resumed his seat, (Mr. SERGEANT,) had, with a dexterity better adapted to the bar of a court than to the Hall of the House of Representatives, ingeniously, though unjustly, endeavored to cast from himself and the majority on the Missouri question, the odium of an argument, derived from its influence upon the balance of power in the United States.

Mr. B. said that his resentment at the offered injury would not admit of his remaining passive while the majority voted down the rights of Missouri, and then attempted to relieve themselves from responsibility, by endeavoring calmly and cunningly to throw the censure of so unworthy an argument used by them upon an injured minority, who, he had reason to fear, had so deeply suffered by the influence of the argument itself. Mr. B. said that, upon arriving at the seat of Government, and finding this question assuming an importance, and producing effects so little expected by him, he was led to expect that all was not right; that there was something artificial about it; and had, therefore, at an early period, set himself at work to investigate it to the bottom, and to develop, if possible, the real as well as ostensible considerations which had swollen it to such an alarming magnitude; and he begged it should be recollected that motives were not the less operative or dangerous for not being avowed. Mr. B. said that he had carefully reviewed the proceedings of the fifteenth Congress, in which this bitter subject was opened, as well as the speeches delivered by the advocates of the restriction, marking well the feelings and prejudices displayed, the suggestions made, and the principles avowed. He had pursued them with great attention and anxiety, and he believed, without arrogating too much to himself, that he could give the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) who had just resumed his seat, the House, and the nation, a correct history of this argument, or suggestion, amounting to the same thing, of the influence of the Missouri question on the balance of power in the United States. The origin, progress, and effect of the contest for the balance of power in Europe would be recollected; he would only say that its course had been marked with blood!

In reading two speeches delivered by an eminent and venerable member, (Mr. KING,) then and now of the Senate, from New York, every word of which had been well weighed, he found some remarks truly ominous. Mr. B. said he wished it understood that he should not pretend to detail every thing which that gentleman had said upon the same subject, to whose speeches he might take the liberty of referring; that it was not necessary to the fair attainment of the purpose which he had with candor assured the House he had in view; but all might rest satisfied that he labored under no mistake in the quotations which he should make; for, having been seriously impressed by them, he had made memoranda, considering them justly alarming, and looking askance from the motives which should influence Congress. The venerable gentleman, than whom none knew better, (having been a member of the convention which formed the constitution,) says that, but for this clause, the Union would never have been formed; this gentleman said, in reference to the computation of slaves, in fixing the ratio of representation, "that the effect of this concession had been obvious, in the preponderance which it had given to the slaveholding States over the other States; nevertheless, it was an ancient settlement; and faith and honor stood pledged not to disturb it. But the extension of this disproportionate power to the new States would be unjust and odious." Here is the argument from the preponderance—the disproportionate power—almost in terms from the balance of power—surely so in substance, and which he confirms from experience; and the odium which he was pleased to say should follow the extension of it to the new States, and among them to Missouri, proves how strongly, not to say violently, this venerable gentleman felt on the subject of restriction. Another gentleman, (Mr. TALLMADGE,) from the same State, who had, in the fifteenth Congress, supported the restriction with ability and warmth, was betrayed into a similar view. In speaking of Missouri, he said, "that portion of country has no claim to such an unequal representation, unjust in its results upon the other States."

Here again you perceive the grudging at constitutional, which is called unequal, representation, in its effects upon the other States, to wit, the non-slaveholding States. This gentleman also displayed his determination and violence, by exclaiming, "that his purpose was fixed, and that if dissolution of the Union and civil war come, let it come!" These were some of the allusions made in the fifteenth Congress, to the effect of the Missouri question upon the balance of power; and they, too, by the majority on this floor, who, or some of whom, deny the influence of the consideration, as well as the use of the argument.

Mr. B. said, Mr. Speaker, I will now proceed to refer to some instances in which the same argument was renewed at the last session. I had become, sir, so fearful, nay almost sure, that this consideration had more to do than it should have, with the Missouri question, that, whenever the argument was recurred to, it made a strong impression upon my mind, in consequence of which I am now the better enabled to refer to the remarks of some gentlemen upon that point. An honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. PLUMER,) who aimed to asperse Kentucky with having, some thirty years ago, menaced disunion, had said: "Feeling the weight of this slave representation, is it strange that the free States, believing they possess authority under the constitution, should wish to prevent its existence in States hereafter to be admitted?" This gentleman utters the habitual wailing of the malcontents and restrictionists at constitutional representation, which they are pleased to designate slave representation, accompanied by his belief in its influence on the balance of power. Another gentleman, then from Massachusetts, now in his seat from Maine—the same who presented his constituents, and, by accident, the people of the United States, with a Christmas-gift, (which, and such like, may prove their curse,) after the most mature consideration, I say mature, because the gentleman first wrote and then read his speech to the House—this gentleman avowed dangerous and inflammatory doctrines, and, among other things, said, in reference to the slaveholding States, “for emoluments and power you give us commercial restrictions,” &c. Here the benign gentleman seemed to sigh for power, to avenge supposed wrongs.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) not many days past assigned as a reason, among others, to show the importance of the question, and why it should be left for the decision of a future Congress, mentioned the influence which it might have upon the balance of power; for this he was immediately rebuked, and he seemed to stand corrected. This evening, the gentleman, in an effort to relieve himself from so reproachful a consideration, charged the minority with having first used it, and particularly charged my colleague (Mr. CLAY) with having made some allusion to it at the last session, which my colleague has denied, and which I will venture to say no one else recollects. The idea of calculations of power influencing the House in their deliberations on the Missouri question, (views so inexorable to the demands of justice and reason,) always excited alarm in my mind; and, from a reference to it, at the last session, by a very able and influential member, as was the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) who now disclaims it, I am enabled to settle the point in dispute between him and my colleague, by calling to their minds the facts as they transpired, and of which I have the most vivid recollection.

My colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) in the spirit of conciliation, which has characterized his every word and action from the beginning to the end of this contest, in one of his speeches of the last session appealed to the great and republican State of Pennsylvania, which had been regarded the key-stone of the federal arch, magnanimously to interfere and settle, as she might do, this contest, so big with the fate of the Union; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) whilst replying, observed in substance, if not in words, and as I then thought, and still think, very impressively and significantly, that true it was, Pennsylvania had been regarded as the key-stone of the federal arch, but if Congress went on to admit new States into the Union, he did not know how long she would continue so; manifestly indicating his jealousy of the growing importance of the West, and the loss of the attitude of Pennsylvania as the key-stone of the federal arch; or, in other words, by a manner and in terms too plain to be misunderstood, the influence of the Missouri question upon the balance of power. Thus, said

Mr. B., it is plain to demonstration, as it is true in point of fact, that the majority, meaning to be understood several influential members of the majority, were the first to avow, and to continue exclusively to avow, this consideration; and that, not my colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) but the gentleman himself, at the last session, and at this, has consistently, though I cannot say wisely, presented the same view. And that which induced me to rise, without reflection, under every disadvantage of a House worn down with tedious sessions from day to day, at a late hour, when their impatience had been so fully evinced, was the indignation which I felt at the attempt made by the gentleman who had just resumed his seat, being himself the offender, to throw the blame and odium of the use and influence of this argument upon my colleague and the injured minority.

When Mr. BROWN had concluded—

The motion of Mr. STORRS to postpone indefinitely was decided about sunset, by yeas and nays—for the motion 42, against it 127.

So it was rejected.

Mr. MALLARY then renewed the motion which he had unsuccessfully made in Committee of the Whole, as before stated; and the question thereon was decided by yeas, and nays, thus—for the amendment 61, against it 107.

The question was then taken on agreeing with the Committee of the Whole in its disagreement to the report of the select committee, and the decision was as follows: for concurring 88, against it 86.

So the House refused to concur, and the amendment reported by the select committee was agreed to.

The resolution, as thus amended, is in the following words:

Resolved, &c., That the State of Missouri shall be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the said State shall never pass any law preventing any description of persons from coming to and settling in the said State, who are now, or hereafter may become, citizens of any of the States of this Union: And provided, also, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday of November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete: And provided, further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to take from the said State of Missouri, when admitted into this Union, the exercise of any right or power which can now be constitutionally exercised by any of the original States.

The question being then stated on ordering the resolution to be read a third time—

The names of the members were called over. The Clerk, having come to the end of the list, was about to pronounce the result, when

Mr. KENT, whose delicate state of health scarcely enables him to attend the House, and who was not in the House when his name was called, requested leave to record his name.

Mr. JACKSON, under the same circumstances, except that he was within the walls of the House when his name was called, though not within the bar, made the same request.

The SPEAKER offered to receive their votes, if there was a unanimous consent to his receiving them; the rule of the House peremptorily requiring that no member should vote on any question unless he was within the bar of the House when his name was called.

Objection was made to their voting.

It was evident, from the sensation which filled the House, that the vote was a close one, though its result had not been announced.

Mr. CLAY, finding that the objection to these gentlemen would not be withdrawn, moved to suspend the rule of the House which forbids a change of the rule without one day's notice, in order to suspend or repeal the rule which forbids these gentlemen from voting.* After awhile, however, he withdrew his motion, relying on the magnanimity of some member of the majority to move for a reconsideration of the question.

The result of the vote was then proclaimed as follows: for the third reading, 80, against it 88.

YEAS.—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour, Bateman, Bayly, Blackledge, Bloomfield, Brevard, Brown, Bryan, Butler of Louisiana, Cannon, Clark, Clay, Cobb, Cocke, Crawford, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Davidson, Earle, Eddy, Fisher, Floyd, Garnett, Gray, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of N. son, Tracy, Udree, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Wendover, Whitman, and Wood.

So the whole resolution, amendment and all, was rejected.

Mr. LIVERMORE, who had objected to the above contested votes, then gave notice that he should, at 12 o'clock to-morrow, move for a reconsideration of this question, that every member might have an opportunity of voting on it. And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 18.

The Journal of yesterday having been read—

Mr. LIVERMORE, with the view of affording to members who were absent yesterday an opportunity of voting on the resolution from the Senate, rose to carry that purpose into effect; and, to obtain his object, moved to amend the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, by striking therefrom the order "that the Clerk should acquaint the Senate with the decision of this House on yesterday;" that, by withholding that Message, he might be enabled to move the reconsideration of the decision, when the time should arrive at which such a motion would be in order.

Mr. CLAY seconded the motion, and took the occasion to make a few remarks explanatory of an incident which occurred at the last session, on a question of reconsidering the final vote of the House on the Missouri bill, and to vindicate the then Speaker of the House from a presumed interference on that occasion, and to show that the Clerk did no more than his duty required him to do, in carrying the bill to the Senate without waiting the motion for reconsideration.

The motion to amend the Journal, as proposed, was agreed to without a division.

Missouri.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which the resolution from the Senate, as amended, for the admission of Missouri, was rejected.

Mr. TRACY, that the attendance of the members might be as general as possible, moved a call of the House, (Mr. LIVERMORE having waived his motion for the present, to give an opportunity for this motion.)

The motion for a call of the House was negatived—yeas 51, nays 78.

The question was then stated on the reconsideration of the vote of yesterday.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, gave the reasons why he should vote for the reconsideration, from motives of comity to other members, and yet should again vote, as he did yesterday, against the resolution, should it be reconsidered.

Mr. GARNETT said, feeling, as he did, disposed to vote against the motion for reconsideration, and as his vote would be apparently inconsistent with that he had yesterday given for the en-grossment of the resolution, it was a duty he owed to himself to state the reasons which influenced him. When he first came to the House yesterday, he had read the amendment, and his impressions were against it. He had therefore voted against its adoption. His attention, however, having been subsequently attracted to the proviso, he had, without sufficiently examining the previous part of the resolution, believed that its effect was to do away and render nugatory all its provisions; and, under this idea, and in the spirit of conciliation, he had voted for engrossing the resolution as it had been amended. Subsequent and serious reflection had, however, induced him to think that he was mistaken as to the effect of the proviso, and that his first impressions were correct. It was, perhaps, true, that it was calculated to do away any inequality that might be produced by the conditions of the resolution, between the rights of Missouri, and those of the other States, "when admitted;" but it was an attempt to impose on her a condition previously to her admission, which we had no right to require her to perform. How was it possible that we who think that Missouri is, to all intents and purposes, now a State, and that she is only kept out of the Union by violence and injustice, can believe that we can impose on her any condition precedent to her admission; and that a condition, too, which requires her to relinquish a right which she can now exercise in common with every other State in this Union. It requires her to say that she will not pass any law preventing any description of persons who now are, or may hereafter become, citizens of any State, from coming to and settling in Missouri. Now, we all believe that she has the power to prevent a certain description of persons from coming in and settling in the State; and I am disposed to go still further, and to say, that she has the right to exclude any description of persons—even the white citizens of another State; for, if a State does not possess this right, this obviously absurd consequence follows—that a State could not banish a citizen upon any pretext whatever, for treason, or for the most infamous crimes; for he would have nothing to do but to become a citizen of another State, when he might return and reside in the State from which he was banished, in spite of its laws. But, however this might be, we all agree that Missouri has a right to exclude some description of persons, even though citizens of another State; and, agreeing in this, we cannot impose any precedent condition to her admission requiring her to abandon this right. It was useless to say that the solemn public act by which the resolution requires her to relinquish this right, is null. If it was so, it would not justify our supporting it. If you analyze the doctrine in its extremest possible result, the least that we concede by the resolution is, that Congress can impose conditions on a State which are null, but cannot impose any which are efficient and operative. But, if we admit this doctrine, it will not be easy always to discriminate between conditions that are null and those that are operative; and if we concede the right of Congress to impose conditions at all, precedent to the admission of a State, whether void or otherwise, we deprive ourselves of the argument against their constitutionality, in any future attempt that may be made to impose such conditions on Missouri or any other State.

Mr. RANDOLPH made a few remarks, by way of protestation against the proposed reconsideration. The battle, he said, had been fairly fought, and fairly won—or lost, as gentlemen should please to consider it. He considered the proposed reconsideration to be, under the circumstances, contrary to parliamentary usage, and as tending to prostrate the great constitutional barriers which surround the powers of this House. Mr. R. concluded by vouching his life for it that this question might be settled without recourse to reconsideration.

Mr. CLAY replied, regretting the unfortunate situation in which he was placed, having to meet objections of an opposite nature, and from quarters of the House whence he had no right to expect them. Though gentlemen might not be in favor of the resolution as amended, they ought yet to vote for reconsideration, that the door might be kept open for a different amendment, if a different one should be thought necessary. He threw himself on the frankness and courtesy of the House, to allow the members who were absent on yesterday an opportunity of recording their votes.

Mr. FLOYD intimated his intention to vote for the reconsideration, but stated that more important questions than this had been lost during his observation, by the absence of members from their seats. Conceiving that a remedy ought to be provided for this evil, he stated his intention of moving, at some time during the session, an amendment to the rules of the House so as to require, that, on each call of the yeas and nays, the names of absentees should be entered on the Journals, designating the States which they respectively represent.

After some further conversation, of an incidental nature—

The question of reconsideration was taken, and decided by yeas and nays: For the reconsideration 101, and against it 66.

So the House determined to reconsider the vote of yesterday rejecting the resolution from the Senate in its amended shape.

The question then again presented itself in this form: Shall the amendment be engrossed, and, with the resolution, read a third time?

Mr. HACKLEY, of New York, assigned, at considerable length, the reasons which had induced him, as a member of the select committee, and on the subsequent vote in the House, to give his suffrage in favor of the amendment reported by the select committee.

Mr. FULLER delivered to the House the grounds on which he was opposed to this resolution, not believing that the condition annexed to the admission of Missouri obviates the objection to that clause of her constitution which is supposed to conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, said, feeling it his painful duty, upon the present occasion, to differ from those with whom it had been his pleasure to act upon almost every proposition concerning Missouri, he trusted he need offer no apology for the part he should take in consuming the valuable time of the House. He would not, he said, detain the House long; he knew it was impatient for the question, and would endeavor to state, as succinctly as possible, the reasons which determined the course he was about to take. Whatever, Mr. E. said, might be his views upon this resolution, to whatever conclusion he may have come, he could but distrust his own judgment when opposed by the opinion of the select committee who reported it to the House. With some of the members of that committee, he said, he was well acquainted; he had the fullest confidence in their abilities, and regretted he could not go along with them. His great anxiety to put to rest this distracting subject was manifest from his course hitherto; and no gentleman could, for a moment, believe he would hesitate to vote for any proposition to admit Missouri which his judgment approved.

He had bestowed the fullest consideration upon this resolution, and could not bring himself to support it. What, sir, is the first member of it? It is declared to be a fundamental condition upon which Missouri is to be admitted into the Union, that she "shall never pass any law preventing any description of persons from coming to, and settling in, the said State, who now are, or hereafter may become, citizens of any of the States of this Union." Did it, he asked, recite in so many words the clause in the Constitution of the United States, which declares "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?" No, sir. It in truth contained our own construction of that clause; it set forth our own opinion, to a certain extent, of the obligation it imposed, and we demand of Missouri submission to that opinion as a sine qua non of her admission. And are gentlemen prepared to maintain this doctrine? Would they tell him that Congress possess the power to cut down and restrict the State sovereignties by legislative construction of the Federal Constitution; and that, too, of a clause merely to restrain the legislative discretion of the States themselves? Establish this doctrine, and to what will it lead? What will be the powers of this Government, and where the limit to them? I ask, said Mr. E., do gentlemen mean to say, that whatever may be our construction of the Federal Constitution; whatever rights we may think we ourselves possess, we can demand of a State who asks admission into the Union, to stipulate she will adopt the one and not violate the other? If so, what is to prevent us from saying to Missouri, to Michigan, to Arkansas, or any other Territory who may hereafter apply to become a member of the Union, "we have a right to promote the internal improvement of the country by a system of roads and canals, when, how, and where we please, and we demand of you, as a condition of admission, a stipulation that you will pass no law interfering with the exercise of this right, or, indeed, of any other right which we may imagine we possess?" And why not? We may say then, as now, it is consistent with our interpretation of the constitution, and we impose no new obligation. Sir, I will never consent to establish such a principle by my vote. The powers of this Government are mighty enough; their march is onwards; and I wish they may not sooner or later entirely absorb the powers of the States. He knew he should be told that his objections to the first proviso were obviated by the last, which asserts that Missouri, when admitted, shall have all the powers of the original States. But he could not so view it; whether our construction of the Federal Constitution, in this particular, be right or wrong, the principle still remained. He objected to the exercise of a right by Congress to decide for the States the extent of their political powers.

This resolution must receive such a construction as will give effect to every member of it, as will reconcile all its parts. And was he to understand gentlemen to say that Missouri, thus restricted, will have all the powers of the original States; or that the original States had the same powers, and no more than she had? Gentlemen are mistaken when they say the import of the terms "privileges and immunities" is remitted to judicial cognizance; we have ourselves, in some degree, given their meaning. The resolution uses the words "any description of persons," and declares them entitled to go to, and settle in, Missouri, if they be citizens of any of the States. It does not say of the United States. What privileges and immunities are secured to the citizens of the United States by the clause in question, the Legislatures of the States must decide, subject to revision by the Judiciary; and how far the States are restrained, in this respect, there is much difference of opinion even in this House. Let Missouri, then, enjoy the rights her sister States possess; let her be at liberty, as they are, to expound the Constitution of the United States according to her sense of her own obligations of duty and of conscience.

Mr. RANDOLPH stated some of the grounds on which he was opposed to this resolution. He considered it as proposing a sacrifice of the rights not only of Missouri, but collaterally of all the States of the Union, to mistaken notions of expediency; and entered into an argument to support that position. He declared himself to be opposed to the annexation of any condition to the act of admission of Missouri.

Mr. STORES followed, in an argument in support of the resolution, and the sufficiency of its provisions to obviate the objection which he had entertained to the naked resolution for admission, when that question was presented at an earlier period of the session. He earnestly deprecated the disposition which appeared to prevail with some gentlemen, to leave Missouri in a state of disconnection from, and independence on, the Government, proposing to do nothing with her now, and promising to do nothing more hereafter, &c.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, spoke as follows:

During the last session of Congress, when the question of restricting slavery in that State was discussed, I supported it, in every instance, by my vote. Congress, however, decided against those who thought and acted with me on the question. How that decision was obtained I will not now inquire. It is sufficient for me that the opponents of restriction were not indebted to me for their success, either by my absence or by a change of my vote. But, however that decision was obtained, I considered it binding on Congress. By it Congress solemnly pledged itself to Missouri, that, if she would present a constitution, in other respects republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, she should be admitted into this Union. I considered myself bound by this pledge. I have no alternative left. I cannot for a moment consent, as a member of this House, to observe a Punic faith even to Missouri. I know it is objected that Missouri has not fulfilled her part of the compact; that her constitution, in one of its provisions, is repugnant to that of the United States. I agree that it is. But we have no evidence that this repugnant clause was inserted with intent to violate any of the provisions of the Federal Constitution; and we certainly are warranted in judging charitably of her intentions, when we reflect that several of the States have enacted laws of the same tendency, and equally repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It is a common judicial maxim, equally applicable to States and individuals, that every one is presumed innocent until proven guilty. Adopting this maxim, we cannot yet pronounce sentence against Missouri. If gentlemen will prove to me, by reasonable argument, that we are not bound by the law of last session, and that we still have the right, consistent with good faith, to revive the question of the restriction of slavery in Missouri, and that there is any, even the most distant hope of bringing it to a successful termination, I will go with them; for I wish it distinctly understood, that I am not excited to my present course by any sympathy for Missouri; I feel none: nor am I prompted by fear. The menaces of gentlemen have no influence on my mind.

Mr. SMITH spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, in rising, principally to ask for the eyes and noses on this now apparently desperate resolution, my bosom swells with emotions to which my tongue can give no utterance.

I feel myself authorized to warn gentlemen, in the most solemn manner, that the nation is heart-sick of this question; and I do believe, if it were left to the people, Missouri would be declared to be admitted almost by acclamation. The inhabitants even of the North and East abhor the existence of a subject which has been so pressed upon Congress as not only to occasion great expense and loss of time, but to agitate the nation from Maine to Georgia; and although it may not be strictly parliamentary to speak of information coming in any other than an official shape, yet I venture to assert, upon that on which I place the most implicit reliance, that, in many sections of the New England States, there is a vast majority in favor of unconditional admission! Shall I, then, on a matter of such moment, of such national importance, that almost every day it exists adds to the bad feelings, jealousies, and spirit of disunion, so destructive to our peace, stop to argue the lawyer-like and attenuated argument of the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) as to the power of the Legislature of Missouri to give its assent to the proposition submitted by the committee; a proposition most ably and zealously vindicated by the gentlemen from Kentucky and from New York, (Messrs. CLAY, FORD, and HACKLEY.) Sir, this is no time to consider technical arguments and sceptical objections; it is the time to insure the harmony of the country by a settlement of this ominous and ill-boding question.

Mr. ROSS, of Ohio, spoke at some length, and with much earnestness of manner, in opposition to the resolution, on the ground that its provisions were inefficient in themselves; or, being otherwise, were of a most pernicious tendency. He considered it an expedient to avoid a responsibility which gentlemen were afraid to meet. He reprobated the change of sentiment which some gentlemen had evinced, and intimated that, if honest in their first opinion, they had acted dishonestly, or under the influence of improper motives in voting differently now, &c.

Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, was about to speak in reply to Mr. ROSS, and in vindication of his course on this question—

When an explanation took place between Mr. CLAY and Mr. ROSS, which induced Mr. L. to waive his remarks.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, next spoke earnestly in support of this resolution, and in reply to those who had spoken against it. He invoked those whom the resolution, as it now stood, did not please, to say explicitly what would please them, it having been decided by a large majority that the restriction of last session was out of the question.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, spoke briefly upon one point of the resolution which had been particularly objected to.

Mr. PINCKNEY, of South Carolina, spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker, there are many reasons which make it incumbent on me not to suffer this question, which I consider the final one on the acceptance or rejection of the constitution of Missouri, and her admission into the Union, to pass without presenting my views on the subject to the House. These reasons are, the importance of the question itself, the great interest the State I represent, in part, has in it, and, not among the least, the frequent calls made upon me in this House, and references in the other, as to the true meaning of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, which it appears, from the Journal of the General Convention that formed the constitution, I first proposed in that body.

We are now arrived at the most awful period which has hitherto occurred on this delicate and distressing subject. On the decision of the question before you is to depend whether we are to rise in harmony with each other, having made the necessary provision for the admission of Missouri on an equal footing with the other States, or to reject her constitution, and leave her, erected as she completely is, by our own authority, into a State, unowned and unadmitted into our Union, of which, under the fostering care of Government, she soon bids fair to become a most valuable member.

Mr. Jefferson says, in a letter to a friend, which has been published, at least this sentence of it: "The Missouri question is the most portentous one that ever threatened our Union. In the gloomiest moments of the Revolutionary war, I never had any apprehension equal to that I feel from this source." I agree perfectly with him, and join those gentlemen in opinion who consider this, beyond all comparison, the second question in point of importance, which has been agitated among us since our revolt from the parent State. The first was the memorable declaration which confirmed the Union, and gave birth to the independence of our country. This is the only one which may, in its consequences, lead to the dissolution of that very Union, and prove the death-blow of all the political happiness and national importance once so rationally to be expected from it. I feel myself authorized to express this fear by the fact, that the gentlemen in opposition have now thrown off the veil, and expressly declare their intention is to leave, if possible, this question to the next Congress; to leave to them, unfettered by any act of ours, the power to decide how far the true interest of the Union may then make it necessary to produce anew, and struggle for the imposition of the restriction on slavery in Missouri, which has, during the three last sessions, shaken the Union to its very foundations. They openly avow that they do not consider themselves bound by the compact of the last year, confining that restriction to the territory north of 36 degrees 30 minutes, but aver, if they have strength enough to do so, their intention to leave the next Congress free to decide it as they please.

In considering the subject, I shall endeavor to prove to you that Missouri, in complying with the act of Congress of the last session, has submitted to you the very best republican constitution I have ever seen; one not only superior to that of the other States, but even to the boasted one of the United States; and that if she has, without the least intention to violate it, inserted the article respecting the prohibition of free negroes and mulattoes, she may fairly be considered as not only having done it under the sanction of Congress, but I may almost be justified in saying under their recommendation.

In examining the constitution of Missouri, it will be found, that while it has carefully avoided all those defects which time and experience have discovered in the constitutions of the other States, it has wisely ingrafted all their excellences, and made additions of others heretofore omitted or not thought of. The first branch of her Legislature is, contrary to all the others, except South Carolina and Tennessee, elected for two years, thereby avoiding the almost continual irritation and intrigue incident to annual elections, while sufficiently short to continue the Representative as connected with his constituents, as he ought to be. The Senate are elected for a longer term, and with a proper rotation, so as to unite firmness, stability, and system, with a due degree of dependence and responsibility. Their Executive is elected for four years, possesses the same revisionary power as the President of the United States does, and has exactly that permanence, nomination to office, and patronage, which an Executive ought to have, to give weight and respectability to his office, and no more.

Her Judiciary are wisely appointed, and are completely independent in the tenure of their office and salaries, all the provisions it has made for the government of their militia, and the distribution of knowledge among the rising generation of their country, do honor to the talents that formed the constitution, while those which provide for the humane treatment of slaves by their masters, and their trial by jury, and punishment in the same manner as the whites, and make the murder, or dismemberment of a slave, punishable as if committed on a free white person, are honorable and liberal improvements on the policy which has hitherto governed other States in these respects; the declaration of rights annexed to their constitution recognizes and establishes all the great and indispensable principles of free government; in short, in every thing except with respect to those provisions which are held to interfere with its claim to admission into the Union, Missouri must appear to every impartial man to have done herself credit by her constitution, of which the essential ingredient of general suffrage, or, in other words, equal political rights, is the basis.

I have said no other State constitution is comparable to it, and to prove this, for brevity sake, let us shortly examine the constitution of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, and we shall, as republicans systems find them far inferior indeed to Missouri; and as the question is on the acceptance of her constitution, and admission into the Union, this examination becomes peculiarly proper.

In examining the constitution of Missouri, you find it free from all these defects; and, as the great question now before us is the acceptance of her constitution and admission into the Union, I wish, as far as I am able, to show to the people of this country its excellence and superiority, as a republican one, over those of the important States I have mentioned, and, indeed, of all the others, that they may be enabled to judge whether it can be possible so excellent a system can be rejected for the trifling reason that it inadvertently contains a provision prohibiting the settlement of free negroes and mulattoes among them, or whether it is not infinitely more probable that other reasons of a much more serious nature, and pregnant with the most disastrous events to the future union and peace of these States, are at the bottom of this unexpected and inexcusable opposition. My reason for being of this opinion is, that if this was not the case the course of their proceeding on this subject would have been most probably as follows: There would have been, as there must inevitably have been, a unanimous approbation of every part of the system except this prohibitory clause, and this would have been considered, as it certainly is, nothing more than a strong recommendation from the convention that formed the constitution to the future Legislature, which might or might not comply with it, after giving it a much more full and deliberate examination than it was in the power of the convention to do, as, in their opinion, was most consistent with the Constitution of the United States, or the interest of their own State. If the convention had not determined to leave it wholly to the discretion of the Legislature, why did they not, in express terms, declare that no free mulattoes or negroes should ever be allowed to enter into Missouri, and make it a part of the constitution? It was easy to have framed a short article on the subject, and not to have made the intervention of the Legislature necessary; besides, what shows that the Legislature are of this opinion is, that, as far as we know, they have hitherto passed no such law, and, if they should not, where is there a penalty annexed to their not doing so, or where is the power to compel them? But I now proceed to state, in my opinion, the article is not an unconstitutional one; and that, even if it was, it might be considered, in some degree, as sanctioned virtually, or tacitly recommended by Congress.

I say it is not, in my judgment, unconstitutional, for the following reasons, in which I mean briefly to answer to the call that has been made upon me: It appears by the Journal of the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States, that I was the only member of that body that ever submitted the plan of a constitution completely drawn in articles and sections; and this having been done at a very early stage of their proceedings, the article on which now so much stress is laid, and on the meaning of which the whole of this question is made to turn, and which is in these words: "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities in every State," having been made by me, it is supposed I must know, or perfectly recollect, what I meant by it. In answer, I say that, at the time I drew that constitution, I perfectly knew that there did not then exist such a thing in the Union as a black or colored citizen, nor could I then have conceived it possible such a thing could ever have existed in it; nor, notwithstanding all that is said on the subject, do I now believe one does exist in it; and, in order to prove this, the only true question for consideration is, what is a citizen of the United States? And I now answer, as we consider one in the State to which I belong.

In South Carolina we consider all white persons born in the same, or adopted according to law, to be citizens, and entitled, as such, to all the privileges of a citizen, where not disabled by something personal to themselves. Their privileges vary according to their sex and situation. Females are wholly excluded from a right to vote, or to office, and are confined to their proper sphere; but all males born in the State, or in the United States, after a certain residence in that State, or adopted according to law, are equal, except clergymen, who, on account of their office, are excluded from the Legislature. At the age of eighteen they are all enrolled into the militia, and serve as the defenders of their country. At twenty-one they are, from our general suffrage law, qualified to vote, to serve on juries, and to be eligible to the Legislature, and all offices except two, which require greater age. They have a right to sue, and are liable to be sued; to take a freehold, and hold property. They are all entitled to the trial by jury, and intermarry at any age.

This, and this alone, is called a citizen there; and nothing less than this can, in my opinion, constitute a citizen of the United States. Now, let us compare this white citizen of the South with the black or colored man, such as he is in the Eastern or Northern States; and then let it be seen whether, for the protection of the comparatively few rights of such a being as he is—of a person so situated, so unlike a citizen, and so almost wholly without his privileges—gentlemen can be serious in refusing the admission of Missouri, and risking the consequences.

At the close of the war all the States had slaves; the Northern and Eastern to a considerable amount, and the Southern to a much more numerous one. The former, extremely anxious to get rid of them, passed laws for the gradual abolition of slavery, and, by their ill-treatment, by the contempt they exhibited for them, and the marked line of distinction drawn between them and the whites, I am told, in the Eastern States, they have almost driven the whole of them away—many to the West Indies, and more to the Southern States; so that in the six Eastern States, I am informed, not more, at present, than a few thousand remain.

And here let me ask, how have they effected this? Why, as I have just said, by treating them, on every occasion, with the most marked contempt—by never employing them when whites can be procured, thus reducing them to great penury and distress—by refusing to trust them with the defence of the country, or enrolling them in their militia—by denying them the right to serve on juries, or in their courts to give credit to their oaths in suits where whites are concerned—by preventing their marrying, under heavy penalties, with the whites—and by even refusing to them the right of remaining more than two months in their State, under penalty of whipping; thus showing that, so far from wishing to treat or consider them as citizens, they view the mixture of their blood, and any connection with them, as a disgrace to the whites. The only solitary privilege which it seems is granted them, is, on pressing occasions, where votes are wanted, these degraded beings are frequently, in a most improper state, dragged to the polls, with tickets in their hands which they cannot read, and compelled, by men under whose influence they are obliged to act, to disgrace, in the most shameful manner, the highest privilege our Republic boasts, and which, I will venture to say, is in no other country equally degraded, as by a view of their condition, and the manner the blacks are treated in Europe, will presently be shown. And, perhaps, this is the proper place to remark, that it was impossible for Missouri to have held any other opinions on this subject than those she did, when, in addition to all this, she well knew Congress had never, by their laws, naturalized any but whites, or admitted any other to be enrolled into the militia, or had, by any act, in the most remote degree, acknowledged or considered a black or colored man as a citizen.

I find it difficult to say what opinion ought to be attached to the perseverance which the majority of this House have exhibited for three successive sessions, on this occasion, in struggling to establish the points for which they have contended, and in which they have shown so little attention, or have had so little respect for the feelings of their brethren of the Southern and Western States. It must have arisen either from a wish to dissolve the Union, and separate themselves from the slaveholding States, or from a total want of knowledge of the distinction which has, from time immemorial, existed in the civilized world, between the black and white race, and the strong and immovable line which has separated, and will for ever continue to separate, them in the Southern and Western States of this Union.

There can be no question what the opinion of Europe is as to the black race; for there the line of distinction is as strongly drawn as it is between the whites and them in the Southern and Western States. Nor is this peculiar to the moderns; the same opinion was entertained by the ancients of the then civilized world as exists at present.

In speaking of the situation of the interior of Africa, where the black race were first found, it is natural to turn our attention to what it has been from the earliest ages we are acquainted with. In doing so we find that, of all the quarters of the globe, this is the only one which remains completely unaltered from the creation until the present moment. The African man is still as savage as ever—he is as unchanged as the lion or tiger which roams in the same forests with himself.

It may be asked, Why this unchanged situation while always in the neighborhood, and within the reach of all the most civilized part of the then known world? Why should every part yield to the extension of learning and the arts, while the Africans still continued the barbarous and cannibal race they were from the beginning? The reason is plain from the only data given us to judge from. They certainly must have been created with less intellectual powers than the whites, and were most probably intended to serve them, and be the instruments of their cultivation. A strong reason in favor of this opinion of their inferiority to the whites is, there never having been one of the race, notwithstanding all the pains taken with them, that has attained any thing like what may be termed mediocrity in learning; and, for this and other reasons, some of the most able philosophers in both continents, among whom may be named Mr. Hume and Mr. Jefferson, have invariably expressed the same sentiments.

Such, too, has unquestionably been the opinion of all the most enlightened nations of Europe; or else, when England, and Spain, and France, and Holland had, by the discovery of America, acquired colonies there, why did they instantly send their ships to Africa, to stock them with slaves, and to no other place? Why not send to Asia, or take the native Indians in their neighborhood, and employ them? The reason was, that they found no other part of the human race so inferior in intellect to the whites as the Africans, or none which it can be so fairly presumed were created for the purpose of serving them.

Let us now view the conduct of England. It is true, in the case of Somerset, her courts determined no human being could be held in slavery in England; but there they stopped. You never have heard of any of the colored race being admitted to the rights of British subjects so far as to vote at their elections, to serve on juries, to be admitted to swear in their courts; to be enrolled in their militia; or to be eligible to Parliament; or to hold any office of honor or profit under their Government.

In their colonies they keep them in abject slavery, perhaps more so than exists in any part of the world, not even excepting the Portuguese or Spanish colonies.

In the dominions of France in Europe, they carry the exclusion of the blacks further than in any European nation; for, by an ordinance of France, issued long ago by one of their monarchs, and still in force, they are forbid to enter, and all persons are forbid to bring them, under severe penalties, into France; stating in the ordinance, among the principal reasons which induced it, the determination of the French Government to prevent any intermixture between the white and black blood. It is not a little singular that, in the discussion which took place the last session, on the restriction, the able Senator whose recent death is so justly deplored as a public loss, should have used exactly the same reasons in support of it.

We are, sir, very fond of imitating the Romans in every thing we can, without inquiring how far, from the very different nature of our Government, it was strictly appropriate. We have, in imitation of them, made the most ferocious of all the birds of prey our national standard, and named the edifice in which we are now legislating, the Capitol. Why not follow them in their opinions respecting the African race? Rome was well acquainted with them. She had carried her victorious eagles to Carthage, and afterwards to Alexandria; they were well acquainted with the interior of Africa, whose inhabitants were essentially different from those of Carthage and Egypt in color, and infinitely their inferiors in intellect. They were, as they are now, cannibals and barbarians. So far from any of them, or their descendants, ever having been considered as citizens by the Romans, it does not appear they even condescended to make them their slaves; for, like the Greeks, all the slaves among the Romans were white. It is, therefore, probable that, like the French in Europe, they disdained to mix the Roman blood with them. How different must have been their opinions and feelings from those of our Northern and Eastern brethren, who now not only consent to receive and cherish them themselves, but wish to throw in upon Missouri and all the Southern and Western States, in the shape of citizens, the very race which Rome refused to receive and use as slaves!

But, sir, it will be impossible for them to succeed. The distinction which has existed from the earliest ages, in Europe and in America, from its discovery and settlement, down to the present moment, can never be removed. Instead of diminishing, the very discussion of this question will increase its strength, as is now daily proved by the laws which have just passed, and others of a similar character now under discussion in the Southern States, and which never would have been passed but for this attempt; one much more dangerous and alarming than that of the last session; it has come most unexpectedly on them.

They, in common with the people of all the States, supposed that the question had been put at rest for ever—they viewed the compromise as binding in honor on every part of the Union—they had the good sense to know that, in a government so extensive as this, and differing in its climate and productions, and consequently in its interests, that every thing must be done by compromise—that the Constitution of the United States itself was the work of compromise, and in nothing so remarkably and of such importance as on the very subject of slavery, in not only consenting the Southern States should have a representation for their slaves, but going the very extraordinary length further in allowing them, if they pleased, to keep the African trade open for twenty years—and that this constitution of compromise was formed by a body of men, at least as well-informed and disinterested, and as much the lovers of freedom and humanity, as may probably ever again be assembled in this country; while therefore the constitutional compromise is, as it had always been, strictly adhered to, they can see no reason why on the same subject the compromise of the last session should not be—they fear that the mere admission of a few free negroes and mulattoes cannot be the true cause of all these exertions, and of all this perseverance on the part of the majority of this House, but that something of greater importance is intended, by the astonishing anxiety now shown to keep the question open to the next session.

If this was not the case, I should have supposed a train of reasoning something like the following ought to have weight with the House. The constitution of Missouri, now under examination, is formed truly republican, and indeed excellent in all its provisions, except the one objected to—in defence of this it is asserted that it is no violation of the Constitution of the United States, because no free negro or mulatto in any of the States, in the circumstances in which he is at present, can be considered as a citizen.

That, except in the solitary right to vote in a few Northern States, he is destitute of every other qualification, and that until they, either by an alteration of their constitution or laws, admit him to a full participation of all the political rights of their white citizens, neither the Supreme Court or any other could consider him as such—that Missouri having no idea of the existence of such a thing as a black or colored citizen of the United States, and knowing that all the Southern and Western States had for many years passed laws to the same effect, which laws are well known to Congress, being at this moment in their library and within the walls of the Capitol, and which were never before objected to by them or their courts, they were no doubt warranted in supposing they had the same right. I repeat here what I asserted before, as I think it an argument of great weight, that the silence of Congress on the antecedent laws of the Southern and Western States, on this very subject, might indeed be fairly considered as a sanction to the proceeding, or, might we not go further and say, this silence of Congress ought to be considered as full proof that they knew the imminent danger there was in the Southern and Western States admitting such persons, and, therefore, on every occasion where they were passed cheerfully acquiesced in them, and to go a little further, might not this acquiescence, under the operation of the maxim long received among jurists, and agreed to, "Qui non prohibet, quando prohibere potest, jubet," be viewed as at least a kind of tacit or implied recommendation?

As to the idea which has been frequently thrown out in this debate, that Missouri knew it was repugnant to the constitution, and notwithstanding did it, as it were, to defy Congress, it is the most unfounded one imaginable. On the contrary, it appears by her constitution she has done every thing with respect to slaves she consistently could to recommend it to Congress; she certainly has done every thing she could, with propriety, to better their situation, and to display a very kind and humane disposition towards them; they are carefully guarded from bodily injury; a fair trial is secured to them, and, from the provisions respecting equality of punishment, no unusual severity can ever be exercised towards them.

Nor is it to be supposed if they had had the most remote idea that the article objected to would have been considered as offensive or repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, they would have inserted it; for what purpose could they wish to irritate a Government from which they had every thing to expect, whose protecting arm was necessary to their growth and happiness, and whose refusal to accept their constitution and admit them into the Union must involve them in difficulties of the most inconvenient if not serious nature? No, sir, the idea of its being repugnant to the constitution could never have been conceived by them, much less could they have supposed it should have been considered as a defiance of your authority. They certainly had no such ideas, and if every other part of their constitution is in complete accordance with your act—if all the rest of it is strictly republican, and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, even supposing, which I do not admit, that this article or recommendation, or call it what you please, might be thought to clash with it, will you suffer a single clause or article to give a character to the whole, and while you confess, which no man can deny, that all the rest is excellent, that this single article shall suspend your admission of her into the Union, and leave you exposed to the difficulties such a state of things must produce?

Mr. Ford, of New York, next spoke in vindication of his course on this subject, and in warm reply to Mr. Ross's remarks casting blame on those whose course had been the same as that of Mr. Ford.

Mr. CLAY concluded the main debate, by a speech of about an hour's length, in which he alternately reasoned, remonstrated, and entreated with the House, to settle forever this agitating question, by passing the resolution before it.

Mr. Foot said he felt himself called upon, by the remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Ohio, who had made an allusion to him, as if addressed to him by name, with a direct charge of inconsistency, to rise in his own defence, and to repel the charge; and he trusted the committee would excuse him for trespassing on their patience.

Sir, said Mr. F., I would inform that gentleman that my course, during the whole discussion of this subject, during the last as well as the present session, has been regulated by one uniform principle, viz: a sacred regard to the Constitution of the United States. This has been my pole star. Believing, as I did, that the constitution did not warrant the imposition of the restriction, I voted against it.

With the same regard to my oath, to support that constitution, I voted against the resolution for the unconditional admission of Missouri; at the present session, because her constitution contains an article which, in my opinion, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and does not comply with the conditions proposed by the act of last session.

And, sir, I must say, I can never vote for her admission on any other condition than that Congress require that this offensive article be expunged. Self-respect, and a due regard to our laws, require it. And I demand of that gentleman to show the inconsistency.

The question was then taken on ordering the resolution to be engrossed for a third reading, and decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 88, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, February 14

Election of President and Vice President.

Mr. CLAY, from the Joint Committee, to whom the subject had been referred, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, the 14th February, 1831, and the President of the Senate, seated on the right of the Speaker of the House, shall be the presiding officer of the Senate, and the Speaker shall be the presiding officer of the House; that two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Resolved, That, if any objection be made to the votes of Missouri, and the counting or omitting to count which shall not essentially change the result of the election; in that case they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Missouri to be counted, the result would be, for A. B. for President of the United States, — votes; if not counted, for A. B. as President of the United States, — votes; but in either event A. B. is elected President of the United States; and in the same manner for Vice President.

Mr. CLAY offered some remarks explanatory of the considerations which governed the committee in recommending the resolutions which had been reported. As convenience rendered it necessary for the Senate to meet this House here, in its own Hall, it was due to that body, by courtesy and propriety, that the President should be invited to preside, he being the officer designated by the constitution to perform a certain duty appertaining to the occasion which called the two Houses together. As to the second resolution, the state of the votes for President and Vice President was well known, though unofficially, and, as the votes of Missouri could not affect the result, it was considered by the committee, to obviate the unpleasant difficulty which would otherwise arise in the joint meeting, better to provide for the case in the manner proposed. This course was deemed by the committee the most expedient, under all the circumstances, and he hoped the House would adopt it, the more especially as the Senate had already concurred in it.

The question was taken on the first resolution, and agreed to without a division, though several nays were heard.

The question being stated on the second resolution—

Mr. RANDOLPH said he could not consent to this special verdict, as it had been called, in the case of Missouri. He could not recognize in this House or the other House, singly, or conjointly, the power to decide on the votes of any State. Suppose, he said, you strike out Missouri, and insert South Carolina, which also has a provision in its constitution repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; or Virginia, or Massachusetts, which had a test, he believed, in its constitution; was there any less power to decide on their votes, than on those of Missouri? He maintained that the Electoral College was as independent of Congress, as Congress of them; and we have no right, said he, to judge of their proceedings. Mr. R. said he would rather see an interregnum, or see no votes counted at all, than to see a principle adopted which went to the very foundation on which the Presidential office rested. Suppose a case, in which some gentleman of one House or the other should choose to turn up his nose at the vote of some State, and say that if it be so and so, such a person is elected; and if so and so, what-you-call-em is elected—did not everybody see the absurdity of such a proposition? Mr. R. added other remarks illustrative of his opinion of the course proposed by the resolution—deeming it not only erroneous, but erroneous in a matter of vital importance—in the ascertainment of the person who had been elected by the people Chief Magistrate of this nation—the most important officer under the constitution—the monarch—for, whoever, in any country, commands the army and navy, and collects and distributes the revenue, is a king, call him what you will. The time of this House was precious, and he would not consume it, by saying all he thought and felt on the subject.

Mr. TRIMBLE was far from desiring to consume the time of the House, or to embarrass the House, but he could not give his consent to this resolution. If any thing was due to State rights, this resolution ought not to be adopted; as it would, however immaterial in the present case, be cited hereafter as a precedent; and precedents were becoming important things in the public transactions. The House might set an example by this vote, as ruinous in its consequences, as any decision which could be made. It was about to declare, not what was the true vote for President of the United States, but to state it hypothetically. Mr. T. argued at some length against such a course. Suppose some member in joint meeting should ask the President of the Senate how many votes were given—he must answer in the words of the resolution, and therefore would not state the fact, according to the law. It was the duty of the two Houses to enunciate the true state of the vote for President and Vice President, and the proposed annunciation would not be the fact. He concluded by saying that he would rather that the votes of Missouri were left out altogether, than adopt the course proposed.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that the gentleman was under some mistake on one point. The Constitution of the United States provides, not that the person having a majority of votes should be President, but a majority of the votes of the Electors appointed. Now, he desired to know whether the Electors of Missouri were appointed or not.

Mr. FLOYD said he was aware that the question to agree to the resolution was tantamount to a motion to reject, but he would prefer the latter shape for the question, to show more strongly his opinion of it—it would suit his feelings towards it better. We have been going on for several years, said he, accumulating power until scarcely any is left but in Congress. If they had any power over the votes of Missouri at all, he said, it was when her votes were first received; but no such power existed. The votes of Indiana, at the last election for President, were counted when precisely in the same situation as those of Missouri now. He protested against this assumption of authority on the part of Congress, and wished to show his disapprobation of the resolution in the strongest manner.

Mr. CLAY said the constitution required of the two Houses to assemble and perform the highest duty that could devolve on a public body—to ascertain who had been elected by the people to administer their national concerns. In a case of votes coming forward which could not be counted, the constitution was silent; but, fortunately, the end in that case carried with it the means. The two Houses were called on to enumerate the votes for President and Vice President; of course they were called on to decide what are votes. It being obvious that a difficulty would arise in the joint meeting, concerning the votes of Missouri, some gentlemen thinking they ought to be counted, and others dissenting from that opinion, the committee thought it best to prevent all difficulty by waiving the question in the manner proposed, knowing that it could not affect the result of the election. As to the condition of Missouri, he himself thought her a State, with a perfect moral right to be admitted into the Union, but kept out for the want of a ceremonious act which was deemed by others necessary to entitle her to admission. Though, in his opinion, a State in fact, yet not being so in form, her votes could not be counted according to form. He was aware that the question of her admission might come up and be decided in this very shape; for if Congress allowed her to vote for President and Vice President, and counted her votes, it would be a full admission of the State into the Union; but the committee thought, as there were other and more usual modes of admitting the State into the Union, it was better not to bring up the question in the discharge of this solemn and indispensable duty, but to allow that ceremony to proceed, if possible, without difficulty or embarrassment.

Mr. RHEA said the constitution had in it neither waiving or elasticity, and it would not bend to circumstances or expediency. The constitution had declared the duty of Congress in ascertaining the votes for President—it was not competent for them to mend the constitution, nor to decide such a question as this proposed, and he was opposed to the resolution.

Mr. TRIMBLE said the very reason urged for this resolution, was that which constrained him to oppose it; and proceeded further to argue that it would be better to exclude the votes entirely, than set such an example.

Mr. CULBERTH said he could hardly say whether he was most gratified at being relieved, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) from being the first to make objection to the proposed resolution, or grieved that he could not have the support of the gentleman from Kentucky, with whom it had given him great pleasure usually to act. The people of Missouri were, by the act of the last session of Congress, authorized to form a constitution and State government; and, in the first article of that constitution, it is declared that the said State, when formed, “shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.” Believing that the people of Missouri, having formed a constitution and State government, in compliance with the act of last session, in all its provisions and conditions, and considering that she is, in fact, a State, and of right, if not in fact, (and he inclined to believe she was in fact,) a member of the Union, and that she is kept out of the enjoyment of her rights by a sheer act of power—he spoke this in reference to the act, and not to the actors—that simple justice required her admission to the enjoyment of her rights. Mr. C. said he found, on examination of the constitution of Missouri, that all officers, civil and military, are required, before entering upon the duties of their respective offices, to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, as well as of that State. It is declared (I use the word declared emphatically) by the constitution of the said State to be the duty of the General Assembly, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary “to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in said State, under any pretext whatsoever.” This last clause is supposed by some to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It is believed that a fair construction of the clause referred to, taken in connection with the oath which the individual members of the General Assembly are required to take, does not warrant such a conclusion. In the spirit of candor, I ask gentlemen, said Mr. C., who entertain this opinion, what is the actual duty of the General Assembly of Missouri, resulting from the oath which they are required to take and the declaratory clause above referred to? I appeal to them as statesmen, as politicians, as common lawyers, nay, as gentlemen of common sense, whether a fair and liberal construction—whether the obvious and only fair construction that can be given to the clause objected to, will not reconcile it with the Constitution of the United States? Will it not be the duty of the General Assembly of Missouri, acting under their oath to support the Constitution of the United States, to pass no law which shall violate that oath or be repugnant to that constitution? To use the language of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Ross,) on yesterday, can it be believed that they will commit perjury by the passage of such a law? [Here the Speaker reminded Mr. C. that the hour for counting the votes had arrived, and intimated the propriety of his remarks being brought to a conclusion.] Mr. C. respectfully answered that he knew of no hour appointed for any purpose in relation to the business of the House; that, under the suggestion of the honorable Speaker, as well as from a sense of propriety, he should bring his remarks to a conclusion as speedily as possible, consistent with a distinct expression of his views upon the subject before the House. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. C., that if gentlemen could divest themselves of all prejudices—if they were not insensibly influenced by feelings and considerations not necessarily excited by the provision in question, that they would have no difficulty in reconciling the seeming conflict between the Constitution of the United States and the so often referred to clause in the constitution of Missouri. The General Assembly of Missouri will undoubtedly feel themselves bound to perform the duty enjoined upon them by the constitution of that State, limited by the paramount authority of the Constitution of the United States, conformably to the oath which they are required to take. If they were to attempt to extend the provisions of any law beyond this limit, their act would be, so far, not only void, but, if knowingly committed, the members would be guilty of perjury. I have no more to add.

Mr. TRACY was compelled, he said, to vote against the resolution, but for reasons very different from those of Mr. CULBERTH. He was opposed to the resolution because Missouri was neither a State in the Union, nor one out of the Union; but was in fact a territory. He could not, therefore, consent that her votes should be counted at all—considering them entirely foreign to the election of President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. CLAY said he would merely observe, that the difficulty is before us; that we must decide it when the two Houses meet, or avoid it by some previous arrangement. The committee being morally certain that the question would arise on the votes, in joint meeting, thought it best, as he had before stated, to give it the go-by in this way. Suppose this resolution not adopted, the President of the Senate will proceed to open and count the votes; and would the House allow that officer, singly and alone, thus, virtually, to decide the question of the legality of the votes? If not, how then were they to proceed? Was it to be settled by the decision of the two Houses conjointly, or of the two Houses separately? One House would say the votes ought to be counted, the other that they ought not; and then the votes would be lost altogether. Would the gentleman from New York prefer that it be decided in the joint meeting? In that case, he would find himself in a much leaner majority than on the question yesterday. In fact, Mr. C. said, there was no mode pointed out in the constitution of settling litigated questions arising in the discharge of this duty; it was a casus omissus; and he thought it would be proper, either by some act of derivative legislation, or by an amendment of the constitution itself, to supply the defect.

Mr. LIVERMORE made a few remarks in favor of the resolution.

Mr. RHEA made a few remarks in opposition to the resolution. The ground he took was this: that it was not in the power of this House, or of both Houses, by resolution, to remedy a defect in the constitution.

The question on agreeing to the resolution was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 90, nays 67.

So the second resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was then ordered, that a message be sent to the Senate, informing that body, that this House, on its part, concurs in the report of the joint committee, and is now prepared to proceed, with the Senate, in the performance of its constitutional duty.

[Messrs. CLAY, SERGEANT, and VAN RENSSSELAER, were the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, to act with the committee of the Senate, in considering the proper mode of proceeding in regard to counting out the Electoral votes.]

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, gave notice he should, on to-morrow at twelve o'clock, offer for the consideration of the House a resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union, containing in all respects the same provisions as were contained in the resolution from the Senate, which was rejected in this House.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, and by general consent, it was determined that the members of this House should receive the Senate, on their entrance into the House, standing and uncovered. In the same manner it was determined that a sufficient number of the seats on the right hand of the Chair, should be set apart for the Senators.

Mr. CLAY moved that a committee of two members be appointed to receive the Senate, and conduct the President of the Senate to the chair, and the members to the seats assigned to them.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, declared his opposition to this course. It had been usual for the Speaker of the House to receive the President of the Senate, and invite him to a seat beside him; and he saw no reason, at this time, for the proposed innovation.

Mr. CLAY said it was true it never had been done before; but, having, whilst he had the honor to preside over this House, witnessed the embarrassments occasioned by the want of such a regulation, he now thought it would be proper to adopt it.

The motion of Mr. CLAY was then agreed to without a division, though not without negative votes.

Mr. NELSON remarked, in an under tone, that he wished he had required the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. CLAY and Mr. HILL, were appointed a committee accordingly.

Soon after, the Senate came into the Hall, preceded by its President, and attended by its Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms; and the President was conducted to the Speaker's chair, the Speaker occupying a chair at his left hand.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate then delivered the votes of the States, in the following order, to the committee for counting the votes, (Mr. BARBOUR of the Senate, and Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, and SERGEANT of this House,)—and the official authentications, &c., were each of them twice read in an audible tone, and the votes recorded by the Secretary of the Senate and by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, as follows:

[The same as shown in the Senate proceedings of the corresponding day.]

The process of this ceremony was very tedious, from the length of the verifications, proclamations, &c., and the House did not arrive at this stage of it till after four o'clock.

When the votes of the Electors for Missouri were announced, by the PRESIDENT of the Senate, and handed to the tellers—

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, rose, and said: Mr. President and Mr. Speaker, I object to receiving any votes for President and Vice President from Missouri, because Missouri is not a State of this Union.

A motion was then made by a member of the Senate, that the Senate do now withdraw to its Chamber; and, the question having been put, was decided in the affirmative; and the Senate retired.

The House being called to order—

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, then rose and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Missouri is one of the States of this Union, and her votes for President and Vice President of the United States ought to be received and counted.

Mr. F. said, he believed, that gentlemen must now begin to see the precipice to which the decisions of this House in respect to Missouri had brought them. He was, as every member must be, tired of the debate on this subject; but he thought that no one could discharge his duty as he ought without investigating the merits of the question which he had now proposed. He thought it proper, also, that the yeas and nays should be recorded on every question connected with this subject. That the votes of States, whose admission into the Union had not been declared previous to the votes being given in, had heretofore been received for President and Vice President, he believed the gentleman from New Hampshire would not deny. If such a course had been right heretofore, he did not see why an objection should now be made. If innovations on established usage were to be justified by their novelty, then, indeed, all disquisitions on the subject were vain. But the time was, when members from new States were admitted to their seats in this House, without the previous passage of a declaratory resolution. That there was a law on the statute book that any territory having a population of sixty thousand souls might form a constitution and State government, and be admitted into the Union, no one would deny. Whenever we turn our eyes, said Mr. F., and observe the progress of the Government, until the present time, the States have been admitted upon this principle, until in the present case; and in this case, at the last session, a compromise, as it was thought and called, was entered into. Mr. F. hesitated to express in terms all he thought on this subject; but he would say, if he had voted for that law at the last session, and opposed now those principles which would naturally grow out of it, he should have said to himself, when he had done so, that he had done in his life one act which he thought dishonorable. Let us now, said he, have the question fairly at issue. Let us know whether Missouri be a State in the Union or not. If not, let us send her an Ambassador, and treat for her admission into the Union. Sir, we cannot take another step, without hurling this Government into the gulf of destruction. For one, I say, I have gone as far as I can go in the way of compromise—and if there is to be a compromise beyond that point, it must be at the edge of the sword.

Mr. ARCHER, of Maryland said, that entertaining the same sentiments as the gentleman from Virginia with respect to the refusal to admit Missouri into the Union, he yet felt himself bound to move, as he now did, to postpone the further consideration of this resolution indefinitely. He was opposed to this House undertaking to proceed in any manner as to the legality of the Electoral votes. He could recognize no power in the House of Representatives on this subject separate from the Senate. The expressions in the constitution, in regard to the counting of the votes of Electors, &c., he considered as imperative. All questions arising out of it, according to his construction, must be settled in joint meeting of the two Houses. He could not agree that this House had a right to determine whether any vote should be received or rejected. What are the words of the constitution? "The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Does it not follow, asked Mr. R., that the votes must be counted in the presence of the two Houses? For what purpose do they assemble together, unless it be to determine on the legality of the votes? If not for this purpose, the joint meeting is for form and show, and nothing else. We must, in my apprehension, determine the question in joint meeting, and in no other way. Entertaining this opinion, he said he should vote for the indefinite postponement of any proposition, the object of which is to determine, in this House, the legality or illegality of any Electoral vote. At the last election of President, an objection was made by the gentleman who now presides, to receiving the votes of Indiana, because they were given in before the passage of the act declaring her admission into the Union. On that occasion, as now, the Senate retired. I thought then, as now, said Mr. A., that they had no right to retire until the question was settled. On that occasion, the House determined to postpone indefinitely the objection. The motives which induced that determination were doubtless various; it was my opinion, then, that it was improper to entertain the objection in the House, and I think the same of the present proposition.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it was not without reluctance that he offered himself to the attention of the House at this time; but he submitted to the very worthy gentleman from Maryland who had just taken his seat, whether the object which he had in view could, according to his own views of propriety, be effectuated by the course which he had recommended to this House. It was no part of his nature, Mr. R. said, nor of his purpose, to inflate to a greater magnitude this exaggerated question of the admission of Missouri into the Union. But the question had now assumed that aspect which, had it depended on him, it should have taken at an earlier period of the session. It was, he said, not only congenial with the principles and practices of our free Government, but unless he was deceived, with the practices of that country from which we had adopted, and wisely adopted, our manly institutions, that on any occasion when any person presents himself to a representative body with credentials of title to a seat, he shall take his seat, and perform the functions of a member, until a prior and a better claim shall not only be preferred, but established. It was seen that, but the day before yesterday, the Committee of Elections of this House came forward with a report, stating that the qualifications and returns of certain members were perfect who have been acting and legislating, and on whose votes the laws of the land have depended for the last three or four months. Just so it ought to have been with regard to the Representative from the State of Missouri. She had now, said Mr. R., presented herself, for the first time, in a visible and tangible shape. She comes into this House, not in forma pauperis, but claiming to be one of the co-sovereignities of this confederated Government, and presents to you her vote, by receiving or rejecting which the election of your Chief Magistrate will be lawful or unlawful. He did not mean by the vote of Missouri, but by the votes of all the States. Now comes the question, whether we will not merely repel her, but repel her with scorn and contumely. Cui bono? And he might add, quo warranto? He should like to hear, he said, from the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. LIVERMORE,) where this House gets its authority—he should like to hear some of the learned, or unlearned, sages of the law, with which this House, as well as all our legislative bodies, abounds, show their authority for refusing to receive the votes from Missouri. Mr. R. said he went back to the first principles. The Electoral Colleges, he said, are as independent of this House as this House is of them. They had as good a right to pronounce on their qualifications, as this House has of those of its members. Your office, said he, in regard to the electoral votes, is merely ministerial. It is to count the votes, and you undertake to reject votes. To what will this lead? Do you ever expect to see the time when there shall be in the Presidential chair a creature so poor, so imbecile, not only not worthy of being at the head of the nation, but not worthy of being at the head of a petty corporation—do you ever expect to see in that office an animal so poor as not to have in this House retainers enough to enable him to reject the vote of any State which, being counted, might prevent his continuance, and their continuance, and that of their friends, in office? He spoke not of the present incumbent—he was not so wanting in common decency and decorum as to do so—he spoke in reference not only to what is past, but to that which is prospective, and which every man who looks the least into futurity, must know will happen, and, in all probability, will very shortly happen. He undertook to say that if this House should, by a vote of indefinite postponement—for the form was immaterial—or in any other way, and it would be observed, for the first instance in the person of Missouri, of this much-injured, long-insulted, and trampled-upon member of this confederacy, was this example to be set—if, said he, you do, for the first time, now receive the votes of a State, it will be created into a precedent, and that in the lifetime of some of those who now hear me, for the manufacture of Presidents by this House. The wisest men may make constitutions, on paper, as they please.

What, Mr. R. asked, was the theory of this constitution? It is, that this House, except upon a certain contingency, has nothing at all to do with the appointment of President and Vice President of the United States, and when it does act, must act by States, and by States only can it act on this subject, unless it transcend the limits of the constitution. What, he asked, was to be the practice of the constitution, as now proposed? That an informal meeting of this and the other House is to usurp the initiative, the nominative power, with regard to the two first officers of the Government; that they are to wrest from the people of the United States their indefeasible right of telling us whom they wish to exercise the functions of Government, in despite and contempt of their decision. Is there to be no limit to the power of Congress—no mound or barrier to stay their usurpation? Why were the electoral bodies established? The constitution has wisely provided that they shall assemble, each by itself, and not in one great assembly. By this means, assuredly, that system of intrigue which was matured into a science, or rather into an art here, was guarded against. But, Mr. R. ventured to say, that the electoral college of this much-despised Missouri, acting conformably to law, and to the genius and nature of our institutions, if it were composed of but one man, was as independent of this House as this House was of it. If, however, said he, per fas aut nefas, the point is to be carried; if the tocsin is to be sounded; if the troops are to be rallied, and Missouri is to be expelled with scorn from our august presence—how august, Mr. Speaker, I leave it for you to decide—there are those who will be willing to take her to their arms. And, in point of mere expediency, he would ask of gentlemen—he put the suggestion in that shape, because he believed they were inaccessible to other considerations—in point of expediency, he asked them, what were they now doing but riveting those ties by which Missouri would, he trusted, forever be bound to that section of the country by which, with whatever reason, her rights have been supported on this floor? I do look with a sentiment I cannot express, said Mr. R.—I look with a sentiment of pity—and that has been said to be nearly allied to love, as I know it to be allied to a very different emotion—I look with pity on those who believe that, by their feeble efforts in this House, governed by forms and technicalities—your Sergeant-at-Arms and committees of attendance, and mummeries such as belong to other countries where I have never travelled, and trust in God I never shall—they can stop the growth of the rising empire in the West. Let gentlemen lay a resolution on the table, let it be engrossed in a fair hand, and do you, Mr. Speaker, sign it, that the waves of the Mississippi shall not seek the ocean, and then send your Sergeant-at-Arms to carry it into execution, and see whether you can enforce it with all the force, physical or moral, under your control. Mr. R. concluded by expressing his hope that the gentleman from Maryland would withdraw his motion for indefinite postponement.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said he believed it was pretty well ascertained that he was willing to go as great lengths as any man in this House to support the rights of Missouri. He regretted that, even in this skirmish, he was obliged to separate himself from those with whom he had acted with so much pleasure and with so much zeal. But he could not maintain, what he should do by voting for this resolution, that Missouri is now a State of this Union. Was it contended that Congress has not a right to require the submission of the constitution of a new State to its consideration before she becomes a member of the Union? If so, would any man contend that Congress had not a right to pass, in some shape or other, upon the constitution of any new State? Was there any one of his colleagues who would say, that there was no possible case in which he might not be induced to reject the constitution of Missouri? Suppose the constitution she has offered had been notoriously aristocratical, was there any man among them who would not have given his vote for the exclusion of Missouri from the confederacy? We presume not. If he were to give his vote for this resolution, Mr. A. said, he should contradict all the language he had hitherto held in respect to Missouri; for, if she was a State without the consent of Congress, she had no right to complain of oppression by the refusal of Congress to recognize her.

Mr. A. said he should continue to reprobate the odious and foul combination by which Missouri is kept out of the Union; but should he give a vote for this resolution, he should feel himself precluded from doing so. If, indeed, the case were presented, whether the member from Missouri should be admitted to a seat on this floor, he should give a vote affirmatively; for it would be tantamount to an admission of the State of Missouri into the Union. But, were he to vote for this proposition, he should vote for an evident solecism; it would be saying that, though it has been decided that Missouri shall not be admitted into the Union, yet she shall exercise the highest functions of a member of the Confederacy. Mr. A. said he could not hold that language, or present himself in that character. Opposed in general to postponements, he should vote against the proposed postponement, in order to meet the question directly. He had no notion, he added, of the doctrine which he had heard for the first time to-day, that you may have a problematical or hypothetical election of a President and Vice President. Suppose the result of the election depended on the votes of Missouri, and the same course was to be pursued which was now indicated; the President of the Senate would have to announce that, in one event, we had a

President, whilst in another we had not, and the Government would be left without a head, and a dissolution of the Union would be the possible immediate consequence. He was a little surprised, he said, at one ground which had been taken on this occasion: that the House had no power to pass any judgment on any return. He had always thought that, wherever was lodged the power to receive a return, there also was the power to pass a judgment on the validity of that return. Suppose any territory, not within the limits of the United States at the time, Florida, for example, to send votes here for Electors; was there no authority by which these votes could be rejected? Suppose a State entitled to 27 votes, should send 37 votes, would any gentleman contend that there was no power in this House to judge of the proper number? Could there ever be a pure election—could it ever be ascertained who was elected, in the event of the establishment of a doctrine of that sort? Mr. A. concluded by declaring his readiness to adopt any measure to bring Missouri, now trampled down by power, into the Union, but he could not vote for this resolution.

Mr. CLAY next obtained the floor, but gave way to allow Mr. RANDOLPH to make an explanation.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, it was highly probable that the few remarks which he had made might give rise to misapprehensions in the minds of other gentlemen, as they had done in the mind of his colleague. He, therefore, wished to explain. His position, he said, was misunderstood. It had been said, and pertinently said, that Missouri might be admitted into the Union in more ways than one. His position, then, was, that this is the first instance in which Missouri has knocked at the door and demanded her rights. It is now for us, said Mr. R., by permitting her to come in, or rather by refraining from extruding her from this Hall, to determine whether she shall now be one of our Commonwealth, or, as the fashion is to call it, of our Empire. Mr. R. said he had no doubt that Congress might drive Missouri into the wilderness, like another son of Hagar. If we do, said he, we drive her at our own peril. If either of the worthy Senators and Representative from Missouri, whose long forbearance had excited surprise in no man's breast more than in that of Mr. R.—he did not mean to blame them for pursuing the counsel of cooler heads than his—had presented themselves here, would you (addressing the Speaker) have felt yourself bound to exclude them from the communion with more than papal power; not only from the cup of wine, but from the bread of life itself? Let me tell my friend before me, (Mr. ARCHER), we have not the power which he seems to think we possess; and if this be a casus omnisus in the constitution, I want to know where we acquire the power to supply the defect. You may keep Missouri out of the Union by violence, but here the issue is joined. She comes forward in the person of her Presidential and Vice Presidential Electors, instead of that of her Representative; and she was thus presented in a shape as unquestionable as that of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, or the proudest and oldest State in the Union. She comes forward by her attorneys—her Electors. Will you deny them admittance? Will you thrust her Electors, and hers only, from this Hall? Mr. R. said his friend had not given to this subject the sort of consideration which he knew him to be capable of giving it. I made no objection, said Mr. R., to the votes of New Hampshire, Maine, or Vermont: I have had as good a right to object to the votes of New Hampshire, as the gentleman from New Hampshire has to object to the votes of Missouri. Who made thou, Cain, thy brother's keeper? Who put Missouri into custody of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire? The Electors of Missouri are as much homines probi et legales as the Electors of New Hampshire. This, Mr. R. said, was no skirmish, as it had been called. This was the battle when Greek meets Greek; it was a conflict not to be decided between the phalanx and the legion, whether the impenetrability of the one or the activity of the other shall prevail. Let us buckle on our armor, said Mr. R.; let us put aside all this flummery, these metaphysical distinctions, these legal technicalities, these special pleadings, this dry minuteness, this unprofitable drawing of distinctions without difference; let us say now, as we have said on another occasion, we will assert, maintain, and vindicate our rights, or put to every hazard what you pretend to hold in such high estimation.

Mr. R. said he recollected perfectly well, in the celebrated election of Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr—they live, said he, illustrious examples of the merits of their respective partisans—what were we then told? Why, that we must withdraw our opposition, or there would be no election; that a dissolution of the Union impended; that volcanoes began to play; that earthquakes yawned beneath us; and, recollect, sir, we had a President in the chair who had a majority in this House, small as it was. He treated the idea of giving way with derision and scorn. We said we will not give way, and you must take the consequences. We appealed, said Mr. R., to the good sense of the nation; and I do now appeal to this nation, said he, whether this pretended sympathy for the rights of free negroes and mulattoes is to supersede the rights of the free white citizens of ten times their whole number. They gave way, sir, said Mr. R.; the sheep is the most timid and helpless of all animals; it retreats before any attack is offered to it. The President of the United States, said Mr. R., possesses great powers and highly responsible functions, and should be looked up to with veneration and deference, because he is the Chief Magistrate of a people, legally appointed by their suffrages. But a

President of the United States, appointed by the exclusion of the votes of those who are the same flesh and blood as ourselves—for the people of Missouri are not natives of Missouri, with the exception of a few French and still fewer Spaniards—is no more the Chief Magistrate of the country than that thing—that pageant, which the majorities of the two Houses proposed to set up just twenty years ago—a President made by law—no, by the form and color of law, against the principles of the constitution, and in violation of the rights of the freemen of this country. Sir, said Mr. R., I would not give a button for him. On his personal account, and for his personal qualities, I might treat him with respect as an individual, but as Chief Magistrate of this country, he would be more odious to my judgment than one of the house of Stuart attempting to seat himself on the throne of England, in defiance of the laws of succession and of the opinion of the people. We have, I am afraid, so long basked in the impure atmosphere, not of this House, but of this Court, that—

Mr. CLAY here claimed the floor, which he had yielded to the gentleman only for the purpose of making an explanation.

Mr. RANDOLPH took his seat, saying that he would give way to the honorable gentleman in every thing but one.

Mr. CLAY said he really saw no difficulty in this business; and, before he sat down, should make a motion, with a view to put an end to this discussion. The House and Senate have, by a joint act, this day agreed, that, in the event of an objection being made to the vote of Missouri, her vote should be counted hypothetically; that the whole number should be announced, including the vote of Missouri, and that the number should also be stated as it would be, the vote of Missouri being excluded; and, the result not varying, that it should be declared that, in either case, the person having the largest number of votes was duly elected. The motive which operated on the joint committee in recommending this course, and on the two Houses in adopting it, was to avoid the very difficulty into which the House was about to precipitate itself. It was an effort to provide, by previous arrangement, for the very contingency which has arisen. The moment the objection was made, in that instant the rule adopted this morning took effect. Mr. C. said it therefore appeared to him, with very great deference to the course of the presiding officer of the Senate, that he ought to have gone on, and, after the votes had been summed up, to have made the annunciation as proposed in the joint resolution adopted this morning.

The two Houses ought not, in the opinion of Mr. C., to have separated until they had consummated what had been stipulated for. He was now not willing to take up any proposition on this subject or any other, however unwilling he might have been to meet it at any other time. He was opposed to do so, because to do so is a violation of good faith between the two Houses, as pledged by the arrangement of this morning. He had not a doubt, he said, that Missouri might be admitted into the Union in a variety of ways, and very possibly, on proper examination, the mode now proposed might be one of them, by the two Houses, jointly or separately, giving her the exercise of a right which, as a State, would belong to her. The House, however, as well as the Senate, had virtually determined to get round that question to-day, and to put an end to any controversy which might arise in respect to it, in the manner contemplated by the second resolution passed this morning. Mr. C. therefore moved that the subject now under consideration be laid on the table, in order to resume the business which had been interrupted by the retirement of the Senate.

Mr. STORRS demanded the reading of the first resolution which passed this House, as compared with that which passed the Senate.

[Here took place an explanation of a variation which had taken place in the form of the resolve. As it came from the Senate the President of the Senate was to preside over the joint meeting. As reported by the committee on the part of this House the President of the Senate was to preside over the Senate, and the Speaker was to preside over the House of Representatives. This alteration was made, because it was known that the House of Representatives would not have agreed to the other course, and a collision might have arisen between the two Houses. It may be added, that the Senate were not aware, when they came into the Hall, of the change of the arrangement, but supposed it to stand, as they had voted it. Their retirement from the Chamber arose from the President of the Senate having learned these facts after he was seated in his place in the Hall. He would otherwise, it is supposed, have gone on to proclaim the result, immediately after Mr. LIVERMORE's objection, as prescribed in the resolution.]

Some conversation took place between Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, CLAY, RANDOLPH, NELSON of Virginia, FOOT, and COBB, as to the state in which matters would be, on the Senate's return. Some of the gentlemen contended that, on the Senate's return, matters would stand just as they did before, and the same difficulty as had already presented itself would again arise. Others contended, and the majority appeared to be with them, that, on the return of the Senate, the President would go on to declare the result, as directed in the second joint resolution of this morning.

The question was taken on Mr. CLAY's motion to lay Mr. FLOYD's resolution on the table, and decided in the affirmative, ayes 103. And then, on motion of Mr. Clay, it was ordered, that a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that the House is now ready to receive the Senate in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of continuing the enumeration of the votes of the Electors for President and Vice President, according to the joint resolutions agreed upon between the two Houses; and that the Clerk go with the said message.

The Clerk accordingly went with the said message; and he being returned—

The Senate again appeared, and took seats in the House as before.

The President of the Senate, in the presence of both Houses, proceeded to open the certificate of the Electors of the State of Missouri, which he delivered to the tellers, by whom it was read, and who registered the same.

And the votes of all the States having been thus counted, registered, and the list thereof compared, they were delivered to the President of the Senate, by whom they were read, as already printed.

The President of the Senate then, in pursuance of the resolution adopted by the two Houses, proceeded to announce the state of the votes to the two Houses of Congress, in joint meeting assembled, as follows:

"Were the votes of Missouri to be counted, the result would be—For JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, for President of the United States, 231 votes: if not counted, for JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, 228 votes:—For DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, for Vice President of the United States, 218 votes: if not counted, for DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, for Vice President of the United States, 215 votes. But in either event, JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, has a majority of the votes of the whole number of Electors for President, and DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, has a majority of the votes of the whole number of Electors for Vice President of the United States."

The President of the Senate had proceeded thus far, or nearly thus far, in the proclamation, when Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, addressed the Chair, and inquired whether the votes of Missouri were or were not counted.

Cries of Order! Order! were so loud as to drown Mr. FLOYD's voice.

[The President of the Senate had hesitated in the proclamation, on Mr. FLOYD addressing the Chair.]

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and was addressing the Chair, when loud cries of Order! Order! resounded from many voices.

The SPEAKER pronounced Mr. RANDOLPH to be out of order, and invited him to take his seat.

Mr. BRUSH demanded that Mr. RANDOLPH should be allowed to proceed, and declared his determination to sustain his right to do so. Mr. B. was also loudly called to order.

Mr. FLOYD demanded of the Chair whether he was considered in order or not.

The SPEAKER determined that he was not in order at this time, the only business being at that present time that prescribed by the rule of this morning.

There was considerable murmuring at this decision; but order was restored; when the President of the Senate concluded his announcement as follows:

"I therefore declare that JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, is duly elected President of the United States, for four years, to commence on the fourth day of March, 1821; and that DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, is duly elected Vice President of the United States, for the like term of four years, to commence on the said fourth day of March, 1821."

As the President concluded—

Mr. RANDOLPH addressed the Chair; but was required to take his seat.

On motion by a member of the Senate, the Senate retired from the hall.

After they retired, and the House being called to order—

Mr. RANDOLPH, who had still retained the floor, was heard addressing the Chair. He spoke for some time, without being distinctly heard, owing to the confusion in the hall. He had, he said, seen every election of President of the United States, except that of the present Chief Magistrate, and he had never before heard any other form of proclamation than that such was the whole number of votes given in; that such a person, A or B, had so many, and was therefore elected President or Vice President of the United States. On this occasion no such announcement had been made, and the presiding officer might just as well have said that James Claxton or Thomas Dunn was elected President of the United States. Were gentlemen to be put down by clamor and by force here for getting up to assert, not only their rights, but the rights of the whole people of the United States? Sir, said he, your election is vitiated; you have finched from the question; you have attempted to evade the decision of that which was essential to the determination of who is and who is not elected Chief Magistrate of the United States. Mr. R. concluded his remarks by moving resolutions declaring the election to be illegal, &c. They were as follows:

1. Resolved, That the electoral votes of the State of Missouri have this day been counted, and do constitute a part of the majority of two hundred and thirty-one votes given for President, and of two hundred and eighteen votes given for Vice President.

2. Resolved, That the whole number of Electors appointed, and of votes given for President and Vice President, has not been announced by the presiding officer of the Senate and House of Representatives, agreeably to the provision of the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the proceeding has been irregular and illegal.

Whilst Mr. R. was reducing his motion to writing, several gentlemen claimed the floor.

The SPEAKER determined that Mr. LATHROP was entitled to it; and Mr. L. moved to adjourn.

Mr. FLOYD claimed the right of the floor, as rising first, and demanded to be heard.

The SPEAKER affirmed Mr. LATHROP's right.

Mr. FLOYD was about appealing from the decision of the Chair, but did not.

Mr. RINGGOLD having demanded the yeas and nays on the question of adjournment, the question was taken accordingly—yeas 95, nays 50.

THURSDAY, February 15.

Admission of Missouri—Proposition of Mr. Clark, of New York.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, submitted the following motion, accompanying it with some remarks in support of it:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever, on the first Monday in December next: Provided, That, previous to the said first Monday in December next, Missouri shall have expunged from her constitution the following clause, to wit: "It shall be the duty of the Legislature, as soon as may be, to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to or settling in this State, under any pretext whatever." And that on said day, certified copies of said constitution, so amended, shall be delivered to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

On the question to proceed to the consideration of this resolution, it was decided in the affirmative, by a vote of 60 to 46.

Mr. CLARK, not desiring the resolution to be acted on to-day, moved to lay it on the table; and the motion was agreed to—ayes 73.

Bounty to Fishing Vessels.

The House then, on motion of Mr. McLEAN, proceeded to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him some time ago, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the bounties and allowances paid to fishing vessels each year, from the commencement of the Government to the present time.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the same by adding thereto the following:

"And of the quantity of salt imported annually, and not re-exported with benefit of drawback; also the amount of duty annually collected on the same during the period aforesaid."

This motion to amend was negatived by a small majority.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, then moved to amend Mr. McLEAN's motion by adding thereto the following:

"And of the quantity of salt annually imported into each State, and not re-exported with benefit of drawback; also, the amount of duty annually collected on the same in each State during the time aforesaid."

This amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was then adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to this House a statement of the bounties and allowances paid to fishing vessels in each year, from the commencement of the Government to the present time; and of the quantity of salt annually imported into each State, and not re-exported with benefit of drawback; also, the amount of duty annually collected on the same, in each State, during the time aforesaid.

The Slave Trade and Emancipation.

Mr. MEXES, of New York, rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to certain resolutions which he had the honor of submitting to its consideration at the last session of Congress. These resolutions related to the subject of slavery. He had, he said, somewhat modified the resolutions offered at the last session, and would now read them to the House before he proceeded further to explain his views in relation to them. He was aware that, on the first mention of this subject, unpleasant feelings might be excited in one part of the House, but he trusted, on examination of the proposed plan, it would appear less objectionable than was believed; and he ardently hoped, indeed, that ultimately it might be found the means of closing forever, by one of the most glorious acts of legislation that ever proceeded from any legislative body, the growing controversy between the North and South, acknowledged on all hands to be of a most serious and alarming nature. [Mr. M. read his resolutions, as below.] When, he said, it was considered that, in the certain increase of our population, doubling in twenty-five years, we should see, in half a century, not less than forty millions of people in the United States, of which perhaps twenty would be inhabitants of the vast countries beyond the Mississippi, we cannot fail to admit that the five hundred millions of acres, contemplated to be devoted as a fund for the emancipation of slaves, will have had a value more than competent to the redemption and colonization of all such of our slave population as it shall be found expedient or desirable to part with. Let me endeavor, said he, to show in a few words the practical operation of this fund. Suppose the lands, intended to constitute this fund, to be surveyed into the usual sections and quarter sections, and numbered; that the alternate numbered portions be sold for certificates of the value of slaves; that the intermediate portions be disposed of only for cash; that the certificates of value of slaves be furnished in the following manner: whenever the owner of slaves is willing to part with them, let him make application to the district judge of the district, who, with the marshal of the district, shall, together with the owner and some discreet person appointed on his part, ascertain the value of the slaves proposed to be emancipated; that, when such valuation is made, it shall be at the option of the owner finally to accede to it; that, on his consent, the district judge shall deliver to him a certificate of such valuation, which shall be receivable only in payment for the alternate sections of which I have spoken. Then, will it not be apparent, that, if such alternate sections are purchased with such certificates, the intermediate portions will acquire a value which will command sufficient sums of money to defray the expenses of colonization? Will not this operation proceed pari passu? Mr. M. said he had witnessed, with constant anxiety, the progress of the great controversy which now agitates us, and had, from the beginning of his career, as a member of this House, determined, if it should become necessary, to devote himself a sacrifice for the great object, if possible, of keeping the two great parties in peace. I do not know, said he, whether I have made such a sacrifice. It is probable I have, by the well-known course which I have pursued upon this subject. But, sir, if indeed I have lost the confidence of those whom I represent, I will, before I leave my present station, at least make one effort for the purpose of uniting the parties by the only measure which appears to me to be calculated to unite them; one, too, in which both may participate, and in which they will, as I repeat, perform one of the most noble acts of legislation; one which I would not exchange for all the laws on our statute books from 1789 to this day. I have even indulged what may be considered an extremely romantic opinion, that the original plan of Las Casas,* of preventing the destruction of the Indian race by supplying their place with the hardy natives of Africa, may yet terminate in restoring to Africa, from the pressure of the great necessity which we feel on the subject, her long estranged children, with the first principles of the Christian religion and of education, so that Africa, long benighted, may assume a respectable rank among the people of the world. Mr. M. then submitted the following resolution:

* Bartholomew de Las Casas, Bishop of Chiapa, and Apostle of Indian Humanity. The labors of his life, in behalf of the Indians of the New World, gained him the philanthropic title by which he has been distinguished; and well they might, for these labors were great, and long-disinterested, and full of toil and danger. Born a noble, (at Seville, Spain, 1574,) he embraced the ecclesiastical profession at the age of nineteen, that he might devote himself to missionary labors in behalf of a people whose oppressions he had seen in a visit with his father to San Domingo. What he began in youthful ardor was continued with undiminished zeal to the end of his life. Fifty years he spent in preaching the gospel to the natives and humanity to their oppressors. Twelve times he crossed the ocean, to plead at the foot of the Spanish throne, the cause of the wretched Indians, perishing under the labor of the mines, and the severity of their treatment. Consoling the oppressed, devising schemes for their relief, and struggling against the oppressor, was the fifty years labor of his existence. History attributes to him the origin of African slavery in the New World—a scheme to relieve the Indian from labor in the mines by putting the African into his place. If so, it is one of the instances—an eminent one—of how much evil a mistaken philanthropy can do, absorbed by one thought, and blind to the consequences of gratifying it. But the memory of the good bishop has found defenders from that reproach, and the friends of benevolence would wish it untrue.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of devoting five hundred millions acres of public lands next west of the Mississippi, as a fund for the purpose of, in the first place, employing a naval force, competent to the annihilation of the slave trade. Secondly, the gradual emancipation of slaves, by a voluntary exchange of the lands for them; and, lastly, colonizing such emancipated slaves in such way as may be conducive to their happiness in their original country, Africa: Provided, That no such exchange of lands for slaves shall ever be suffered or allowed, except upon the perfectly ascertained consent of such slaves, to be colonized in Africa: And provided, also, That, wherever such exchanges are, or shall be made, no separation of husband and wife, or parent and child, shall be permitted contrary to their well-ascertained consent.

The question on proceeding to consider the resolution was decided in the affirmative—68 to 50 votes.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The question on laying the resolution on the table was decided in the affirmative—66 to 55.

FRIDAY, February 16.

In calling over the States for the reception of petitions, when petitions were called for from Tennessee—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, rose, and said that, from the commencement of the session, he had discovered that the presiding officer of the House had, in his call for petitions from the States, uniformly called for petitions from "the delegate from Missouri;" when, in his opinion, there was no such personage in this House, and therefore moved a discontinuance of such call.

Mr. SPEAKER declared such motion out of order at this time, and Mr. JONES reluctantly gave way, apparently with an intention to renew the proposition when it should be in order.

Death of William A. Burwell.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, then announced the death of WILLIAM A. BURWELL, a member of this House from that State: Whereupon,

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of WILLIAM A. BURWELL, deceased, late Representative from the State of Virginia.

Mr. NELSON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. NEWTON, Mr. MCCOY, Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. TYLER, and Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, were appointed the said committee.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members of this House will testify their respect for the memory of William A. Burwell, late one of their body, by wearing crape on the left arm for the remainder of the session.

Resolved, unanimously, That the members will attend the funeral of the late William A. Burwell, to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to notify them of the death of WILLIAM A. BURWELL, late a member of this House, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. NELSON informed the House that it was the wish of the deceased to be interred in the city of Baltimore, and the attendance of the members on the funeral would not be required beyond the lines of the city.

And the House adjourned to 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

SATURDAY, February 17.

The House met, and, together with the Senate, attended the funeral of the late WILLIAM A. BURWELL, in the manner recommended by the Committee of Arrangements appointed for that purpose; and, having returned to their Chamber, on motion—

The House adjourned to Monday.

Spanish American Republics.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee appointed to present to the President of the United States the resolution adopted by this House on the 10th instant, in relation to the contest now carrying on between Spain and her South American Colonies, reported—

That the committee had according to order presented the resolution to the President; that the President assured the committee that, in common with the people of the United States and the House of Representatives, he felt great interest in the success of the provinces of Spanish America which are struggling to establish their freedom and independence; and that he would take the resolution into deliberate consideration, with the most perfect respect for the distinguished body from which it had emanated.

WEDNESDAY, February 21.

Missouri—Proposed Repeal of the Compromise because the State was not Admitted.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the 8th section of the act of Congress, approved March 6, 1820, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories;" said 8th section imposing a prohibition and restriction upon the introduction of slaves in all that territory ceded by France to the United States, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of 36 degrees 30 minutes north latitude, not included in the State contemplated by that act.

On submitting the resolution, Mr. BROWN addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I rise, with unfeigned reluctance, to present to the consideration of this honorable body the resolution which I hold in my hand, with a concise statement of the views upon which it is founded. Nothing short, sir, of an imperative sense of duty would have influenced me, at this late day of the session, to have consumed one moment of that time which has become so important to the interest of this nation. I have been emboldened to ask your pardon, and that of the honorable body over which you preside, from a reflection that a few days more will close my Congressional labors, probably forever, and that, up to this period, I have been sparing of your time, and do not expect again, while I remain on the floor, to ask your indulgence.

Before I advance to the investigation of the merits of the resolution, I owe it to my colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) who is also my friend and messmate, to explain why, having communicated to several others my design of proposing this resolution, I have carefully avoided mentioning the subject to him, though in daily habits of intimacy, and although I have no friend, living, whose approbation I more highly prize. My mind has been made up, after much reflection upon the purpose of this resolution, so soon as it should be decided that Missouri was not to be admitted into the Union; that decision has already taken place, and there is not, apparent to me, any reasonable ground for expecting its reversal here. My colleague, (Mr. CLAY,) who has labored arduously and zealously to settle this question, and tranquillize the Union, is not willing yet to despair; he indulges the hope that something may still be done. Had I communicated my design to him, I thought it likely that he might advise the withholding it, yet longer; and admonished and determined against further delay, by a recollection of the early close of my privilege on this floor, and the still earlier day at which circumstances required me to leave it, I have thought it better to proceed, without the possible approbation of my colleague, than against his probable advice.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a peculiar aptness between the subject which I propose for your consideration and the remnant of the session; let it be recollected, that two sessions have been wasted away in the fruitless discussion of propositions relating to Missouri; all parts of the United States and all classes of your citizens have suffered and groaned, without that legislative aid which was required by their wants, and called for by their petitions; while you have denied them your attention, and even withheld from them your sympathy. Sir, there exists a further objection to this untimely effort to despatch the important business of the nation;

nearly an equal half of this House, from the South and West, feel themselves and their constituents deeply aggrieved; they cannot bend and confine their attention, at this late hour, to new and important subjects, called for by those who have, with apparent unconcern, set at naught their rights, their interests, and their feelings; and, if stoical enough to do so, they should recollect the frailty of humanity, and avoid temptation. Sir, with me, (I cannot dissemble,) the salt of legislation has lost its savor. The subject I propose is one rendered just and necessary by the result of the legislation of almost the whole preceding part of this Congress: I mean your refusal to admit Missouri into the Union. I do not believe the few remaining days of the session can be better employed than in adapting the laws and measures of this Government to the extraordinary crisis, at which we have at length arrived.

Mr. Speaker, you will perceive that the same act of Congress which contains the clause authorizing the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, contains also the clause which I now propose to repeal. The history of that act is better known in this Hall, than it is out of it; and as it has become important that it should be fully understood by the nation, although I referred to it on a former occasion, while addressing the House, it seems so necessary to a clear comprehension of my proposition, that I must entreat your patience, while I again make a statement of the facts. I appreciate the indulgence shown me, and will be as concise and rapid as possible.

I now, sir, proceed to make the statement upon which my resolution is predicated, and I invite the correction of gentlemen who may believe me in any degree incorrect. Upon the motion of the present honorable Speaker of this House, who was also the mover of the restriction, a committee was raised early in the last session, upon the subject of the contemplated restriction on Missouri, for the avowed purpose of compromising and allaying a subject which even then, in the cradle, gave indications of its being an infant Hercules: and I will do the honorable Speaker the justice to say, that I do not believe he would have proposed a mode or suggested a principle by which this affair should be settled, that he did not believe consistent with the dictates of morality and reason. The committee thus raised did not disagree upon principles, but upon lines of longitude and latitude. All were willing for a compromise, but the position of the lines presented insuperable difficulties, and the committee, on their application, was discharged. The bill preparatory to the admission of Missouri passed the House of Representatives with a restriction, and was reported to the Senate; the Senate had a bill before them for the admission of Maine into the Union: Maine was on the extreme eastern, Missouri on the extreme western limb of the United States. Maine was called for by the non-slaveholding States of the North and East; Missouri, by the slaveholding States of South and West; the East was jealous of the growth and power of the West, which excited alarm and jealousy in the West: Maine in the east was to be admitted without restrictions; Missouri in the west claimed the same exemption from the intrusion of the General Government: to calm these jealousies, allay these fears, and at the same time to do equal justice to the East and West, the Senate determined that Maine and Missouri should, by the same act, and at the same instant, pass the threshold into the Union; and that each should enter, equally unfettered by restriction. This was just and wise, and did honor to the calm and well-balanced minds of that venerable body. The bill from the House of Representatives preparatory to the admission of Missouri, being thus amended by the Senate, was reported to the House; the House disagreed; the Senate insisted; the House rejected; a committee of conference was appointed to settle, if possible, these differences between the two branches of Congress and the friends of Maine and Missouri. The joint committee, after much anxious deliberation, came to a settlement, satisfactory to a large majority of Congress, and to a much larger proportion of this nation; the friends of Missouri having agreed that Maine, unfettered, should be admitted forthwith into the Union; and having reluctantly consented to the imposition of a restriction upon the territory west of Missouri. Those who opposed Missouri agreed to withdraw their opposition, and to consent to her admission without restriction. When I speak of the parties agreeing to propositions, I do not intend to be understood that every person agreed, but a sufficient number to constitute a majority, and to carry their arrangement through Congress. The terms of the compromise being thus well understood and agreed upon, the bill for the admission of Maine into the Union immediately passed; and this bill also passed authorizing Missouri to form a constitution and State government without restriction, and containing upon its face a stipulation that she should be admitted into the Union upon the footing of the original States; which bill also imposed the restriction upon the territory, which restriction I now contend should be repealed. Missouri assembled her convention, and formed her constitution, laid down, according to the practice of other States, the territorial government, and put into full operation her State government: she chose her Representative and Senators, who, under the faith of this law, presented her constitution, and asked admittance into the Union. They have been unjustly and unkindly rejected; and the attempt has been renewed to impose upon her the odious restriction, bought off at the last session; and, what would seem almost incredible, none can have been more zealous to produce her rejection than the Representatives, with a single exception, from this very State of Maine, who could not have been upon this floor at this time, or probably in all after time, but for the compromise; for Massachusetts, whose consent was indispensable to the emancipation of Maine, had cautiously given it with a limitation, which would have run out in a day or two after the compromise and her admission; and it was represented here to be very doubtful whether Massachusetts would ever afterwards have again yielded her consent. To the honor of Maine, her Senators (Holmes and Chandler) and one of her Representatives (Shaw*) have preserved good faith, and have contended and voted for the admission of Missouri, and the fulfilment of the terms of compromise, with such modification of her constitution as obviated the objectionable feature.

Now, Mr. Speaker, upon the principles of eternal justice which govern the intercourse and contracts of individuals, and the negotiation and compacts of communities, states, and nations, I demand of Congress, not for myself, but for one-half of the United States, the repeal of this restriction upon the territory west and north of Missouri. The consideration promised for this restriction has not been paid; the plighted faith of Congress for the admission of Missouri has been violated; then take off, at least, the restriction. Give us Missouri without restriction, or place us in the same situation, by taking it off of the territory, in which we were when you entered into the covenant, and gave us the solemn pledge of a law to do so. Sir, the course of the majority can be justified by no principle of reason or sound policy, but must rest, for its support, upon the antiquated doctrines of schoolmen and casuists, of pious fraud; the end sanctifying the means; of doing evil that good may come of it; which, though they have received the reprobation of true moralists, may find a place in the new code of ethics, likely to grow out of these times.

Mr. B. having concluded—

The preliminary question was put—"Will the House now proceed to consider this resolution?" It was decided in the negative—79 votes to 43. So the resolution lies on the table.

THURSDAY, February 22.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An engrossed resolution providing for jails, in certain cases, for the safe custody of persons committed under the authority of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COCKE,

Resolved, that this House will, at 12 o'clock on Monday next, proceed to ballot for a printer to execute its work during the next Congress, according to the provisions of the "resolution directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer, or printers," passed on the 3d day of March, 1819.

Mr. CROWELL moved that the several orders of the day which precede the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers of public lands prior to the 1st of July, 1820," be postponed, for the purpose of taking the said bill into consideration.

And the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the orders of the day which precede the bill making appropriations for the naval service of the United States, were postponed until to-morrow.

Ratification of the Treaty of 1819 with Spain.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, between the United States and Spain, signed on the 22d of February, 1819, having been ratified by the contracting parties, and the ratifications having been exchanged, it is herewith communicated to Congress, that such legislative measures may be taken as they shall judge proper, for carrying the same into execution.

JAMES MONROË.

WASHINGTON, February 22, 1821.

The Message was read, and, together with the Treaty, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Missouri—Mr. Clay's Motion for a Grand Joint Committee.

Mr. CLAY then rose to make his expected motion respecting Missouri, which was in the following shape:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, on the part of this House, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report to the Senate and to the House, respectively, whether it be expedient or not to make provision for the admission of Missouri into the Union on the same footing as the original States, and for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within Missouri; and, if not, whether any other, and what provision, adapted to her actual condition, ought to be made by law.

On this motion there took place a debate of about one hour's length.

Mr. FLOYD moved to amend the same by striking out these words, viz: "and if not, whether any other and what provision adapted to her actual condition ought to be made by law."

And the question being taken so to amend, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken to agree to the resolution, and passed in the affirmative, yeas 101, nays 55.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, it was ordered that

* When this question was again revived, and Missouri admitted, Mr. Hill, of Maine, voted for her admission.

the said committee consist of twenty-three members; and that they be elected by ballot, pursuant to the rules and orders of the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH then moved that one member of the said committee be chosen from each State; which being negatived,

Mr. CLAY moved that the House do now proceed to the said election.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, moved that the House proceed to the election to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. TRACY moved that the House proceed to the election on Monday next, at 12 o'clock.

This latter motion being rejected, the question was taken on the motion to proceed to the election to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and passed in the affirmative.

FRIDAY, February 23.

Public Land Debt.

The House then, on motion of Mr. CROWELL, again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of purchasers of the public lands prior to the 1st of July, 1820.

Mr. MCCOY had moved to strike out so much of the bill as permits a conditional surrender to the United States of the land purchased; so much as dispenses with interest on the money due for lands; and so much as makes a deduction, in certain cases, of twenty-five and thirty-seven and a half per cent. from the amount of the debt.

This motion gave rise to a wide debate on the merits of the bill, in the course of which the principle of the bill was supported and opposed by the following gentlemen: For the bill—Messrs. ANDERSON, BRUSH, HENDRICKS, JONES, and CLAY. Against the bill—Messrs. HARDIN, CULPEPER, ALLEN of Tennessee, and MCCOY.

Mr. ALLEN, of Tennessee, said: The argument so much relied upon by the friends of the bill, that the Government is the creditor, and ought not to exercise that rigor in exacting compliance with contracts ruinous to her debtors that individuals would, because it is the common stock of all, as well as that urged on account of the depreciation of certain bank paper that will not pay the holder's debts without a discount equal to the reduction contemplated in the second section of the bill, would apply with force if the whole community were debtors of this description, and to be provided for in this bill; but when not one in a thousand has purchased public land, and all are laboring under the difficulty so feelingly described, can it be right to apply the remedy to a few, and leave others to struggle through as they can?

I hope I shall never be found hindmost in binding up the wounds inflicted by misfortune upon any of the sons of Adam. But, sir, the wretched and the poor presented to us here in such lively figures, have no part or lot in this matter; it is not the poor that buy land in any country.

Can any man make me believe that a farmer, owning a plantation on which he has resided three or four years without rent, is to be broken up and ruined by the payment of eighty dollars a year, the sum required to complete his title to a tract of a hundred and sixty acres of fertile land, under the law as it now stands? Such purchasers, I repeat it, can and will pay, and the greater part of them have done so already.

The provisions of this bill give such purchasers the liberty of paying annually fifty dollars, without interest, for eight years. If punctually paid it is not half the rent the poor have to pay for a home in any country; and if in default, you give them the chance of eight years more without paying anything. This is going further than they could ask. But, in getting at the class of purchasers for whom this bill is intended, it is necessary to attend to the poor, as, on other occasions, sometimes it is done to suit the views of the rich; they are the class whose interest is consulted in this bill; they have contrived to get all the land that is worth any thing in their possession; and a careful examination of the first section of the bill will convince any disinterested man that the object is to get the whole eventually for nothing.

If it is to be given away, I want a distribution more equal. The most deserving get none; men who risked their lives disputing the title of the aborigines, and marched over the dead bodies of your enemies to gain this land, get not one foot of it, but that which has been refused by these avaricious landmongers.

Independent of all the injustice that must follow this gratuity, among the land debtors, I view the precedent as a dangerous one in relation to the collection of revenue—I think I see another class of debtors ready to put in for their share.

The whole dependence of this Government is on revenue derived from imports that is now owing by merchants, who have experienced greater losses than any class of men in the community. They are too useful and meritorious to be left beggars, after we finish the good work in the West. And, sir, the cordial support given this bill, by a certain section of the country, puts me on my guard, not being accustomed to see any extraordinary display of sympathy for the people of the West, except for those who we all know hold no land. I do not know that self-interest would influence any one in a solicitude for the passage of this bill. I am a stranger to all management in legislation. I belong to no party; I know of none; and far be it from me to impeach the motives of any. It is enough for me to judge for myself—in doing so, on this occasion, I believe sound policy and impartial justice requires from me a vote to strike out the first and second sections of this bill, and as much more as will defeat its passage.

The question being taken on Mr. MCCOY's motion, it was negatived by a large majority.

Mr. ANDERSON moved to strike out that clause of the bill which proposes to allow an absolute reduction of thirty-three per cent. on the amount due by the debtors, and so to amend the bill as to confine the discount to those who should make prompt payment of the whole sum due.

This proposition brought on a long debate, in which Messrs. BEECHER, JONES, COOK, HARDIN, SERGEANT, ANDERSON, and CLAY, joined.

The amendment was finally negatived—yeas 55, nays 62.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved to add the following proviso to the first section of the bill:

Provided, also, That where any purchaser has purchased at the same time two or more quarter sections, he shall not be permitted to relinquish less than a quarter section.

This amendment was also negatived.

Mr. HARDIN then, for reasons which he stated, moved the following additional proviso to the third section of the bill:

And provided, further, That the discount allowed in this bill shall not be made where the debtor shall fail to pay any of the said several instalments, as the same shall become due and payable.

The amendment, after some debate, was also rejected.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House without amendment.

Election of the Joint Committee on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. AROHER, of Virginia, then reported that the tellers appointed to examine the ballots given for a committee of 28 members on the Missouri subject, according to the resolution of yesterday, had performed that duty—the result of which ballot he delivered in.

It appeared that 157 members had been voted for, but that the following 17 gentlemen only had a majority of the ballots given, and were elected, viz:

Messrs. Clay, of Ky.	Messrs. Eddy, of R. I.
Cobb, of Geo.	Ford, of N. Y.
Hill, of Maine.	Culbreth, of Md.
Barbour, of Va.	Hackley, of N. Y.
Storrs, of N. Y.	S. Moore, of Pa.
Cocke, of Tenn.	Stevens, of Conn.
Rankin, of Miss.	Rogers, of Pa.
Archer, of Va.	Southard, of N. J.
Brown, of Ky.

Seventeen only being elected, there remained six members yet to be appointed.

Mr. CLAY moved, as the operation of balloting again to-morrow would be tedious, and create delay, that the House agree, by general consent, to select the remaining six members from those having received the next highest number of votes.

It was also suggested that the Speaker appoint the remaining six; and the Speaker having intimated to the House that if the duty devolved on him, he should, from a sense of propriety, make the appointment from the names standing next highest to those elected on the list, the latter course was concurred in by the House, Mr. CLAY having withdrawn his motion in favor of that course.

It appeared then that the five following gentlemen are also elected on the committee, being the next highest on the list:

Messrs. Darlington, of Pa.	Messrs. Gross, of N. Y.
Pitcher, of N. Y.	Livermore, of N. H.
Sloan, of Ohio.

After these, Messrs. RANDOLPH and BALDWIN were next highest on the list, and having an equal number of votes, it remains for the Speaker to designate the gentleman who shall make the twenty-third member of the committee.

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 24.

Messrs. RANDOLPH, BALDWIN, and SMITH, of North Carolina, were appointed, in addition to those already named, to be of the joint committee on the Missouri subject; the first of these to fill up the number of the committee, and the two last to supply the vacancies occasioned by the resignation of Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. GROSS, of New York, who were excused from serving on the committee.

MONDAY, February 28.

Report of the Missouri Joint Committee.

The House then took up the resolution, as reported by the Joint Committee on the Missouri subject.

Mr. CLAY briefly explained the views of the committee, and the considerations which induced them to report the resolution. He considered this resolution as being the same in effect as that which had been previously reported by the former committee of thirteen members; and stated that the committee on the part of the Senate was unanimous, and that on the part of this House nearly so, in favor of this resolution.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, delivered his objections to the resolution, on the ground of the defect of power in the Congress of the United States to authorize or require the Legislature of a State, once admitted into the Union, to do the act proposed by this resolution to be demanded of the Legislature of Missouri.

Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, replied to the arguments of Mr. ADAMS, and defended the resolution from the objections set up against it. He earnestly invited the House to support the resolution, and thus to end the distracting and painful controversy respecting Missouri.

Mr. ADAMS spoke in explanation.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, next obtained the floor, and delivered his sentiments with much earnestness, and pretty much at large, in opposition to the resolution, on the ground as well of its terms, as of hostility to the toleration of slavery in any shape, or under any pretence, by the legislation of Congress.

Report of the Missouri Joint Committee.

[H. OF R.]

[During the progress of this speech, Mr. ALLEN was called to order by Mr. TRIMBLE, because discussing not the question before the House, but a question decided at the last session. The SPEAKER, however, overruled this objection.]

Mr. ALLEN concluded, by moving to amend the resolution by striking out the word "citizen," wherever it occurs in the resolution, as above printed, and to insert in lieu thereof, "free negro or mulatto."

Mr. R. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, then required the previous question, believing that this subject had been so long debated, as to require that it be decided, in one way or another, without further consumption of the time of the House.

Ninety-five members having risen to second this motion, and the yeas and nays having been required thereon by Mr. RANDOLPH—

The question was stated in the following form: "Shall the main question be now put?" and was decided—for the previous question 109, against it 50.

The main question was then put, to wit: "Shall the resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" and passed in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 82, as follows:

VOL. VII.—9

The resolution was accordingly read a third time, and put on its passage.

Mr. RANDOLPH, in a speech of some twenty minutes, delivered the reasons why he should not vote for the resolution.

The final question was then taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative.

So the resolution was passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.*

* The resolution as reported and adopted, was in these words:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That Missouri shall be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen, of either of the States in this Union, shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the fourth Monday in November next, an authentic copy of the said act; upon the receipt whereof, the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into the Union shall be considered as complete.

Approved, March 2, 1821.

The reason of referring it to the President to announce the fact, by proclamation, that Missouri had complied with the condition of the resolution, and was thereby admitted, was for the purpose of preventing the question of admission, in any shape whatever, from getting before Congress again. The State complied within the limited time, whereupon the President issued the following proclamation; and the portentous struggle of two years and a half came to a close:

A PROCLAMATION.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by a joint resolution of the second day of March last, entitled "Resolution providing for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union on a certain condition," did determine and declare—"That Missouri should be admitted into this Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, upon the fundamental condition, that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted on the part of said State to Congress, shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the States of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That the Legislature of the said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States, on or before the first Monday in November next, an authentic copy of said act; upon the receipt whereof, the President, by proclamation, shall announce the fact; whereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State into this Union shall be considered as complete:"—And whereas, by a solemn public act of the Assembly of the said State of Missouri, passed on the twenty-sixth of June, in the present year, entitled "A solemn public act declaring the assent of this State to the fundamental condition contained in a resolution passed by the Congress of the United States, providing for the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union on a certain condition;" an authentic copy whereof has been communicated to me, it is solemnly and publicly enacted and declared, that that State has assented and does assent, that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution of said State "shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law Increase of the Navy.

The House then, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act for the gradual increase of the Navy, so as to reduce the annual appropriation therefor from one million to half a million dollars per annum, and extend the term of appropriation from three to six years.

Mr. BARBOUR indicated his intention to propose an amendment to the bill, the object of which was to limit the reduced appropriation to three years; his object being to have the ships contemplated to be built, so far completed as regarded the frames of them, as to be in a state to be secured and covered in by houses built over them. Mr. B. explained at large his views of this subject, the leading feature of which was, that however advisable it might be to build more ships, it was not necessary at present to put them afloat. He therefore moved that the committee rise, with a view to moving that the bill lie on the table, giving notice that at 12 o'clock to-morrow, he should call it up, with a view to moving the amendment which he had indicated.

Mr. FULLER rose merely to say, that when the amendment should be before the House, he should endeavor to show why, in his opinion, the bill should not be adopted at this session at least.

The committee then rose, and, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, the bill was laid on the table.

SATURDAY, March 3.

Election of Printer.

Mr. COOKE submitted the following resolution, viz :

Resolved, That this House will forthwith proceed to ballot for a printer to execute its work during the next Congress, according to the provisions of the resolution "directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed; fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer or printers," passed on the 8d day of March, 1819.

shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the United States shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizens are entitled under the Constitution of the United States."—Now, therefore, I, JAMES MONROE, President of the United States, in pursuance of the resolution of Congress aforesaid, have issued this my Proclamation, announcing the fact, that the said State of Missouri has assented to the fundamental condition required by the resolution of Congress aforesaid; whereupon the admission of the said State of Missouri into this Union is declared to be complete.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand. Done at [L. s.] the City of Washington, the tenth day of August, 1821; and of the Independence of the said United States of America the forty-sixth.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER put the previous question of consideration on this motion, and it was determined in the affirmative. Mr. SERGEANT moved to lay it on the table, which was negatived. The resolution was then agreed to. The SPEAKER then laid before the House letters from E. DeKraft, Elliot & Irvine, Davis & Force, and Gales & Seaton, offering themselves as candidates for this employment; the first named offering to do the work for 25 per cent. less than the prices established by the act of March 8, 1819, and the second named offering to do it for 25½ per cent. less. An attempt was then made by Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, and Mr. WOOD, of New York, to suspend or dispense with the election; but the motion for that purpose was pronounced out of order, the House having determined to proceed forthwith to the election. The House then balloted accordingly, and the tellers (Mr. GROSS, Mr. BECKER, and Mr. COBB) reported that the votes were—

For Gales & Seaton	-	-	-	87
Elliot & Irvine	-	-	-	31
Davis & Force	-	-	-	9
E. DeKraft	-	-	-	6

and that Gales & Seaton were of course elected.

In the Senate the election took place on the same day, on the motion of Mr. BARBOUR. The votes in that body were—

The House proceeded to consider the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act for regulating process in the courts of the United States;" whereupon it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

The House then adjourned until five o'clock, P. M.

The Floridas—Bill to take Possession, and for Temporary Government.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Speaker resumed the chair, and Mr. LATHROP reported that the committee had again had the state of the Union under consideration, and directed him to report the bill thereto committed on the 27th February ultimo, for carrying into execution the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Washington the 23d of February, 1819, with several amendments; which were read, and concurred in by the House.

The bill was then further amended; and

A motion was made by Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, further to amend the same by inserting, after the word Territories, where it first occurs in the second section, these words: "not incompatible with the Constitution and laws of the United States;" so that the civil, military, and judicial powers exercised by the Spanish authorities within the territories of East and

West Florida, and which are established by the said bill for the government of said territories until otherwise provided, shall "not be incompatible with the Constitution and laws of the United States."

And the question being taken to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

Florida Bill Passed.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, viz:

"An act for carrying into execution the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Washington, the 22d of February, 1819;" and "An act to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum not exceeding four millions five hundred thousand dollars," were severally read a third time, and passed.*

Thanks to the Speaker.

Mr. CLAY rose, and addressed the House to the following effect:

I rise to submit a motion, which, if it should conciliate the general concurrence of this House, I shall be extremely glad. The present session was commenced under very unpleasant auspices. In the appointment of a presiding officer of the House, the first manifestation was made of that unfortunate division of opinion which has been the peculiar characteristic of the session. The storm has happily subsided, and we have the great satisfaction to behold the ship of our Confederacy unimpaired by its rage; her hull, her rigging, and her patriotic crew completely fit for a long and glorious voyage, under the star-spangled banner which proudly floats aloft.

The moral of that agitating drama, of which for more than two years past our country has been the theatre, is that, whilst our Federal Union is admirably fitted to accomplish all the national purposes for which it was intended, there are delicate subjects, exclusively appertaining to the several States, which cannot be touched but by them, without the greatest hazard to the public tranquillity. They resemble those secluded apartments in our respective domicils, which are dedicated to family privacy, into which our nearest and best neighbors should not enter. Let us terminate the session by making that officer the depository of our entire reconciliation, whose election first elicited our divisions, and whose situation has been extremely arduous and difficult. For my part, I have great pleasure in testifying to the assiduity, impartiality, ability, and promptitude, with which he has administered the duties of the Chair since I was able to take my seat. I move the following resolution:

* Thus the bill for the temporary government of Florida, being a bill for the temporary continuation of the Spanish despotism there, was passed without a division; and the motion to amend that bill so as to make it compatible with the Constitution and laws of the United States, was negatived, and also without a division.

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be given to the honorable JOHN W. TAYLOR, for the assiduity, promptitude, and ability, with which he has administered the duties of the Chair.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, (who was temporarily in the Chair,) having stated the question—

Mr. RHEA said he hoped this resolution would obtain a unanimous vote. He had been long a member of this House, and he had never seen the duties of the Chair discharged more satisfactorily than by the present Speaker.

Mr. HARDIN said, that it was with great satisfaction he should vote for this resolution, because it met his entire approbation. To be candid, the Speaker had, in the discharge of the duties of the Chair, far outgone his expectations; and he would vote him the thanks proposed with a great deal of pleasure.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolution, and decided in the affirmative, one negative voice only being heard.

Closing Business.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to borrow a sum not exceeding four millions five hundred thousand dollars;" and the same being read twice, were disagreed to.

That portion of the said bill to which the third amendment proposed by the Senate applies, reads thus, viz: "reimbursable at the will of the Government, and at the will of the creditor, at any time after the first day of January, 1835."

The third amendment of the Senate proposes to strike out the words, and at the will of the creditor.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to amend the said third amendment so as to make the aforesaid clause in the bill read thus: "reimbursable at the will of the Government at any time before the first day of January, 1835; and at the will either of the Government or the creditor, at any time after that period."

And the question being taken to agree to this amendment, it was determined in the negative; and the said amendment was then concurred in by the House.

The Speaker's Address.

Mr. TAYLOR, the Speaker, rose and addressed the House, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

Deeply penetrated with a sense of the kindness and liberality, which, in terms, and from a source the most flattering, have dictated the recent expression of your approbation, I shall ever esteem it the highest reward of my public services. If the duties of the Chair have been discharged in any degree to your satisfaction, it is attributable chiefly to those feelings of generosity which have covered my numerous errors, and which have rendered to purity of motive the deference due to superior merit. My inexperience has been compensated by your prudent counsels, and by a dignified deportment, which has seldom required the interposition of a presiding officer.

Entertaining, gentlemen, for every member of this House no other sentiment than respect and friendship; endeared to many by recollections of united deliberation and effort, in a period of great national embarrassment; and grateful to all for the magnanimous support which constantly has been afforded me, I shall never cease to rejoice in your individual welfare.

Carry with you, gentlemen, to the bosom of your families and friends my best wishes for your prosperity, and, under the protecting care of a benign Providence, may each of you enjoy the continued confidence of the wise and good, and largely contribute to perpetuate the union and glory of our common country.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are about to adjourn if he has no further communications to make to them, reported that the committee had waited upon the President of the United States, and was informed by him that he had no further communications to make to Congress at the present session.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, having completed the Legislative business before them, are now ready to adjourn.

A message was then sent to the Senate, by the Clerk, to inform them that the House is also ready to adjourn.

The Clerk having gone with the said message, and being returned, the Speaker adjourned the House, sine die.

INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

[From the National Intelligencer of Tuesday, March 6, 1821.]

The inauguration of the President of the United States, whose second term of service commenced yesterday, took place according to previous arrangement. The oath of office having been administered to the President, by Chief Justice Marshall, he delivered the speech which will be found annexed.

The day proved very unfavorable for the attendance of spectators, there having fallen during the preceding night a good deal of snow and rain; notwithstanding which, an immense crowd thronged the doors of the Capitol. The number of persons who obtained admission within the walls of the Representatives' chamber (gallery of course included) could not have been less than two thousand.

There was not much form about this ceremony, which, in truth, requires no form but the forms of decency and decorum; but the scene was not the less impressive. The President was placed on the platform in front of the Speaker's Chair; the Chief Justice stood by his side during the delivery of the speech. The Associate Judges, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Heads of Departments, and many of our distinguished Military and Naval Officers, were near him. Assigned to their proper places were the members of the various Foreign Legations. The seats in the interior were principally occupied by a numerous collection of ladies; and all around, above, and below, were countless numbers of the people, of whom, without discrimination, as many were admitted after the ladies and privileged persons were seated, as the room could accommodate. On the entrance and exit of the President, the music of the Marine Band enlivened the scene, which was altogether characterized by simple grandeur and splendid simplicity.

It is well, considering the great crowd which filled the avenues to the door of the Representatives' chamber, and pressed onwards for admittance, that no accident occurred to mar the enjoyment of those who had the pleasure to witness this truly Republican ceremony.

Inaugural Speech.

Yesterday, at 12 o'clock, on taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, the following speech was delivered by JAMES MONROE, President of the United States:

FELLOW-CITIZENS: I shall not attempt to describe the grateful emotions which the new and very distinguished proof of the confidence of my fellow-citizens, evinced by my re-election to this high trust, has excited in my bosom. The approbation which it announces of my conduct, in the preceding term, affords me a consolation which I shall profoundly feel through life. The general accord with which it has been expressed, adds to the great and never-ceasing obligations which it imposes. To merit the continuance of this good opinion, and to carry it with me into my retirement, as the solace of advancing years, will be the object of my most zealous and unceasing efforts.

Having no pretension to the high and commanding claims of my predecessors, whose names are so much more conspicuously identified with our Revolution, and who contributed so pre-eminently to promote its success, I consider myself rather as the instrument than the cause of the union which has prevailed in the late election. In surmounting, in favor of my humble pretensions, the difficulties which so often produce division in like occurrences, it is obvious that other powerful causes, indicating the great strength and stability of our Union, have essentially contributed to draw you together. That these powerful causes exist, and that they are permanent, is my fixed opinion; that they may produce a like accord in all questions, touching, however remotely, the liberty, prosperity, and happiness of our country, will always be the object of my most fervent prayers to the Supreme Author of all good.

In a Government which is founded by the people, who possess exclusively the sovereignty, it seems proper that the person who may be placed by their suffrages in this high trust, should declare, on commencing its duties, the principles on which he intends to conduct the Administration. If the person, thus elected, has served the preceding term, an opportunity is afforded him to review its principal occurrences, and to give such further explanation respecting them as, in his judgment, may be useful to his constituents. The events of one year have influence on those of another; and, in like manner, of a preceding on the succeeding Administration. The movements of a great nation are connected in all their parts. If errors have been committed, they ought to be corrected; if the policy is sound, it ought to be supported. It is by a thorough knowledge of the whole subject that our fellow-citizens are enabled to judge correctly of the past, and to give a proper direction to the future.

Just before the commencement of the last term, the United States had concluded a war with a very powerful nation, on conditions equal and honorable to both parties. The events of that war are too recent, and too deeply impressed on the memory of all, to require a development from me. Our commerce had been, in a great measure, driven from the sea; our Atlantic and inland frontiers were invaded in almost every part; the waste of life along our coast, and on some parts of our inland frontiers, to the defence of which our gallant and patriotic citizens were called, was immense; in addition to which, not less than one hundred and twenty millions of dollars were added at its end to the public debt.

As soon as the war had terminated, the nation, admonished by its events, resolved to place itself in a situation which should be better calculated to prevent the recurrence of a like evil, and, in case it should recur, to mitigate its calamities. With this view, after reducing our land force to the basis of a peace establishment, which has been further modified since, provision was made for the construction of fortifications at proper points, through the whole extent of our coast, and such an augmentation of our naval force, as should be well adapted to both purposes. The laws, making this provision, were passed in 1815 and 1816, and it has been since, the constant effort of the Executive to carry them into effect.

The advantage of these fortifications, and of an augmented naval force, in the extent contemplated, in point of economy, has been fully illustrated, by a report of the Board of Engineers and Naval Commissioners, lately communicated to Congress, by which it appears, that in an invasion by twenty thousand men, with a correspondent naval force, in a campaign of six months only, the whole expense of the construction of the works would be defrayed by the difference in the sum necessary to maintain the force which would be adequate to our defence with the aid of those works, and that which would be incurred without them. The reason of this difference is obvious. If fortifications are judiciously placed on our great inlets, as distant from our cities as circumstances will permit, they will form the only points of attack, and the enemy will be detained there by a small, regular force, a sufficient time to enable our militia to collect, and repair to that on which the attack is made. A force adequate to the enemy, collected at that single point, with suitable preparation for such others as might be menaced, is all that would be requisite. But, if there were no fortifications, then the enemy might go where he pleased, and, changing his position, and sailing from place to place, our force must be called out and spread in vast numbers along the whole coast, and on both sides of every bay and river, as high up in each as it might be navigable for ships of war. By these fortifications, supported by our navy, to which they would afford like support, we should present to other powers an armed front from St. Croix to the Sabine, which would protect, in the event of war, our whole coast and interior from invasion; and even in the wars of other powers, in which we were neutral, they would be found eminently useful, as, by keeping their public ships at a distance from our cities, peace and order in them would be preserved, and the Government be protected from insult.

It need scarcely be remarked, that these measures have not been resorted to in a spirit of hostility to other powers. Such a disposition does not exist towards any power. Peace and good will have been, and will hereafter be, cultivated with all, and by the most faithful regard to justice. They have been dictated by a love of peace, of economy, and an earnest desire to save the lives of our fellow-citizens from that destruction, and our country from that devastation, which are inseparable from war, when it finds us unprepared for it. It is believed, and experience has shown, that such a preparation is the best expedient that can be resorted to, to prevent war. I add with much pleasure, that considerable progress has already been made in these measures of defence, and that they will be completed in a few years, considering the great extent and importance of the object, if the plan be zealously and steadily persevered in.

The conduct of the Government, in what relates to foreign powers, is always an object of the highest importance to the nation. Its agriculture, commerce, manufactures, fisheries, revenue; in short, its peace, may all be affected by it. Attention is, therefore, due to this subject.

At the period adverted to, the powers of Europe, after having been engaged in long and destructive wars with each other, had concluded a peace, which happily still exists. Our peace with the power with whom we had been engaged, had also been concluded. The war between Spain and the colonies in South America, which had commenced many years before, was then the only conflict that remained unsettled. This being a contest between different parts of the same community, in which other powers had not interfered, was not affected by their accommodations.

This contest was considered, at an early stage,

H. OF R.]

Inauguration of the President.

by my predecessor, a civil war, in which the parties were entitled to equal rights in our ports. This decision, the first made by any power, being formed on great consideration of the comparative strength and resources of the parties, the length of time, and successful opposition made by the colonies, and of all other circumstances on which it ought to depend, was in strict accord with the law of nations. Congress has invariably acted on this principle, having made no change in our relations with either party. Our attitude has, therefore, been that of neutrality between them, which has been maintained by the Government with the strictest impartiality. No aid has been afforded to either, nor has any privilege been enjoyed by the one, which has not been equally open to the other party; and every exertion has been made in its power, to enforce the execution of the laws prohibiting illegal equipments, with equal rigor against both.

By this equality between the parties, their public vessels have been received in our ports on the same footing; they have enjoyed an equal right to purchase and export arms, munitions of war, and every other supply—the exportation of all articles whatever being permitted under laws which were passed long before the commencement of the contest; our citizens have traded equally with both, and their commerce with each has been alike protected by the Government.

Respecting the attitude which it may be proper for the United States to maintain hereafter between the parties, I have no hesitation in stating it as my opinion, that the neutrality heretofore observed should still be adhered to. From the change in the Government of Spain, and the negotiation now depending, invited by the Cortes and accepted by the colonies, it may be presumed that their differences will be settled on the terms proposed by the colonies. Should the war be continued, the United States, regarding its occurrences, will always have it in their power to adopt such measures respecting it as their honor and interest may require.

Shortly after the general peace, a band of adventurers took advantage of this conflict, and of the facility which it afforded, to establish a system of buccaneering in the neighboring seas, to the great annoyance of the commerce of the United States, and, as was represented, of that of other powers. Of this spirit, and of its injurious bearing on the United States, strong proofs were afforded by the establishment at Amelia Island, and the purposes to which it was made instrumental by this band in 1817, and by the occurrences which took place in other parts of Florida, in 1818, the details of which, in both instances, are too well known to require to be now recited. I am satisfied had a less decisive course been adopted, that the worst consequences would have resulted from it. We have seen that these checks, decisive as they were, were not sufficient to crush that piratical spirit. Many culprits brought within our limits, have been condemned to suffer death, the punishment due to that atrocious crime. The decisions of upright and enlightened tribunals fall equally on all, whose crimes subject them, by a fair interpretation of the law, to its censure. It belongs to the Executive not to suffer the executions, under these decisions, to transcend the great purpose for which punishment is necessary. The full benefit of example being secured, policy, as well as humanity, equally forbids that they should be carried further.

I have acted on this principle, pardoning those who appear to have been led astray by ignorance of the criminality of the acts they had committed, and suffering the law to take effect on those only in whose favor no extenuating circumstances could be urged.

Great confidence is entertained that the treaty with Spain, which has been ratified by both the parties, and the ratifications whereof have been exchanged, has placed the relations of the two countries on a basis of permanent friendship. The provision made by it for such of our citizens as have claims on Spain, of the character described, will, it is presumed, be very satisfactory to them; and the boundary which is established between the territories of the parties, westward of the Mississippi, heretofore in dispute, has, it is thought, been settled on conditions just and advantageous to both. But, to the acquisition of Florida, too much importance cannot be attached. It secures to the United States a territory important in itself, and whose importance is much increased by its bearing on many of the highest interests of the Union. It opens to several of the neighboring States a free passage to the ocean, through the province ceded, by several rivers, having their sources high up within their limits. It secures us against all future annoyance from powerful Indian tribes. It gives us several excellent harbors in the Gulf of Mexico for ships of war of the largest size. It covers, by its position in the Gulf, the Mississippi and other great waters within our extended limits, and thereby enables the United States to afford complete protection to the vast and very valuable productions of our whole Western country, which find a market through those streams.

By a treaty with the British Government, bearing date on the twentieth of October, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, the convention regulating the commerce between the United States and Great Britain, concluded on the third of July, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, which was about expiring, was revived and continued for the term of ten years from the time of its expiration. By that treaty, also, the differences which had arisen under the Treaty of Ghent, respecting the right claimed by the United States for their citizens, to take and cure fish on the coast of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America, with other differences on important interests, were adjusted, to the satisfaction of both parties. No agreement has yet been entered into respecting the commerce between the United States and the British dominions in the West Indies, and on this continent. The restraints imposed on that commerce by Great Britain, and reciprocated by the United States, on a principle of defence, continue still in force.

The negotiation with France for the regulation of the commercial relations between the two countries, which, in the course of last summer, had been commenced at Paris, has since been transferred to this city, and will be pursued, on the part of the United States, in the spirit of conciliation, and with an earnest desire that it may terminate in an arrangement satisfactory to both parties.

Our relations with the Barbary powers are preserved in the same state, and by the same means, that were employed when I came into this office. As early as 1801, it was found necessary to send a squadron into the Mediterranean, for the protection of our commerce, and no period has intervened, a short time excepted, when it was thought advisable to withdraw it. The great interest which the United States have in the Pacific, in commerce, and in the fisheries, have also made it necessary to maintain a naval force there. In disposing of this force, in both instances, the most effectual measures in our power have been taken, without interfering with its other duties, for the suppression of the slave trade, and of piracy, in the neighboring seas.

The situation of the United States, in regard to their resources, the extent of their revenue, and the facility with which it is raised, affords a most gratifying spectacle. The payment of nearly sixty-seven millions of dollars of the public debt, with the great progress made in measures of defence, and in other improvements of various kinds, since the late war, are conclusive proofs of this extraordinary prosperity, especially when it is recollected that these expenditures have been defrayed, without a burden on the people, the direct tax and excise having been repealed soon after the conclusion of the late war, and the revenue applied to these great objects having been raised in a manner not to be felt. Our great resources, therefore, remain untouched, for any purpose which may affect the vital interests of the nation. For all such purposes they are inexhaustible. They are more especially to be found in the virtue, patriotism, and intelligence, of our fellow-citizens, and in the devotion with which they would yield up, by any just measure of taxation, all their property in support of the rights and honor of their country.

Under the present depression of prices, affecting all the productions of the country, and every branch of industry, proceeding from causes explained on a former occasion, the revenue has considerably diminished; the effect of which has been to compel Congress either to abandon these great measures of defence, or to resort to loans or internal taxes to supply the deficiency. On the presumption that this depression, and the deficiency in the revenue arising from it, would be temporary, loans were authorized for the demands of the last and present year. Anxious to relieve my fellow-citizens in 1817, from every burden which could be dispensed with, and the state of the Treasury permitting it, I recommended the repeal of the internal taxes, knowing that such relief was then peculiarly necessary, in consequence of the great exertions made in the late war. I made that recommendation under a pledge that, should the public exigencies require a recurrence to them at any time while I remained in this trust, I would, with equal promptitude, perform the duty which would then be alike incumbent on me. By the experiment now making it will be seen, by the next session of Congress, whether the revenue shall have been so augmented as to be adequate to all these necessary purposes. Should the deficiency still continue, and especially should it be probable that it would be permanent, the course to be pursued appears to me to be obvious. I am satisfied that, under certain circumstances, loans may be resorted to with great advantage. I am equally well satisfied, as a general rule, that the demands of the current year, especially in time of peace, should be provided for by the revenue of that year. I have never dreaded, nor have I ever shunned, in any situation in which I have been placed, making appeals to the virtue and patriotism of my fellow-citizens, well knowing that they could never be made in vain, especially in times of great emergency, or for purposes of high national importance. Independently of the exigency of the case, many considerations of great weight urge a policy having in view a provision of revenue to meet, to a certain extent, the demands of the nation, without relying altogether on the precarious resource of foreign commerce. I am satisfied that internal duties and excises, with corresponding imposts on foreign articles of the same kind, would, without imposing any serious burdens on the people, enhance the price of produce, promote our manufactures, and augment the revenue, at the same time that they made it more secure and permanent.

The care of the Indian tribes within our limits has long been an essential part of our system, but, unfortunately, it has not been executed in a manner to accomplish all the objects intended by it. We have treated them as independent nations without their having any substantial pretension to that rank. The distinction has flattered their pride, retarded their improvement, and, in many instances, paved the way to their destruction. The progress of our settlements westward, supported as they are by a dense population, has constantly driven them back, with almost the total sacrifice of the lands which they have been compelled to abandon. They have claims on the magnanimity, and, I may add, on the justice of this nation, which we must all feel. We should become their real benefactors, we should perform the office of their Great Father, the endearing title which they emphatically give to the Chief Magistrate of our Union. Their sovereignty over vast territories should cease, in lieu of which the right of soil should be secured to each individual, and his posterity, in competent portions, and for the territory thus ceded by each tribe some reasonable equivalent should be granted, to be vested in permanent funds for the support of civil government over them, and for the education of their children, for their instruction in the arts of husbandry, and to provide sustenance for them until they could provide it for themselves. My earnest hope is, that Congress will digest some plan, founded on these principles, with such improvements as their wisdom may suggest, and carry it into effect as soon as it may be practicable.

Europe is again unsettled, and the prospect of war increasing. Should the flame light up in any quarter, how far it may extend it is impossible to foresee. It is our peculiar felicity to be altogether unconnected with the causes which produce this menacing aspect elsewhere. With every power we are in perfect amity, and it is our interest to remain so, if it be practicable on just conditions. I see no reasonable cause to apprehend variance with any power, unless it proceed from a violation of our maritime rights. In these contests, should they occur, and to whatever extent they may be carried, we shall be neutral; but as a neutral power we have rights which it is our duty to maintain. For light injuries it will be incumbent on us to seek redress in a spirit of amity, in full confidence that, injuring none, none would knowingly injure us. For more imminent dangers we should be prepared, and it should always be recollected that such preparation, adapted to the circumstances, and sanctioned by the judgment and wishes of our constituents, cannot fail to have a good effect, in averting dangers of every kind. We should recollect also that the season of peace is best adapted to these preparations.

If we turn our attention, fellow-citizens, more immediately to the internal concerns of our country, and more especially to those on which its future welfare depends, we have every reason to anticipate the happiest results. It is now rather more than forty-four years since we declared our independence, and thirty-seven since it was acknowledged. The talents and virtues which were displayed in that great struggle were a sure presage of all that has since followed. A people who were able to surmount in their infant state such great perils, would be more competent as they rose into manhood to repel any which they meet in their progress. Their physical strength would be more adequate to foreign danger, and the practice of self-government, aided by the light of experience, could not fail to produce an effect equally salutary on all those questions connected with the internal organization. These favorable anticipations have been realized. In our whole system, National and State, we have shunned all the defects which unceasingly preyed on the vitals and destroyed the ancient republics. In them there were distinct orders, a nobility and a people, or the people governed in one assembly. Thus, in the one instance there was a perpetual conflict between the orders in society for the ascendancy, in which the victory of either terminated in the overthrow of the Government and the ruin of the State. In the other, in which the people governed in a body, and whose dominions seldom exceeded the dimensions of a county in one of our States, a tumultuous and disorderly movement permitted only a transitory existence. In this great nation there is but one order, that of the people, whose power, by a peculiarly happy improvement of the representative principle, is transferred from them without impairing in the slightest degree their sovereignty, to bodies of their own creation, and to persons elected by themselves, in the full extent necessary for all the purposes of a free, enlightened, and efficient Government. The whole system is elective, the complete sovereignty being in the people, and every officer in every department deriving his authority from and being responsible to them for his conduct.

Our career has corresponded with this great outline. Perfection in our organization could not have been expected in the outset, either in the National or State Governments, or in tracing the line between their respective powers. But no serious conflict has arisen, nor any contest but such as are managed by argument, and by a fair appeal to the good sense of the people; and many of the defects which experience had clearly demonstrated, in both Governments have been remedied. By steadily pursuing this course, in this spirit, there is every reason to believe that our system will soon attain the highest degree of perfection of which human institutions are capable, and that the movement, in all its branches, will exhibit such a degree of order and harmony, as to command the admiration and respect of the civilized world.

Our physical attainments have not been less eminent. Twenty-five years ago the river Mississippi was shut up, and our Western brethren had no outlet for their commerce. What has been the progress since that time? The river has not only become the property of the United States from its source to the ocean, with all its tributary streams, (with the exception of the upper part of the Red River only,) but Louisiana, with a fair and liberal boundary on the western side, and the Floridas on the eastern, have been ceded to us. The United States now enjoy the complete and uninterrupted sovereignty over the whole territory from St Croix to the Sabine. New States, settled from among ourselves in this, and in other parts, have been admitted into our Union, in equal participation in the national sovereignty with the original States. Our population has augmented in an astonishing degree, and extended in every direction. We now, fellow-citizens, comprise within our limits the dimensions and faculties of a great power, under a Government possessing all the energies of any Government ever known to the old world, with an utter incapacity to oppress the people.

Entering, with these views, the office which I have just solemnly sworn to execute with fidelity, and to the utmost of my ability, I derive great satisfaction from a knowledge that I shall be assisted in the several departments by the very enlightened and upright citizens from whom I have received so much aid in the preceding term. With full confidence in the continuance of that candor, and generous indulgence, from my fellow-citizens at large, which I have heretofore experienced, and, with a firm reliance on the protection of Almighty God, I shall forthwith commence the duties of the high trust to which you have called me.

President's Message.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

The progress of our affairs since the last session has been such as may justly be claimed and expected, under a Government deriving all its powers from an enlightened people, and under laws formed by their representatives, on great consideration, for the sole purpose of promoting the welfare and happiness of their constituents. In the execution of those laws, and of the powers vested by the Constitution in the Executive, unremitting attention has been paid to the great objects to which they extend. In the concerns which are exclusively internal, there is good cause to be satisfied with the result. The laws have had their due operation and effect. In those relating to foreign powers, I am happy to state, that peace and amity are preserved with all, by a strict observance, on both sides, of the rights of each. In matters touching our commercial intercourse, where a difference of opinion has existed, as to the conditions on which it should be placed, each party has pursued its own policy, without giving just cause of offence to the other. In this annual communication, especially when it is addressed to a new Congress, the whole scope of our political concerns naturally comes into view; that errors, if such have been committed, may be corrected; that defects, which have become manifest, may be remedied; and, on the other hand, that measures which were adopted on due deliberation, and which experience has shown are just in themselves, and essential to the public welfare, should be persevered in and supported. In performing this necessary and very important duty, I shall endeavor to place before you, on its merits, every subject that is thought to be entitled to your particular attention, in as distinct and clear a light as I may be able.

By an act of the 8d of March, 1815, so much of the several acts as imposed higher duties on the tonnage of foreign vessels, and on the manufactures and productions of foreign nations, when imported into the United States in foreign vessels, than when imported in vessels of the United States, were repealed, so far as respected the manufactures and productions of the nation to which such vessels belonged, on the condition, that the repeal should take effect only in favor of any foreign nation, when the Executive should be satisfied that such discriminating duties, to the disadvantage of the United States, had likewise been repealed by such nation. By this act a proposition was made to all nations to place our commerce with each on a basis which, it was presumed, would be acceptable to all. Every nation was allowed to bring its manufactures and productions into our ports, and to take the manufactures and productions of the United States back to their ports, in their own vessels, on the same conditions that they might be transported in vessels of the United States; and, in return, it was required that a like accommodation should be granted to the vessels of the United States in the ports of other powers. The articles to be admitted, or prohibited on either side, formed no part of the proposed arrangement. Each party would retain the right to admit or prohibit such articles from the other, as it thought proper, and on its own conditions.

When the nature of the commerce between the United States and every other country was taken into view, it was thought that this proposition would be considered fair, and even liberal, by every power. The exports of the United States consists generally of articles of the first necessity, and of rude materials in demand for foreign manufactories, of great bulk, requiring for their transportation many vessels, the return for which, in the manufactures and productions of any foreign country, even when disposed of there to advantage, may be brought in a single vessel. This observation is the more especially applicable to those countries from which manufactures alone are imported, but it applies in a great extent to the Eu-

European dominions of every European power, and, in a certain extent, to all the colonies of those powers. By placing, then, the navigation precisely on the same ground, in the transportation of exports and imports between the United States and other countries, it was presumed that all was offered which could be desired. It seemed to be the only proposition which could be devised, which would retain even the semblance of equality in our favor.

Many considerations of great weight, gave us a right to expect that this commerce should be extended to the colonies, as well as to the European dominions, of other powers. With the latter, especially with countries exclusively manufacturing, the advantage was manifestly on their side. An indemnity for that loss was expected from a trade with the colonies, and, with the greater reason, as it was known that the supplies which the colonies derived from us were of the highest importance to them, their labor being bestowed with so much greater profit in the culture of other articles; and because, likewise, the articles, of which those supplies consisted, forming so large a proportion of the exports of the United States, were never admitted into any of the ports of Europe, except in cases of great emergency, to avert a serious calamity. When no article is admitted which is not required to supply the wants of the party admitting it, and admitted then, not in favor of any particular country, to the disadvantage of others, but on conditions equally applicable to all, it seems just that the articles thus admitted and invited should be carried thither in the vessels of the country affording such supply, and that the reciprocity should be found in a corresponding accommodation on the other side. By allowing each party to participate in the transportation of such supplies, on the payment of equal tonnage, a strong proof was afforded of an accommodating spirit. To abandon to it the transportation of the whole, would be a sacrifice which ought not to be expected. The demand, in the present instance, would be the more unreasonable, in consideration of the great inequality existing in the trade with the parent country.

Such was the basis of our system, as established by the act of 1815, and such its true character. In the year in which this act was passed, a treaty was concluded with Great Britain, in strict conformity with its principles, in regard to her European dominions. To her colonies, however, in the West Indies and on this continent, it was not extended, the British Government claiming the exclusive supply of those colonies, and from our own ports, and of the productions of the colonies in return, in our own vessels. To this claim the United States could not assent, and, in consequence, each party suspended the intercourse in the vessels of the other, by a prohibition, which still exists.

The same conditions were offered to France, but not accepted. Her Government has demanded other conditions more favorable to her navigation, and which should also give extraordinary encouragement to her manufactures and productions in ports of the United States. To these it was thought improper to accede, and, in consequence, the restrictive regulations, which had been adopted on her part, being countervailed on the part of the United States, the direct commerce between the two countries, in the vessels of each party, has been in a great measure suspended. It is much to be regretted, that, although a negotiation has been long pending, such is the diversity of views entertained, on the various points which have been brought into discussion, that there does not appear to be any reasonable prospect of its early conclusion.

As little cause has the Government of France to complain of the seizure of the Apollo, and the removal of other vessels, from the waters of the St. Mary's. It will not be denied, that every nation has a right to regulate its commercial system as it thinks fit, and to enforce the collection of its revenue, provided it be done without an invasion of the rights of other powers. The violation of its revenue laws is an offence which all nations punish—the punishment of which gives no just cause of complaint to the power to which the offenders belong, provided it be extended to all equally. In this case, every circumstance which occurred indicated a fixed purpose to violate our revenue laws. Had the party intended to have pursued a fair trade, he would have entered our ports, and paid the duties; or, had he intended to carry on a legitimate circuitous commerce with the United States, he would have entered the port of some other power, landed his goods at the custom-house according to law, and reshipped and sent them in the vessel of such power, or of some other power which might lawfully bring them, free from such duties, to a port of the United States. But the conduct of the party in this case was altogether different. He entered the river St. Mary's, the boundary line between the United States and Florida, and took his position on the Spanish side, on which, in the whole extent of the river, there was no town, no port, no custom-house, and scarcely any settlement. His purpose, therefore, was not to sell his goods to the inhabitants of Florida, but to citizens of the United States, in exchange for their productions, which could not be done without a direct and palpable breach of our laws. It is known that a regular systematic plan had been formed by certain persons for the violation of our revenue system, which made it the more necessary to check the proceeding in its commencement.

That the unsettled bank of a river so remote from the Spanish garrisons and population could give no protection to any party, in such a practice, is believed to be in strict accord with the law of nations. It would not have comported with a friendly policy, in Spain herself, to have established a custom-house there, since it could have subverted no other purpose than to elude our revenue law. But, the Government of Spain did not adopt that measure. On the contrary, it is understood that the Captain General of Cuba, to whom an application to that effect was made, by these adventurers, had not acceded to it. The condition of those provinces for many years before they were ceded to the United States, need not, now, be dwelt on. Inhabited by different tribes of Indians, and an inroad for every kind of adventurer, the jurisdiction of Spain may be said to have been, almost exclusively, confined to her garrisons. It certainly could not extend to places where she had no authority. The rules, therefore, applicable to settled countries, governed by laws, could not be deemed so to the deserts of Florida, and to the occurrences there. It merits attention, also, that the territory had then been ceded to the United States by a treaty, the ratification of which had not been refused, and which has since been performed. Under any circumstances, therefore, Spain became less responsible for such acts committed there, and the United States more at liberty to exercise authority to prevent so great a mischief. The conduct of this Government has, in every instance, been conciliatory and friendly to France. The construction of our revenue law, its application to the cases which have formed the ground of such serious complaint on her part, and the order to the Collector of St. Mary's, in accord with it, were given two years before these cases occurred, and in reference to a breach which was attempted by the subjects of another power. The application, therefore, to the case in question, was inevitable. As soon as the treaty, by which these provinces were ceded to the United States, was ratified, and all danger of further breach of our revenue laws ceased, an order was given for the release of the vessel, which had been seized, and for the dismissal of the libel which had been instituted against her.

The principles of this system of reciprocity, founded on the law of the 3d of March, 1815, have been since carried into effect with the kingdoms of the Netherlands, Sweden, Prussia, and with Hamburg, Bremen, Lubeck, and Oldenburg, with a provision made by subsequent laws, in regard to the Netherlands, Prussia, Hamburg, and Bremen, that such produce and manufactures, as could only be, or most usually were, first shipped from the ports of those countries, the same being imported in vessels wholly belonging to their subjects, should be considered and admitted as their own manufactures and productions.

The Government of Norway has, by an ordinance, opened the ports of that part of the dominions of the King of Sweden, to the vessels of the United States, upon the payment of no other or higher duties than are paid by Norwegian vessels, from whatever place arriving, and with whatever articles laden. They have requested the reciprocal allowances for the vessels of Norway in the ports of the United States. As this privilege is not within the scope of the act of the 3d of March, 1815, and can only be granted by Congress, and as it may involve the commercial relations of the United States with other nations, the subject is submitted to the wisdom of Congress.

I have presented thus fully to your view our commercial relations with other powers, that, seeing them in detail with each power, and knowing the basis on which they rest, Congress may, in its wisdom, decide whether any change ought to be made, and if any, in what respect. If this basis is unjust or unreasonable, surely it ought to be abandoned; but if it be just and reasonable, and any change in it will make concessions subversive of equality, and tending in its consequences to sap the foundations of our prosperity, then the reasons are equally strong, for adhering to the ground already taken, and supporting it by such further regulations as may appear to be proper, should any additional support be found necessary.

The question concerning the construction of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent has been, by a joint act of the representatives of the United States, and of Great Britain, at the Court of St. Petersburg, submitted to the decision of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia. The result of that submission has not yet been received. The Commissioners under the fifth article of that treaty not having been able to agree upon their decision, their reports to the two Governments, according to the provisions of the treaty, may be expected at an early day.

With Spain, the treaty of February 22, 1819, has been partly carried into execution. Possession of East and West Florida has been given to the United States, but the officers charged with that service, by an order from His Catholic Majesty, delivered by his Minister to the Secretary of State, and transmitted by a special agent to the Captain General of Cuba, to whom it was directed, and in whom the government of those provinces was vested, have not only omitted, in contravention of the order of their Sovereign, the performance of the express stipulation, to deliver over the archives and documents relating to the property and sovereignty of those provinces, all of which it was expected would have been delivered, either before or when the troops were withdrawn, but defeated, since, every effort of the United States to obtain them, especially those of the greatest importance. This omission has given rise to several incidents of a painful nature, the character of which will be fully disclosed by the documents which will be hereafter communicated.*

In every other circumstance, the law of the 3d of March last, for carrying into effect that treaty, has been duly attended to. For the execution of that part which preserved in force, for the government of the inhabitants, for the term specified, all the civil, military, and judicial powers, exercised by the existing Government of those provinces, an adequate number of officers, as was presumed, were appointed, and ordered to their respective stations. Both provinces were formed into one territory, and a Governor appointed for it; but, in consideration of the pre-existing division, and of the distance and difficulty of communication between Pensacola, the residence of the Governor of West Florida, and St. Augustine, that of the Governor of East Florida, at which places the inconsiderable population of each province was principally collected, two Secretaries were appointed, the one to reside at Pensacola, and the other at St. Augustine. Due attention was likewise paid to the execution of the laws of the United States relating to the revenue and the slave trade, which were extended to these provinces. The whole territory was divided into three collection districts, that part lying between the river St. Mary's and Cape Florida, forming one; that from the Cape to the Apalachicola, another; and that from the Apalachicola to the Perdido, the third. To these districts the usual number of revenue officers were appointed; and, to secure the due operation of these laws, one judge and a dis-strict attorney were appointed, to reside at Pensacola, and, likewise, one judge and a district attorney to reside at St. Augustine, with a specified boundary between them; and one marshal for the whole, with authority to appoint a deputy. In carrying this law into effect, and especially that part relating to the powers of the existing government of those provinces, it was thought important, in consideration of the short term for which it was to operate, and the radical change which would be made at the approaching session of Congress, to avoid expense, to make no appointment which should not be absolutely necessary to give effect to those powers, to withdraw none of our citizens from their pursuits, whereby to subject the Government to claims which could not be gratified, and the parties to losses, which it would be painful to witness.

* This paragraph, and the two following, relate to transactions at Pensacola, in which the Governor of the Florida, (General Jackson,) acting up to his commission with the powers of a Captain General of Cuba, and continuing the "existing Spanish Government" according to the act for the temporary government of the Florida, did things militarily, and had collisions with the ex-Spanish officers, and with the United States Territorial Judge, in which he gave practical evidence that the Territory (as the act for its temporary government provided) was governed quite independently of the Constitution of the United States, and just as it had been under the Spanish Government, all which (by way of complaint on the part of those who were militarily dealt with) came before the President and Congress, and will be seen in the progress of the debates, and have an interest beyond curiosity, as illustrating the manner in which a Territory may be governed, (under a government given it by Congress,) and very incompatibly with our constitution, which was in vain invoked by the astonished and enraged complainants.

It has been seen, with much concern, that, in the performance of these duties, a collision arose between the Governor of the Territory and the judge appointed for the western district. It was presumed that the law under which this transitory government was organized, and the commissions which were granted to the officers, who were appointed to execute each branch of the system, and to which the commissions were adapted, would have been understood in the same sense, by them, in which they were understood by the Executive. Much allowance is due to officers employed in each branch of this system, and the more so, as there is good cause to believe that each acted under the conviction, that he possessed the power which he undertook to exercise. Of the officer holding the principal station, I think it proper to observe, that he accepted it with reluctance, in compliance with the invitation given him, and from a high sense of duty to his country, being willing to contribute to the consummation of an event which would insure complete protection to an important part of our Union, which had suffered much from incursion and invasion, and to the defence of which his very gallant and patriotic services had been so signally and usefully devoted.

From the intrinsic difficulty of executing laws deriving their origin from different sources, and so essentially different in many important circumstances, the advantage, and, indeed, the necessity, of establishing, as soon as may be practicable, a well-organized government over that Territory, on the principles of our system, is apparent.* This subject is therefore recommended to the early consideration of Congress.

* The temporary government established at taking possession of the Floridas was on the Spanish system, to wit: a continuation of the existing Spanish Government, to be administered by such persons as the President should direct. General Jackson was appointed the first Governor, and was commissioned as Captain General and Intendant of Cuba, and as Governor of East and West Florida. It was in the exercise of these high powers, as held by Spanish officers, that these collisions took place to which the President alludes, and which made it the more necessary to give Florida a Territorial Government based upon our own system; that is to say, on the ordinance of 1787, which was done at this session. The study of the legislation of Congress in giving, first the Spanish and then our own for the Territorial Government of Florida, and the doings and decisions under it, furnish the highest illustration of Congressional power over Territories, and the nullity of their rights under the constitution, which the wit of man could have devised. This illustration will be noted in its successive degrees as this abridgment proceeds.

In compliance with an injunction of the law of the 3d of March last, three Commissioners have also been appointed, and a board organized for carrying into effect the eleventh article of the treaty above recited, making provision for the payment of such of our citizens as have well-founded claims on Spain, of the character specified by that treaty. This board has entered on its duties, and made some progress therein. The Commissioner and Surveyor of His Catholic Majesty, provided for by the fourth article of the treaty, have not yet arrived in the United States, but are soon expected. As soon as they do arrive, corresponding appointments will be made, and every facility be afforded, for the due execution of this service.

The Government of His Most Faithful Majesty, since the termination of the last session of Congress, has been removed from Rio de Janeiro to Lisbon, where a revolution, similar to that which had occurred in the neighboring kingdom of Spain, had, in like manner, been sanctioned by the accepted and pledged faith of the reigning monarch. The diplomatic intercourse between the United States and the Portuguese dominions, interrupted by this important event, has not yet been resumed, but the change of internal administration having already materially affected the commercial intercourse of the United States with the Portuguese dominions, the renewal of the public missions between the two countries appears to be desirable at an early day.

It is understood that the colonies in South America have had great success during the present year, in the struggle for their independence. The new Government of Colombia has extended its territories, and considerably augmented its strength; and, at Buenos Ayres, where civil dissensions had for some time before prevailed, greater harmony and better order appear to have been established. Equal success has attended their efforts in the provinces on the Pacific. It has long been manifest that it would be impossible for Spain to reduce these colonies by force, and equally so that no conditions short of their independence would be satisfactory to them. It may therefore be presumed, and it is earnestly hoped, that the Government of Spain, guided by enlightened and liberal counsels, will find it to comport with its interests, and due to its magnanimity, to terminate this exhausting controversy on that basis. To promote this result, by friendly counsel with the Government of Spain, will be the object of the Government of the United States.

In conducting the fiscal operations of the year, it has been found necessary to carry into full effect the act of the last session of Congress, authorizing a loan of five millions of dollars. This sum has been raised at an average premium of five dollars fifty-nine hundredths per centum, upon stock bearing an interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, redeemable at the option of the Government after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five.

There has been issued, under the provisions of this act, four millions seven hundred and thirty-five thousand two hundred and ninety-six dollars and thirty cents, of five per cent. stock; and there has been, or will be redeemed, during the year, three millions one hundred and ninety-seven thousand thirty dollars and seventy-one cents of Louisiana six per cent. deferred stock and Mississippi stock. There has, therefore, been an actual increase of the public debt, contracted during the year, of one million five hundred and thirty-eight thousand two hundred and sixty-six dollars and sixty-nine cents.

The receipts into the Treasury, from the first of January to the thirtieth of September last, have amounted to sixteen millions two hundred and nineteen thousand one hundred and ninety-seven dollars and seventy cents, which, with the balance of one million one hundred and ninety-eight thousand four hundred and sixty-one dollars and twenty-one cents, in the Treasury on the former day, make the aggregate sum of seventeen millions four hundred and seventeen thousand six hundred and fifty-eight dollars and ninety-one cents.

The payments from the Treasury during the same period have amounted to fifteen millions six hundred and fifty-five thousand two hundred and eighty-eight dollars forty-seven cents, leaving in the Treasury, on the last-mentioned day, the sum of one million seven hundred and sixty-two thousand three hundred and seventy dollars forty-four cents. It is estimated that the receipts of the fourth quarter of the year will exceed the demands which will be made on the Treasury during the same period, and that the amount in the Treasury on the 30th of September last will be increased on the first day of January next.

At the close of the last session, it was anticipated that the progressive diminution of the public revenue in 1819 and 1820, which had been the result of the languid state of our foreign commerce in those years, had, in the latter year, reached its extreme point of depression. It has, however, been ascertained that that point was reached only at the termination of the first quarter of the present year. From that time until the 20th of September last, the duties secured have exceeded those of the corresponding quarters of the last year, one million one hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars; whilst the amount of debentures, issued during the three first quarters of this year, is nine hundred and fifty-two thousand dollars less than that of the same quarters of the last year.

There are just grounds to believe that the improvement which has occurred in the revenue, during the last-mentioned period, will not only be maintained, but that it will progressively increase through the next and several succeeding years, so as to realize the results which were presented upon that subject, by the official reports of the Treasury, at the commencement of the last session of Congress.

Under the influence of the most unfavorable circumstances, the revenue, for the next and subsequent years, to the year 1825, will exceed the demands at present authorized by law.

It may fairly be presumed that, under the protection given to domestic manufactures, by the existing laws, we shall become, at no distant period, a manufacturing country, on an extensive scale. Possessing, as we do, the raw materials in such vast amount, with a capacity to augment them to an indefinite extent; raising within the country aliment of every kind, to an amount far exceeding the demand for home consumption, even in the most unfavorable years, and to be obtained always at a very moderate price; skilled also, as our people are, in the mechanic arts, and in every improvement calculated to lessen the demand for, and the price of labor, it is manifest that their success, in every branch of domestic industry, may and will be carried, under the encouragement given by the present duties, to an extent to meet any demand, which, under a fair competition, may be made upon it.

A considerable increase of domestic manufactures, by diminishing the importation of foreign, will probably tend to lessen the amount of the public revenue. As, however, a large proportion of the revenue which is derived from duties is raised from other articles than manufactures, the demand for which will increase with our population, it is believed that a fund will still be raised from that source adequate to the greater part of the public expenditures, especially as those expenditures, should we continue to be blessed with peace, will be diminished by the completion of the fortifications, dock-yards, and other public works; by the augmentation of the Navy to the point to which it is proposed to carry it; and by the payment of the public debt, including pensions for military services.

It cannot be doubted that the more complete our internal resources, and the less dependent we are on foreign powers for every national as well as domestic purpose, the greater and more stable will be the public felicity. By the increase of domestic manufactures will the demand for the rude materials at home be increased, and thus will the dependence of the several parts of our Union on each other, and the strength of the Union itself, be proportionably augmented. In this process, which is very desirable, and inevitable under the existing duties, the resources which obviously present themselves to supply a deficiency in the revenue, should it occur, are the interests which may derive the principal benefit from the change. If domestic manufactures are raised by duties on foreign, the deficiency in the fund necessary for public purposes should be supplied by duties on the former. At the last session it seemed doubtful whether the revenue derived from the present sources would be adequate to all the great purposes of our Union, including the construction of our fortifications, the augmentation of the Navy, and the protection of our commerce against the dangers to which it is exposed. Had the deficiency been such as to subject us to the necessity, either to abandon those measures of defence, or to resort to other means for adequate funds, the course presented to the adoption of a virtuous and enlightened people appeared to be a plain one. It must be gratifying to all to know that this necessity does not exist. Nothing, however, in contemplation of such important objects, which can be easily provided for, should be left to hazard. It is thought that the revenue may receive an augmentation from the existing sources, and in a manner to aid our manufactures, without hastening prematurely the result which has been suggested. It is believed that a moderate additional duty on certain articles would have that effect, without being liable to any serious objection.

The examination of the whole coast, for the construction of permanent fortifications, from St. Croix to the Sabine, with the exception of part of the territory lately acquired, will be completed in the present year, as will be the survey of the Mississippi, under the resolution of the House of Representatives, from the mouth of the Ohio to the ocean—and, likewise, of the Ohio, from Louisville to the Mississippi. A progress, corresponding with the sums appropriated, has also been made in the construction of these fortifications at the points designated. As they will form a system of defence for the whole maritime frontier, and, in consequence, for the interior, and are to last for ages, the greatest care has been taken to fix the position of each work, and to form it on such a scale as will be adequate for the purpose intended by it. All the inlets and available parts of our Union have been minutely examined, and positions taken, with a view to the best effect, observing, in every instance, a just regard for economy. Doubts, however, being entertained, as to the propriety of the position and extent of the work at Dauphin Island, further progress in it was suspended, soon after the last session of Congress, and an order given to the Board of Engineers and Naval Commissioners to make a further and more minute examination of it, in both respects, and to report the result, without delay.

Due progress has been made in the construction of vessels of war, according to the law providing for the gradual augmentation of the Navy, and to the extent of existing appropriations. The vessels authorized by the act of 1820 have all been completed, and are now in actual service. None of the larger ships have been, or will be launched, for the present, the object being to protect all which may not be required for immediate service, from decay, by suitable buildings erected over them. A squadron has been maintained, as heretofore, in the Mediterranean, by means whereof peace has been preserved with the Barbary powers. This squadron has been reduced the present year to as small a force as is compatible with the fulfilment of the object intended by it. From past experience, and the best information respecting the views of those powers, it is distinctly understood that, should our squadron be withdrawn, they would soon recommence their hostilities and depredations upon our commerce. Their fortifications have lately been rebuilt, and their maritime force increased. It has also been found necessary to maintain a naval force on the Pacific, for the protection of the very important interests of our citizens engaged in commerce and the fisheries in that sea. Vessels have likewise been employed in cruising along the Atlantic coast, in the Gulf of Mexico, on the coast of Africa, and in the neighboring seas. In the latter, many piracies have been committed on our commerce, and so extensive was becoming the range of those unprincipled adventurers, that there was cause to apprehend, without a timely and decisive effort to suppress them, the worst consequences would ensue. Fortunately, a considerable check has been given to that spirit by our cruisers, who have succeeded in capturing and destroying several of their vessels. Nevertheless, it is considered an object of high importance to continue these cruises until the practice is entirely suppressed. Like success has attended our efforts to suppress the slave-trade. Under the flag of the United States, and the sanction of their papers, the trade may be considered as entirely suppressed; and, if any of our citizens are engaged in it, under the flag and papers of other powers, it is only from a respect to the rights of those powers, that these offenders are not seized and brought home, to receive the punishment which the laws inflict. If every other power should adopt the same policy, and pursue the same vigorous means for carrying it into effect, the trade could no longer exist.

Deeply impressed with the blessings which we enjoy, and of which we have such manifold proofs, my mind is irresistibly drawn to that Almighty Being, the great source from whence they proceed, and to whom our most grateful acknowledgments are due.

Classification of Missouri Senators.

On motion by Mr. PARROTT,

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes in which the Senators from the State of Missouri shall be inserted, in conformity to the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the constitution requires.

That the Secretary put into the ballot-box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered two, and the other shall be numbered three, and each Senator shall draw out one paper; that the Senator who shall draw the paper numbered two shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire on the third day of March, 1825; and that the Senator who shall draw the paper numbered three, shall be inserted in the class of Senators whose term of service will expire on the 8d day of March, 1827.

Whereupon, the numbers above mentioned were, by the Secretary, rolled up and put into the box; when Mr. BARTON drew number two, and is accordingly of the class of Senators whose term of service will expire on the 8d of March, 1825; and Mr. BENTON drew number three, and is accordingly of the class of Senators whose term of service will expire on the 8d of March, 1827.

On motion of Mr. LOWRIE, two thousand copies of the documents accompanying the Message of the President of the United States, of the 5th instant, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

MONDAY, December 10.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have concurred in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of Chaplains, and have appointed the Rev. JARED SPARKS Chaplain on their part.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on their part; and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that the Rev. WILLIAM RYLAND was duly elected.

THURSDAY, December 18.

WEDNESDAY, January 2, 1822.

Rules and Orders.

Mr. KING, of New York, also laid on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with one to be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to revise the rules and orders by which the business between the two Houses shall be regulated, and to make report thereof to their two Houses respectively.

Mr. KING said he offered this motion on the presumption that the House of Representatives would meet it by the appointment of a committee on its part. He adverted to the inconvenience, and, indeed, the evils which attended the present loose mode of transacting the public business between the two Houses, according to which it often occurred that bills of importance, even appropriation bills, arrived from the other House, for the concurrence of the Senate, on the day before the last, and sometimes on the very last day of the session; of course, if they passed at all, they must be hurried through without the possibility of bestowing on them that degree of investigation and consideration which were necessary and proper. The impropriety of this course was apparent, Mr. K. presumed, and it was with a view to its correction, that he submitted the present motion. His idea was, that no bill ought to be sent from either House to the other for concurrence on either of the two last days of the session.

MONDAY, January 7.

EDWARD LLOYD, from the State of Maryland, took his seat in the Senate; and also, WILLIAM PINKNEY, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Maryland, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

TUESDAY, January 8.

Military Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, laid on the table the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the repairing and the preservation of the military road, beginning at Madisonville, in the State of Louisiana, and terminating at Florence, on the Tennessee River.

In offering this resolve, Mr. JOHNSON said the object of the resolution he submitted was to provide for the repairing of the great military road leading from Madisonville, in the State of Louisiana, to Florence, in the State of Alabama.

Amendment to the Constitution.

[SENATE.]

That this road, which he considered among the most important in the Union, was opened by the troops of the United States, under the command and direction of Major General Jackson, to whom great credit is due, not only for the origin of the plan, but for the personal attention bestowed by him in marking out and constructing it. He was of opinion that perhaps no national work had been accomplished which is calculated to be of more general utility; that its importance is not confined to the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Tennessee—the whole Western country, he said, is interested in seeing it kept in repair; that it is designed to be one of the most important military highways in the United States; that, in time of war, the necessity of it would be evident, in facilitating the collection and transportation of our physical force and military supplies. He stated that it had been established some time since, by an act of Congress, as a post road, and that it is desirable that the proper steps should be immediately adopted for the transportation of the mail to and from New Orleans by this route, in covered carriages; that the distance from Nashville to New Orleans, by this road, is, as he was informed, about three hundred and fifty miles less than the route formerly travelled.

But, he added, that the road is now almost unfit for use; that the bridges had, from necessity, been made of green wood, and are decaying; and that, unless provision should be made for keeping them in repair, and removing the timber which had fallen in the road, it would soon be abandoned: that the greater portion of the country through which it passes is a wilderness nearly uninhabited, owned by Indians, and by the United States; and that, consequently, it could only be repaired and preserved by the authority of the General Government.

Mr. J. said, that, as to the best mode of effecting the object in view, whether it should be accomplished by employing the troops of the United States, or by establishing a turnpike and fixing a toll, or by other means, he was not prepared to say; that perhaps it would be deemed most expedient to establish a turnpike, and to allow a toll; that he thought it a proper subject for the inquiry of a committee.

THURSDAY, January 10.

Mr. GAILLARD submitted the following motion for consideration:

Amend the 22d rule for conducting business in the Senate, by striking out all after the word "Chair," and by inserting, in lieu thereof, the following:

"And the Vice President, when indisposed at the Seat of Government, may name, in writing, a Senator who shall preside in his stead; in which case an entry thereof shall be made on the Journal of the Senate; but in no case shall any substitution extend beyond an adjournment."

Mr. LLOYD submitted the following motion for consideration:

Vol. VII.—10

Resolved, That the appropriations of territory, for the purpose of education, should be made to those States in whose favor no such appropriations have been made, corresponding in a just proportion with those heretofore made to other States in the Union.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolution be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill pursuant thereto.

Uniform System of Bankruptcy.

Mr. LLOYD presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Baltimore, praying for the passage of a law establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy; the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MONDAY, January 14.

Amendment to the Constitution.

The Senate then proceeded, according to the order of the day, to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on the 12th of December:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said constitution:

"That, in all controversies where the judicial power of the United States shall be so construed as to extend to any case in law or equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, and to which a State shall be a party; and in all controversies in which a State may desire to become a party, in consequence of having the constitution or laws of such State questioned, the Senate of the United States shall have appellate jurisdiction."

Mr. JOHNSON said, the Constitution of the United States contains a clause, prescribing the manner in which amendments may be obtained. This is conclusive evidence that the wise men who framed it were of opinion that experience would develop imperfections in the system, which might require a remedy. The models of antiquity, with all the improvements of modern times, in relation to confederated governments, were before them. The Amphyctonic Council, by which the republics of Greece were united; the Achaean league, which so long governed the cities of Achaia; the confederation of the Germanic Empire, and the Belgic confederacy, which prevailed in the provinces of the Netherlands, all furnished examples for their improvement.

When the struggle for independence, which had been their bond of union, was past, and clashing interests began to provoke animosities, it was obvious to all, that, under the articles of the Old Confederation, the General Government was too feeble for the purposes of national prosperity; and all concurred in the sentiment, that some change was necessary. The only question was, how great that change should be? The difficulty, and the sole difficulty, was, to determine the proper distribution of power. How to divide the sovereignty between two distinct governments, deriving their authority from the same source, each supreme within its own legitimate sphere of action, and yet so to regulate and define the power of both as to produce perfect concord, was the great political problem to be solved by the statesmen of that day. It was not to be expected that the first experiment would perfectly effect this object. If it was anticipated by any, disappointment has followed the utopian delusion. The highest tribute of respect, however, is due to the wisdom of the patriots who framed the constitution, in so arranging this complicated machinery of a sovereignty within sovereignties, as to admit of that degree of harmony which has prevailed; but there is a limit to the intellect of man. All that wisdom and patriotism could do, they have done; but imperfections which human sagacity could not foresee, were to be developed by experience, and the corrective applied by mutual consent.

It is admitted by all, that the States and General Government possess concurrent powers; that they also possess powers exclusive of each other; and that the Federal Constitution prescribes limitations upon both. In this complex system, disorders are to be expected; some, of an incidental nature, not easily controlled; others, that admit a remedy. After an experience of thirty-two years, it becomes our imperative duty to begin this inquiry, relative to the conflicts between the Federal judiciary and the sovereignty of the States. These conflicts are become so frequent and alarming, that the public safety demands an investigation, that it may be determined where the error lies. Unless we point out the real difficulty, and ascertain the just claims of each party, we shall be overspread with Egyptian darkness. When the parties are not agreed upon the line which divides their powers, the question is, which shall preponderate, and which shall concede? The States claim authority which the Federal judiciary denies, and the Federal judiciary exercises powers which the States do not acknowledge to be legitimate. There is no umpire to decide between them; and the difficulty is, to determine which shall submit. It is contended on the one part, that, as the General Government was instituted for national purposes, its claims to the highest supremacy must be superior to those of the States; and that it is an essential attribute of national sovereignty, that its judiciary shall be the judge of its own powers, and shall have authority to overrule every other tribunal, according to its own sovereign will and pleasure. But this argument cuts like the two-edged sword, and furnishes a position quite as strong in favor of the States. It is not denied, that all power not delegated to Congress, nor prohibited to the States, is reserved to the States respectively, or to the people; that the States are also supreme and independent within the orbit of their powers. If, then, it is the attribute of sovereignty to judge of its own powers, where is the sovereignty of the States, if that judgment must be submitted to the Federal judiciary? The argument is precisely the same in both cases, and may be called an argument in a circle.

It is contended by some of the States, Virginia, for instance, that the States have superior claims to an exclusive decision in all cases of conflicting power. The States are the original fountain of power, a portion of which they have delegated and vested in a General Government, for objects common to all. The General Government is the creature of the States, and exists by their permission. Then, as it is a principle universally acknowledged, in religion and morality, that the creator is superior to the created, so it is contended that the States have the indubitable right of exclusive decision in all cases of conflict, whether they respect a violation of the delegated powers, or the exercise of that authority which is reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. To say the least of it, there is much plausibility in this argument. But, it involves a difficulty as to the manner in which this right of decision shall be exercised. If each State shall decide separately, confusion would probably arise from contradictory decisions on the same point, in different States; but even this objection may have more plausibility than substance. Should the States attempt to exercise any of the specific powers granted exclusively to Congress, or to arrest the General Government in the exercise of power expressly delegated, the consequence might be unfortunate; but, in reviewing the conduct of the States, and marking the particular points of contact, it does not appear, from the history of our Government, that the States have, in any one case, attempted this, though the Federal judiciary has assumed a guardianship over the States, even to the controlling of their peculiar municipal regulations. If the States have the right of decision, there is a difficulty in giving their decision an efficacious operation. If it belongs to them collectively, there must be a regular method of ascertaining and promulgating their decisions.

In the cases of collision between Pennsylvania and the General Government, much was said and written respecting the rights of the parties, and the necessity of a tribunal that could remedy the evil. It appears, from the decisions of her State courts, the periodical publications, and official documents of that day, that Pennsylvania recognized and claimed an equality of right with the General Government, to decide in constitutional cases affecting her sovereignty; that, in serious collisions, an umpire was necessary; and that no tribunal was more proper than this body. This doctrine is universally acknowledged as a correct maxim betwixt civilized nations, and is sometimes resorted to for the amicable settlement of disputes between them. Assuming the Pennsylvania position, and the conclusion is irresistible, that the parties being equally sovereign within their circle of power, it is a flagrant outrage to justice, a violation of every principle of equity, for one to arrogate to itself the exclusive power of judging in all cases of disagreement.

At this time there is, unfortunately, a want of confidence in the Federal Judiciary, in cases that involve political power; and this distrust may be carried to other cases, such as the lawyers call meum et tuum. It is the opinion of many eminent statesmen that there is a manifest disposition, on the part of the Federal Judiciary, to enlarge, to the utmost stretch of constitutional construction, the powers of the General Government, at least in that branch, and by consequence to abridge the jurisdiction of State tribunals. I do not assert this to be the fact; but, if it is not, we should adopt some method, if practicable, to remove these ill-founded suspicions. The desire of extending our own power is a universal law in our nature, to which the just and the unjust, the wise and the foolish, are all subject, though in unequal degrees; and I do not design in any way to impugn the learned members of the bench, when I admit the possibility of the same propensity remaining with them. It has found its way to elevation in other countries, and to prevent its influence here, some rational method should be devised to define and regulate that power. Political power, properly divided into co-ordinate branches, and judiciously regulated, produces happy results—but, when sovereign and irresponsible, it carries in its train the wreck of human happiness—desolation marks its bloody progress, for with it moral and physical power are always blended. The blessings of a good government furnish themes of rejoicing and praise; but the curses of a bad government bring sorrow to the heart. The history of nations furnishes us with instructive lessons, while we trace the hand of tyranny in the fall of empires, but the love of power is a principle still in operation, and no premonitions can teach us moderation. It begins with childhood, and does not cease with age. It is the belligerent principle which predominates in the social circle, and genders strife where perfect peace should reign. It is the prolific source of war with independent communities, which has spread desolation over countries and stained the whole world with blood. Uncontrolled, it is inordinate ambition; properly regulated, it is emulation. If we did not know this to be the character of man, delineated in all his history, we might indulge the hope of everlasting repose, under our mild institutions. Happy would be our lot, if every department should confine itself to the faithful performance of its own functions, carefully avoiding all interference with others, or even the exercise of doubtful power; but the history of the present times furnishes us with memorable examples of the reverse, and teaches us to anticipate no such repose. We must take human nature as it is; and to be secure from danger, it is necessary to provide against the encroachment of power in one department upon another, and, in all, upon the rights of the people.

It is a principle interwoven both in the theory and practice of our Government, that every department which exercises political power shall be responsible to the people. Here lies our safety and our strength. Representation and responsibility must go hand in hand, bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh. The republics of Greece and Rome were ignorant of the force of this principle, and practised it to a very limited extent. After the abolition of monarchy in Athens, the Archons were elected annually by the people. The Ephori of Sparta were elected in the same way, and the Romans elected their Tribunes; but all those were a kind of executive officers. In each of those Governments the people, en masse, were assembled to decide on public affairs, and each State had a Senate permanent in office and independent of the people. In modern days the principle of representation has been but very imperfectly understood among the nations of Europe, except in England, where it was introduced as early as the ninth century, in the reign of Alfred, and has been perpetuated in some form to the present time. But, though the theory of representation and responsibility has been taught there, the practice has been but imperfectly regarded. It has been so limited and so defective in its operation, that its benefits are almost entirely lost, and the forms only preserved. In the United States alone, whose Government presents to the world a model of excellence, and is the anchor of hope to man, the theory and practice are united in every department of the Government except the judiciary. This exception may satisfy the mind that it was never designed to confide political or legislative power to that department, especially the power of repealing laws enacted by the legislative departments, both of the General Government and the States. The execution of the laws is the only power intended to be confided to the court; and this will furnish ample scope for the exercise of discretion. If the judges were content to confine their decisions to cases affecting property and punishing crimes according to the laws, few would complain of their responsibility. If bad laws are enacted, the people will correct the evil; and if by an incorrect adjudication or misconstruction of law, individual injury should be sustained, yet the fundamental principles of our Government would not be endangered. On this principle alone can this kind of independence of the judges be tolerated with safety in a free Government. The members of the legislative department of our Government are directly responsible to the people and to the States—which responsibility is carefully preserved upon the principle that the trustee may possibly abuse his trust; and, to remedy the evil, the people have wisely reserved the power in their own hands. When the sedition law was enacted, this law was applied. The President of the United States, the Governors of States, and the members of their Legislatures, all hold their offices for limited terms, that they may feel their responsibility to the people, from whom their power is derived, and for whose benefit it is exercised. Why are they not all elected for life, or during good behavior? The reason is obvious. Because they exercise political power, which may be abused. By corruption of motive, or by the indulgence of sentiments unfriendly to liberty, they may betray the trust reposed in them; and their amenability to their sovereigns, the people, is the only sure safeguard of the rights of man. It then follows, inevitably, that the judiciary should be confined to the decision upon the laws, or that the judges should feel the same responsibility; and, if this is not done, some tribunal should be established, responsible to the people, to correct their aberrations.

It may be denied by some that the judiciary exercises legislative or judicial powers. If a judge can repeal a law of Congress, by declaring it unconstitutional, is not this the exercise of political power? If he can declare the laws of a State unconstitutional and void, and, in one moment, subvert the deliberate policy of that State for twenty-four years, as in Kentucky, affecting its whole landed property, even to the mutilation of the tenure upon which it is held, and on which every paternal inheritance is founded; is not this the exercise of political power? All this they have done, and no earthly power can investigate or revoke their decisions. If this is not the exercise of political power, I would be gratified to learn the definition of the term, as contradistinguished from judicial power. If the exercise of such tremendous powers be legitimate, their acts, like those of all other trustees of power, should be subject to the sanction or revocation of the people; if not by a direct responsibility, yet by an appeal to a tribunal that is responsible. If, on the contrary, this exercise of power is an act of usurpation, the case is yet more alarming; for the judges hold their offices during good behavior, and bad opinion is not bad behavior, and the opinion of the court is a law, and above all other law. A judge can be removed by impeachment for treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors; and in case of impeachment by the other House, two-thirds of this body must concur to effect his removal. The difficulty of removing a judge in this way is such that it will seldom be attempted; and experience tells us it will more rarely succeed.

The passions and propensities of human nature, with all their imperfections, are alike common to every rank and condition; and to prevent their ill effects in a little number, where any particular excitement is more likely to become general than with a large body, responsibility is necessary, or competency in some other body to reverse their destinies. Judges, like other men, have their political views. One may be friendly to consolidation; another may err on the opposite extreme, and a third may prefer that happy mediocrity, which is always safe, and generally salutary. When these are associated upon the bench, and each under the influence of his own partiality, there will inevitably be as different conclusions among them where State sovereignty is involved, or the extent of Federal jurisdiction is called in question, as if they were members of a legislative body. Why then should they be considered any more infallible, or their decisions any less subject to investigation and reversion? Besides the differences arising from political prepossessions, the various structures of the human mind will produce a variety of opinion. One may take an expansive view of a subject, and base his decision upon truth and justice; another may be, what is sometimes called a technical judge; and though of equal integrity, may conceive it his duty to stick to the bark of the case, and confine himself in all decisions to the forms of judicial proceedings. This difference in the organization of the mind must necessarily result in a difference of conclusion. Courts, also, like cities and villages, or like legislative bodies, will sometimes have their leaders; and it may happen, that a single individual will be the prime cause of a decision to overturn the deliberate act of a whole State, or of the United States; yet we are admonished to receive their opinions as the ancients did the responses of the Delphic oracle; or the Jews, with more propriety, the communications from Heaven, delivered by Urim and Thummim, to the High Priest of God's chosen people from the sanctum sanctorum. Other causes of difference might be multiplied to a tedious extent; but enough has been said to show that judges, who, like other men, are subject to the frailties, the passions, the partialities, and antipathies incident to human nature, should not be exempted from responsibility on account of their superior integrity, learning, and capacity; or that their decisions should be subject to revision by some competent tribunal, responsible to the people. It is believed that this is the opinion of that great and good man who penned the Declaration of Independence, and who now enjoys, in the shades of Monticello, the blessings of the principles which it contains.

It is not pretended that judges are worse than other men. I am proud to say, that no country was ever blessed with more talents or integrity upon the bench than this; but the judicial history of all civilized nations confirms the allegation, that, under the same circumstances, judges are just like other men. The theory of our judiciary may teach us that "a judge is just, a chancellor juster still;" but experience teaches us, that perfection resides nowhere in this world, no, not even on the bench. We have borrowed from Great Britain the idea of judicial independence. Previous to the reign of William and Mary, the judges were tenants at the will of the monarch. The King, who was "more wise, more just, more learned, more every thing," was considered the fountain of justice, and it was his prerogative to administer it to the people. In early times, he dispensed justice in his own person; but this being too laborious, he appointed his judges, and fixed their compensation. The tenure of their office and the amount of their salaries were alike dependent upon his pleasure. The creature was responsible to his creator both for existence and support: and interest and necessity conspired to induce obedience to his will. The judiciary thus became an instrument of cruelty in his hands. The legislature, the army, and the court, on many occasions, were alike the implements of royal vengeance, to sustain the divine right of kings. It was the judgment of a court that doomed the immortal Socrates to drink the hemlock. When the Roman tyrant could no longer use a hired soldiery to immolate the victims of his jealousy, he resorted to courts of law. When Henry VIII., of England, would exercise a cruel despotism under the forms of a free constitution, the army, the court, and the Parliament, were the potent engines that sustained him. When Mary, his daughter, compelled the Protestants to seal their testimony at the stake, the court gave sanction to the murderous deeds. Her sister and successor, Elizabeth, created the court of high commission, and formally invested it with inquisitorial power. She also supported the arbitrary edicts of the Star Chamber. The Puritans, because obnoxious to the free exercise of the prerogatives of the Crown, were imprisoned and dispersed by process of law, and the judges were the supporters of her despotic power. When she would destroy her unfortunate kinswoman, the Queen of Scots, the judges were instructed to condemn her, and by their sentence she came to the block. This horrid deed was covered by the cloak of judicial proceedings. When Charles I. determined to change the religion of Scotland, he made use of the court of high commission to effect the object. By the same judicial power, the advocates for the doctrines of the reformation have so often been divested of their religious privileges, and doomed to seal with their blood that religion which bore them triumphantly through the vale of death.

Those facts are not exhibited to derogate from the character of the judiciary, but to show that no truth is more universally established in history; that no proposition can be more plainly demonstrated than this, that judges may oppress the people—that power cannot be safely confided anywhere without the guarantee of responsibility.

The occurrences to which we have adverted, transpired previous to the memorable era in the British annals under William and Mary, when the judges were commissioned by their monarch to hold their offices during good behavior, with salaries fixed by law. The system was consummated in the reign of George III., by providing that the commission of the judge should not be vacated upon the demise of the king. But, even in Great Britain, the judges are less independent than here; for, by an address of a majority of both Houses of Parliament, they may be removed; here, an impeachment for misconduct by one House, sustained by two-thirds of the other, is the only thing that can effect their removal. Nor is their power so transcendent in Great Britain, as to repeal an act of Parliament by declaring it unconstitutional and void. We have improved upon their system of irresponsibility, and enlarged their powers, without any of the reasons or benefits which exist with them. Their object is to render the judges independent of the monarch, that they may protect the people from lawless acts of his despotic power. In this country, the people are the King; and the only object of rendering the judges independent of their sovereign authority, or the only benefit which can result from it that I can conceive, is to protect the people from their own oppressors, themselves. We have given our authority to the judiciary to control us, lest we shall enslave ourselves. We transfer the power to them because we fear the consequence of holding it ourselves; and surrender our liberties, our lives, the disposition of our property, to the judiciary, to escape the danger of oppressing ourselves.

Are we choosing guardians to control us, and prevent us from destroying ourselves in our fits of lunacy? A maniac may surrender his rights for the preservation of his person from the freaks of his own madness; but the American people are not mad. Experience has proven them to be the safe depositories of their own power. They have wisely reserved it to themselves, and as wisely exercised it, except in this case; and it is believed that they may now safely make their voice to be heard in the judiciary. Why should they hold the controlling power in every other department of the Government? Vox populi, vox Dei; but if the voice of the people is the voice of God, what must the superior voice of a judge be? If, under a monarchical Government, an independent judiciary may stay the hand of despotic power, and protect the innocent from punishment; in this nation we have no monarch, no subjects. The Government and the people are one; and we ask not the guardian care of our superiors to bind our hands so that we cannot wound ourselves.

But has this change in the judicial term, from tenancy at will to that of life, essentially changed the character of decisions in Great Britain? History records the mournful fact that, since the reign of William and Mary, the courts of Great Britain have invariably yielded obedience to the monarch's will, in criminal prosecutions. The banishment and death of many of the most distinguished of the friends of liberty will confirm the declaration. The honored names of Muir, Gerald, Margatot, and Emmet, with many others that time cannot bury in oblivion, must remain the monument of this independence of the British Judiciary, which we are so proud to imitate. In controversies betwixt individuals, the effects of the change may have been salutary; but he who has depended upon the judiciary to protect him from royal male-diction, has leaned upon a broken reed.

The nature and the object of the Federal Judiciary are subjects worthy of investigation. The salary of the judge may be increased, but cannot be diminished; and his term of office is perpetual. He may receive a reward for pleasing the Legislature, but he can suffer no removal or abatement of compensation for displeasing them. Is this independence designed to give the court power to arrest the Executive in a career of usurpation? Certainly not; for the people have reserved this power to themselves. Nor is it to prescribe bounds to the legislative will; for every legislator is held responsible to his constituents. Both the President and the members of Congress are dependent on the will of the people; and the people have made them feel their power, when the judiciary were giving sanction to unconstitutional measures. It was never intended by this irresponsibility to give the Federal courts power to limit the prerogatives of State Legislatures, because they are subject to the same sovereign will of the people, who could not have designed to clothe a small number of select judges, however honest or enlightened, with the power to control that sovereignty which it was their pleasure to vest in their State authorities, where they could have the means of regulating it at their own pleasure, without danger of anarchy or despotism. Such control, vested in an independent magistracy, would be entirely hostile to every principle of self-government; and the people do not fear themselves. All power rests in them, and they are responsible to no earthly tribunal for its exercise. They never intended to transfer it to those who might abuse it with impunity. They deem it safer where nature and nature's God have placed it—in themselves; and they cannot recognize a principle so obnoxious to free men, as that which gives it to others because they themselves are unworthy to hold it.

The real object of an independent judiciary, in this country, must have been to embody the best experience in legal knowledge, and produce uniformity of decision in legal questions relative to property and crimes. The science of politics is still in its infancy; and its perfection depends on principles which the progress of republican government must yet develop; but the science of jurisprudence is more established, and composed of principles which never change. The one is mutable, the other immutable. There is, therefore, not so great necessity for the same kind of responsibility in the judiciary, if their powers are confined to the proper object of their office—that of defining questions of law; but when they transcend those limits, and bring to their bar every other department, both of the Federal Government and the States, it becomes necessary to ordain some tribunal that may guard against an abuse of their power. They assume the right of deciding upon the constitutionality of the laws of the Union and of the States, and of setting them aside at pleasure. Some of the learned in law have acquiesced in this assumption of power; but the great body of the people cannot approve it. If the constitution had provided that the judges should form a council of revision to decide upon the constitutionality of the laws of Congress, and even of the several States; and that no law should be binding without their sanction to its constitutionality, and that these judges should hold their office during good behavior, without an authority in the people to remove them or revise their decisions, I venture the assertion, that the constitution would have been rejected by every State in the Union. If they can declare a bad law unconstitutional, they may also declare a good law void upon the same principle. If the Legislature shall pass a bad law, or refuse to pass a good law, the people will elect others in their place to remedy the evil; but the judges are not accountable to the people for their opinions. A legislative body may be changed at the pleasure of the people; but, over the court, the people hold no right of change, no power of coercion. From what source is the power which they exercise, derived? From the constitution? No; that is as silent as death upon the subject; and it is doubtful whether one man of a thousand in the nation would vote so to amend the constitution as to confer this power. Is it in the theory of our Government? No; it is in direct hostility to the theory of our Government.

The Constitution of the United States, the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, and treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges of each State shall be bound thereby, anything in the laws or constitution of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. The Senators and Representatives in Congress, the members of the several State Legislatures, and all Executive and Judicial officers, both of the United States and the State, shall be bound by oath, or affirmation, to support the constitution. Judges, in common with other officers, being bound by oath, a duty is said to be created in them to decide upon the constitutionality of the laws of Congress, State laws, and State constitutions; and when, in their opinion, repugnant to the Federal Constitution, to declare them null and void. Would it not be equally the duty of Congress to declare the opinion of the Federal Judiciary null and void, in every case where a majority of Congress might deem it repugnant to the constitution? For instance: the Legislature, after full discussion upon the constitutionality of the measure, shall pass a law involving the best interest of the country in peace or in war. The court shall express a different opinion; and, upon every question arising under it, act in conformity to their own opinion, that the law is unconstitutional and void. Forty-eight Senators, one hundred and eighty-eight Representatives, and the President of the United States, all sworn to maintain the constitution, have concurred in the sentiment that the measure is strictly conformable to it. Seven judges, irresponsible to any earthly tribunal for their decisions, revise the measure, declare it unconstitutional, and effectually destroy its operation. Whose opinion shall prevail? that of the legislators and President, or that of the court? The court must admit that wise and good men may conscientiously differ in opinion upon such a decision, or their own reversion will fix upon every other department of the Government the conviction of perjury; and, if any honest difference of opinion may exist, I would ask, which has the right to overrule the other? If Congress were as scrupulously tenacious of their own powers, they would decree, and would deem it their solemn duty to decree, that such a decision of the court is unconstitutional and void. In that case, who must yield? and where would the confusion end? But the principal danger arises from a collision of the Federal Judiciary with the State sovereignties. The judges have exercised some caution in relation to the acts of Congress. They have generally acted upon the laws as they received them, leaving it to the members to account to their constituents for their measures. Nor have they had any temptations to do otherwise. The support of Federal authority must, from the very nature of their situation, be a point for them to maintain rather than abandon. The Supreme Court has even decided that Congress is sole judge of the measures necessary to carry into effect the specific powers delegated by the constitution. Had the same delicacy been observed by that tribunal when State laws have been the subject of construction, it is probable the examination of judicial encroachment upon their sovereignties might never have been commenced. But a comparison of the cases will show a disposition widely different in the revival of State laws, which proves the strong bias of the Federal Judiciary in support of federal power. A bias equally strong may probably exist on the other side in the State tribunals; and in case of disagreement, which tribunal shall prevail? So far as my observation extends, the superior courts of the States would not be disgraced by a comparison with the Supreme Court of the United States, in capacity, integrity, and legal acquirements. It, therefore, appears to me that justice requires an intermediate tribunal to decide between them. I know of no clause in the Federal Constitution that gives the power to the Judiciary of declaring the laws and constitution of a State repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and, therefore, null and void. No express grant, nor fair construction, contains it; and, I presume, every gentleman, in and out of Congress, will agree with me, that the States never designed so to impair their sovereignty as to delegate this power to the Federal Judiciary. But they have assumed it, and, to counteract the evils which must result from this assumption, a responsible tribunal of appeal should be provided.

The short though splendid history of this Government, furnishes nothing that can induce us to look with a very favorable eye to the Federal Judiciary as a safe depository of our liberties. When a law was enacted in violation of a vital principle of the constitution, that which was designed to secure the freedom of speech and of the press, the victims of its operation looked in vain to the judges to arrest the progress of usurpation. If this power could ever be exercised to any good purpose, it would be, on such occasions, to declare the law unconstitutional which aims a deadly blow at the vital principles of freedom; but, so far as the transactions of that day are detailed in our public records, it appears that the judiciary was a willing instrument of Federal usurpation. That law was executed in all the rigor of the spirit which dictated it. The turbulence of faction found no moderation there; and the people found relief only in their own power. The exercise of their elective franchise removed the evil, and this is their only safe dependence.

The Union is the idol of the American people. It is regarded by all as the bulwark of safety; sacred as the ark of the covenant; and their indignant frowns would drive into obscurity the man who would attempt to weaken the bond. In adverting to particular instances in which the State authorities have been set at defiance, the case of New Hampshire shall first be noted.

In 1759, the King of England granted to Dartmouth College a charter of incorporation, without limitation of time. Education was the object; and New Hampshire was then a British colony. After the Revolution, when New Hampshire had become an independent State, the Legislature, by a donation of land to this college, recognized it as a corporate body. Since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the Legislature modified the charter, without the consent of the corporation, and the Supreme Court of that State sustained the act of the Legislature. The cause was then taken before the Supreme Court of the United States, and the act of the State of New Hampshire was declared to be unconstitutional and void, on the ground that the charter of the King of England to the trustees was a contract within the meaning of that clause of the Federal Constitution which provides that no State shall pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract, and that the modification of the charter was a violation of this clause. By this decision the principal literary institution in New Hampshire is placed beyond the control of the Legislature of that State; and an act of the British King cannot be changed by the State that has become independent of the edicts of that monarch. I will here leave the free sons of the North to vindicate their own conduct in pretending to be so independent as to presume to touch the consecrated act of their former sovereign; and proceed to the great and enterprising State of New York.

It is certainly correct in the judiciary to show no respect to particular States, in the exercise of this high prerogative of controlling their destinies; and in the case which I am about to notice, we have a striking instance of their impartiality. I allude to that in which the Supreme Court set aside the bankrupt law of the State of New York, on the ground that it violated contracts. The court admitted the right of a State to pass a bankrupt law, and that such a law could not be controlled but by an act of Congress contravening its execution; but that it must contain no provision impairing the obligation of a contract. The court then delivers this opinion, which must be an omnipotent and immutable decree; that any such act of a State, which will release from the contract the future acquisitions of a bankrupt, is a violation of the obligation of a contract, and therefore unconstitutional; that, as the bankrupt law of the State of New York contains such a provision, it is unconstitutional and void. By this decision, it appears the State has a constitutional right to pass a bankrupt law, provided the State shall never exercise that power; but, if the power is exercised, the right is forfeited and the law is void; for the very essence of a bankrupt law is, that the bankrupt, on making a faithful surrender of his property, shall be released forever, both in person and in his future gains. To make this decision the more imposing, the court have also settled this point; that it is immaterial whether the contract in question was executed before or subsequent to the passage of such law—whether prospective or retrospective; in either case, the provision is unconstitutional and void.

I will now come to the smaller State of New Jersey, though not the less entitled to high consideration and respect. If patriotic devotion to the national welfare in peace and in war—if generous sacrifices to the cause of independence constitute a claim of merit, no State in the Union is entitled to higher marks of honor than New Jersey. But let us notice the admonition which the Federal Judiciary has given this State, to retrace the steps which she has ventured to take before consulting them. In 1759, while a British colony, this State granted certain lands to the Delaware Indians, to hold in perpetuity, without being subject to taxation, but with an injunction that these lands should never be sold or leased by the Indians. In 1801, the Legislature of New Jersey passed an act authorizing these lands to be sold, but without a clause expressly repealing that part of the act of 1759, which exempted them from taxation. In 1804, that clause was repealed, and the lands afterwards taxed in common with other property in that State. The proprietors refused to pay the tax, and suit was brought against them, in which both the inferior and superior courts of the State decided in favor of the legality of the tax. The case was then carried into the Supreme Court of the United States; and there it was decreed, in opposition to both the legislative and judicial authority of the State of New Jersey, that the law was in violation of a contract implied in the original grant to those Indians, therefore unconstitutional and void, and those lands forever free from taxation. Now, sir, what can be more dangerous to the existence of liberty, than power lodged in a body, in no way amenable to the State for its exercise, which may set at defiance the whole constituted authority of that State, and even subvert her system of taxation upon her own domains? Was it for this that Jersey bled at every pore to resist the authority of taxation without representation—that she might submit to the same deprivation at home without the power of repairing an injury or of arresting its progress? And such is indeed her forlorn condition, and that of every State in the Union, if the Federal Judiciary may prohibit them from taxing one part of their domain, and thus impose upon them the necessity of doubling the burden upon other parts to make good her revenue. Such power, vested in an independent, irresponsible tribunal, may eventually swallow up the States, and leave their governments but a shadow, unless some other tribunal shall be established, amenable to the States or to the people, with power to overrule their decisions when erroneous.

The next in order that presents itself, is the respectable State of Pennsylvania, with whom the idea originated, of constituting this body a tribunal to decide upon controversies, when that serious conflict existed between the two Governments, in what is commonly called the Olmstead case. Her conduct was firm, but temperate. Congress must not mistake the motive that dictated the course which she took. She yielded, not because she was convinced, or alarmed; but because she was unwilling to use the militia which was ordered out, to shed the blood of her own children. It was the love of order. Pennsylvania is like the rock in the midst of the tempest—she is not to be shaken—she is slow in her anger, but mighty in her wrath—her blood runs slowly, unless aroused by a sense of injury, or by a serious attack upon the first principles of self-government. If such a state of things should ever exist; if Pennsylvania were assailed by foreign aggressions, or domestic usurpations, you would find her like the angry lion; and it would be as vain to attempt to move her from her ground by force, as was the command of great Canute, the Danish monarch of England, to compel the waves of the ocean to stand still, and not encroach upon his majesty.

Let us next come to Maryland, and notice the case of McCulloch. In relation to this case, I shall be happy to hear, in what way this State shall be justified by her distinguished representative, who has had the opportunity of viewing distinctly the various grounds taken by the Federal Judiciary in the construction of its own constitutional powers. It is the case of the United States Bank, before alluded to; a case in which I deem it my privilege and my duty to dissent from the court in some of its positions. I will here observe, that I have no personal complaint against that institution, nor any motive whatever to speak harshly of it. So far as I have had any dealings with it, the conduct of that bank has been marked with an honorable liberality; and my acquaintance with its president enables me to say with confidence, that for correctness, integrity, and capacity, he is entitled to the rank which he occupies among our most distinguished citizens. But it is the principle of judicial decision that I would refer to. The court has determined that this bank has the right to locate a branch in a State without the consent of that State; that the charter of an incorporation does not involve a distinct sovereign power, but is the instrument of carrying into effect the power which originates it; that Congress might adopt such means as they shall judge proper to carry their power into effect, and that the question, what means are most suitable, whether a bank or other means, is not a subject of judicial, but political investigation; that when, for the exercise of this power, Congress shall deem it expedient to locate a bank, or to authorize the location of any of its branches in a State, such State has not the power to impose a tax on such bank or branch, as shall be located within its jurisdiction; with this reservation, that the principle does not extend to the real estate of such bank nor to the proprietary right of the citizens of that State. This decision, though plausible at first view, will be found highly exceptionable upon closer investigation. The right of taxation is acknowledged to be concurrent with the States and the United States, except where constitutional restrictions are imposed; and no one pretends to say that the constitution gives any exclusive privilege to tax banks, or contains any prohibition upon that power. If the establishment of a bank by the United States is a means of exercising sovereignty, the establishing of a bank by a State is equally so; and if a tax, levied by a State upon a branch of the United States Bank, is a violation of the sovereignty of the General Government, a tax levied by the United States upon a State bank is a violation of the State sovereignty. But, during the late war, the General Government did impose a tax upon State banks, and the act was sustained; now, when a State levies a tax upon a branch of the United States Bank within the limits of its jurisdiction, the law is declared to be unconstitutional, because it is an encroachment of sovereignty. The plain doctrine involved in this decision is, that the States are bound to respect the sovereignty of the United States, but the United States are not bound to respect the sovereignty of the States. The powers of the General Government are omnipotent, but the powers of the States are whatever the court may please to prescribe. Such is the practical effect of this decision. The General Government may tax a State bank, but a State may not tax a branch of the United States Bank within its jurisdiction; because the General Government is sovereign, and the State governments are subordinate.

Ohio and Kentucky are involved in the same predicament with Maryland. The General Government laid a tax upon the State banks of Kentucky, and the tax was paid. Kentucky, in turn, laid, not an extravagant, but a moderate, a reasonable tax upon the branches of the United States Bank in that State, and the Court of Appeals of the State decided that it was constitutional. The decision was able, and the arguments on which it was founded were conclusive; but they considered it wise to acquiesce in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and suffer, for the sake of harmony, this violation of their right, till they may be practically restored by constitutional interposition. It may have been impolitic to have imposed this tax; but the right cannot be relinquished while the reciprocal right exists on the other side; and unless some remedy is provided to counteract the mischief that must arise, no one can predict where it will end.

In relation to the State of Ohio, I am not so ready to say that her proceeding was correct. It was at the instance of many of her distinguished citizens, that the bank located branches there; and the object of the tax was evidently to drive them back, or destroy them. I contend for the right of taxation, (not of imposing penalties,) a right which belongs to the essence of sovereignty, whether the stock belongs to citizens, to foreigners, or to the United States; and the character of the proprietors cannot impair the right. But, if Ohio was wrong, yet the proceedings in relation to her were an unwarranted breach of her sovereignty, and a violation of her rights as a State. She was prosecuted, and placed in the custody of the Marshal. She was imprisoned and bound in chains by the Federal Judiciary. Her treasurer was taken by a process from the United States Court; the keys of the treasury taken from him; the doors of the strong-box opened, and the money taken from the coffers. But the attitude which she assumed under these proceedings, was such as to sustain her native dignity of character, while she submitted to the constituted authority of the Union.

These are some of the cases in which the laws of the States have been declared unconstitutional, and the sovereignties that ordained them prostrated by the Federal Judiciary; and we owe it more to the patriotic forbearance of the States, that intestine commotions have not been the result, than to a conviction in the minds of those States that these proceedings were sanctioned by justice or by the spirit of the constitution. A remedy is necessary—a tribunal, responsible to all the States, should be constituted with appellate jurisdiction, and in its decisions all will acquiesce.

In the case of Cohen vs. Virginia, the conduct of the Supreme Court has also been a subject of much animadversion and dissatisfaction. The most exceptionable part is the construction of their own power, which gives them jurisdiction in the case. The constitution provides, that, in all cases in which a State is a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction; nothing is said of appellate jurisdiction in such cases; but here, when the State was a party, the Supreme Court exercised, not original but appellate jurisdiction. It would seem, by this clause of the constitution, that it was never designed that a State should be brought before the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of error, especially when she had been a party to the same case in her own courts; no, not even with citizens of other States or foreigners. The 11th amendment to the constitution provides, that the judicial power of the United States shall not be so construed as to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of a foreign State. This amendment was introduced in consequence of suits brought against Massachusetts and Georgia, soon after the formation of the General Government. Yet the Supreme Court assume not only original but appellate jurisdiction in the case of Cohen, under that clause of the constitution which provides that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States. The argument runs thus: that, although they could not exercise appellate jurisdiction where a State is a party, provided the controversy arose under any other law, yet, when the controversy arises under the constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States, they may assume appellate jurisdiction. The plain meaning is, that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall be confined to cases arising under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, and that subject to the restrictions imposed in the other clause, confining the court to the exercise of original jurisdiction over States, and in the amendment relating to the suability of States; that is, in all cases thus arising they may exercise jurisdiction, but when a State is a party their jurisdiction must be original; and if commenced or prosecuted by a citizen of another State, or of a foreign State, they have no jurisdiction in the case. I have no doubt that this is the construction which ought to be given it; but the court has given a latitude of construction which absolutely enlarges their jurisdiction, so as to embrace States and every thing else, when the controversy arises under the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, to the exercising of a guardian power over the States, even to the revision and repealing of their laws; and to controversies arising under State constitutions and laws, even affecting their criminal code; for the case of Cohen was of this last description, and the jurisdiction was also appellate. But I shall no longer dwell upon a case that has itself been the subject of a volume.

Suppression of Piracy.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, was taken up for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the building of an additional number of sloops of war, for the protection of the commerce of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico; and into the propriety of employing one or more of the frigates or ships of war of the United States for the same purpose.

Mr. PLEASANTS thought the designation of sloops of war would confine the scope of the inquiry within too narrow limits, particularly as he presumed a smaller class of vessels would be more suitable for the object in view. He should prefer an inquiry into the expediency of building an additional number of small vessels of war, without designating the size. Mr. P. had an objection, also, to the latter part of the resolution, which directs that a part of the naval force be employed in a particular service; because it would be interfering with the proper action of the Executive authority, whose province it is to direct in what manner the naval force shall be employed. Mr. P. moved to amend the resolution conformably to the ideas he had suggested.

Mr. D'WOLF observed, that five or six additional small vessels were certainly very much wanted to protect the commerce of the nation on the coast of Cuba, and elsewhere among the islands; but, as the expediency of increasing the navy by building additional vessels might be doubted, and as a sufficient number of suitable vessels might at present very probably be purchased, he suggested the propriety of changing the inquiry into one for providing by purchase an additional number of small vessels.

Mr. ORIS suggested the propriety of simplifying the resolution into an inquiry of providing by purchase or otherwise, an additional number of small vessels "for the better protection of the commerce of the United States." An expression of the object in terms so general as this, he thought would not trench on the province of the Executive.

Mr. JOHNSON, for the purpose of accommodating the views of the different gentlemen, while it would answer the object he had in view, modified his motion to read as follows :

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the building or purchase of an additional number of small vessels of war, for the protection of the commerce of the United States.

In this form the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. D'WOLF submitted the following resolution for consideration :

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to report a bill for allowing drawbacks on merchandise exported, which shall be manufactured from foreign materials, to amount of the duties on such materials.

Mr. D'WOLF made a speech of considerable length, explanatory of his views in offering the resolution; embracing a variety of practical statements of the course of trade, to show the advantage which would accrue to the revenue by extending the benefit of drawbacks, inasmuch as it would encourage internal industry and exportation; urging the expediency of adopting such measures as would tend to diminish the existing inequality in the amount of imports and exports, as detrimental to the public interest as it always is to the interest of a private individual to buy more than he sells, &c.

Virginia Land Warrants.

The Senate took up the resolution submitted by Mr. RUGGLES, on Saturday, requesting of the President of the United States certain information relative to the lands granted and located by patents to the Revolutionary officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, in the reservations in the States of Kentucky and Ohio.

Mr. RUGGLES offered a few remarks in explanation of the object of this resolution. He said it would be recollected that, in the year 1784, the State of Virginia ceded all her vacant and unappropriated lands northwest of the Ohio River, to the United States. Attached to this cession were certain conditions, one of which was, that, in case the quantity of good land on the southeast side of the Ohio, upon the waters of Cumberland River, and between the Green and Tennessee Rivers, should prove insufficient to satisfy the legal bounties which had been engaged to the troops of Virginia on Continental Establishment, then the deficiency should be made to the said troops in good land, between the Scioto and Little Miami Rivers, on the northwest side of the River Ohio. In a short time after this cession was made, the holders of those soldiers' warrants commenced locating them on the tract of land conditionally reserved northwest of the Ohio River, without any information having been given to the Executive of the United States or Congress, that a deficiency on the waters of Cumberland River existed. Congress, by a resolution in 1788, put a stop to this proceeding, by declaring all such surveys and locations invalid, until correct measures should be taken to ascertain the fact that a deficiency had really occurred. The Governor of Virginia was then requested to ascertain and communicate this information to the General Government, in order to enable them to carry into effect the stipulations in the act of cession, according to the true intent and meaning of the parties. Afterwards, the agents of the officers and soldiers did report to the Governor of Virginia that there was not a sufficient quantity of good land to meet the engagements of the State, on the southwest side of the Ohio River; upon which information they were authorized by Congress to locate the remainder of the warrants upon the tract conditionally reserved between the Scioto and Little Miami Rivers. Mr. R. said this was a plain history of the proceeding as it had occurred. His object in calling for the information contained in the resolution, was to ascertain whether the contract between the United States and the State of Virginia had been fairly executed, and whether any fraud had been committed in the issuing of the warrants, or in the location of them. Mr. R. said he was far from imputing any misconduct or blame to the State of Virginia, or any officer acting under the authority of her laws. It was, however, a fact, that it had taken much more land to satisfy those warrants than was ever anticipated, and almost the whole district of country between the Scioto and Little Miami Rivers had been covered with them. If the information sought for by this resolution can be furnished, it can be easily ascertained whether fraud has been committed or injustice practised. A report of the number of officers and soldiers who served in the Revolutionary war, from Virginia, on Continental Establishment, together with the quantity of land allowed to each of them, will show the whole amount to which they were entitled. A statement of the quantity of land that was covered with warrants, on the waters of Cumberland River, when the agents of the officers and soldiers reported to the Executive of Virginia the deficiency that existed, will determine the quantity to which they were entitled northwest of the Ohio River, and between the Scioto and Little Miami Rivers. Mr. R. said he considered this information not only very desirable but of great importance.

Military Roads.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. CHANDLER, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of making two military roads from the State of Maine to the British line, was next taken up; and some opposition being manifested to it—

Mr. CHANDLER briefly explained the importance which the proposed roads would be in a national point of view, and which might be easily constructed by the troops now in service.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, gave a description of the country referred to, to show the value which these roads would be for military purposes, if the country should ever again be involved in war with the same nation with which it was recently engaged in hostilities, and there was little probability of a war with any other power. These preparations ought to be made in time of peace. He remarked, moreover, that the General Government had never been called on before to expend any of the public money in the State of Maine, or for her use, and he hoped the resolution would pass.

Mr. MACON said, the two gentlemen did not exactly agree. One of them asked for the road because he deemed it necessary, the other because none of the public money had yet been spent in the State of Maine. The State of North Carolina might ask some public improvement with the same justice; for there had been precious little money expended in that State. But, said Mr. M., we do not ask Congress to spend the public money in our State; all we ask is, that you do not take our money and spend it elsewhere. As to preparing for war, he said, there was no danger that a free people will ever be unprepared for it; the danger was that they would be too well prepared for it; and too ready to engage in it; for it seemed to him that free government had the same effect on the human constitution as heat had on iron—it made it swell. Commence these roads, and there is no telling where it will end; for legislation might be compared to shingling a house—the first row is useless unless you go on, lapping one row over another to the top. It will prove just so with appropriations for roads, if they are once begun.

The resolution was agreed to—18 to 10.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 30.

Officers of the Customs.

The Senate then resumed in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill further to establish the compensation of the Collectors of the Customs, &c., and the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Finance. [These amendments were numerous, but embraced principally modifications of detail, and regulations of the pay of weighers, gaugers, inspectors, &c.]

Mr. HOLMES spoke as follows: On the subject, said Mr. H., of the compensation in the large ports, the committee adopted the rule to diminish the percentage on the commissions so low, that the emoluments would not exceed four thousand dollars and expenses. To fix the compensation of a collector, so that it would neither exceed nor fall short of a particular sum, as had been suggested by some gentlemen, would be making them all salary officers. This would be a new and extraordinary principle. The officer would have no interest in the amount of revenue collected—no inducement to economy. He would consult his ease at the public expense; multiply officers, careless of the necessity, and become indifferent and neglectful of the amount of the customs, in which his interest was no way concerned.

It is apprehended that the percentage is reduced so low in some of the ports, that the fees and commissions will not, after deducting the expenses, secure the officer four thousand dollars. Upon a revision of the bill, the committee were apprehensive that in the district of Philadelphia such might be the result, and have therefore left that as before. New York is an important district, and the collector there ought to be pretty sure of his maximum; of this, with the economy which he can and ought to practise, we have no doubt. The law made a deputy a substitute for the collector in cases only "of sickness or occasional and necessary absence;" but the collectors themselves have made them permanent officers, with a salary, in some instances, of three thousand dollars per year. This sum, it is understood, is allowed in New York. This bill limits the compensation to one thousand five hundred. Other improvements in the clerk hire, stationery, office rent, and contingent expenses, will much diminish the expenses of that port. Taking the return of the year 1819, the emoluments, as reduced by this bill, will yield to that officer a clear income of $6,441; by that of the year 1820, it would not exceed $2,628; making an average of $4,084. But it must be recollected, that in this last year a new collector was appointed, and a moiety of the commissions due on outstanding bonds goes to his predecessor, which hitherto diminished, but will not hereafter diminish, his compensation.

On the whole, from a diminution of the expense which this bill will effect, and the constant increase of the commerce of that port, no possible doubt can exist that the rate of one-sixth of one per cent. established by the bill, will amply secure the collector to the extent of his maximum.

As to Boston, the extravagances in that district are so great that even a greater diminution might have been safely allowed. According to the officers' returns for several successive years, the diminution which we effect by a single reduction in the office of deputy, will leave the collector a sum above the maximum established by the bill. By the last returns, the collector of New Orleans is sure of his $4,000, without considering any deductions at all; and as the other districts, classed among the large ports, have not arrived at the sum limited, they consequently cannot yet be affected by it.

The reduction from $5,000 to $4,000, in the large ports, has produced much opposition. Of the propriety of the measure your committee could entertain no doubt. $4,000, with a share in fines and forfeitures, and a right to receive $400 as agents for lighthouses, &c., is a greater compensation than you give to the Chief Justice of the United States, and a better living than you give any other officer in the Government, the President excepted. The office is responsible, to be sure, and in some degree arduous. But the Judge, the member of Congress, the ambassador, must leave his friends, his family, his country, and endure a banishment, as the price of his reward. The collector enjoys the fruits of his labor at his own fireside, and in the bosom of his own family. Sir, let these men resign, by reason of this reduction, and you will find thousands of the best men in the nation ready to step into their shoes. Amidst all our professions for economy and retrenchment, should we not blush to tell the people that a collector of their revenue, in these times of depression, cannot live, at home, for five thousand a year; and, unless we give him more, he will carve for himself!

It has been remarked, said Mr. H., in discussing another part of this bill, that the office of deputy collector, as established by law, was occasional and temporary. Practice has, however, made it permanent, and fixed to it a permanent salary. The collector appoints the deputy, and fixes his pay. But his compensation is paid by the collector, unless there is a surplus in his hands after he receives his ultimate sum—then it is at the expense of the United States. If the collector's emoluments are $30,000, of which he can retain $4,000 only, the residue, after deducting expenses of clerk-hire, stationery, &c., goes into the Treasury. This clerk-hire, sir, has hitherto been at the entire discretion of the collectors, and their vouchers of payment have, at the Treasury, been allowed without an inquiry into the economy of the expenditure. Hence high salaries to deputies, to relieve collectors of their duties, and extravagant expenditures for clerks and stationery, to accommodate relations and friends. Such has been the practice under the law, that the Secretary doubts his authority to go behind the collector's vouchers to settle his accounts; consequently, the collectors in the large ports, whose emoluments exceed their maximum, may lavish the surplus on whom they please. The necessity and importunity of friends and relatives is a temptation too great, even for a prudent man, to resist, and the prodigal expenditure of the public money has been the inevitable consequence. By the report of the Secretary, made on the 8th December, 1820, it appears that the clerk-hire for 1819 was, in Philadelphia, $15,779 14, and that in New York, $15,766 22—while the stationery of the former place was $546 88, and that of the latter $1,978 55; and when in New York the revenue collected was $8,068,851 39, and in Philadelphia $4,950,888 00. The clerk-hire in Boston was, during the same period, nearly as extravagant as that of Philadelphia. The disproportion which the stationery and clerk-hire bear to each other in the different ports, shows a wanton prodigality somewhere, and perhaps everywhere. The truth is, it is imprudent and dangerous to repose this confidence in these men, and, therefore, the bill requires a rigid scrutiny at the Department of the Treasury.

On the amendment which proposed to increase the salary of the collector of Wilmington, in Delaware, Mr. H. observed the committee have found, upon examination, that the collector's services are more than commensurate to his legal compensation. In his annual return of his emoluments, this man, who is understood to be a faithful officer, has charged from $400 to $900 annually, under the name of official and contingent expenses. This is not permitted by any existing law; it is an abuse which has become pretty general, and, where the emoluments approach a fixed maximum, goes to take from the Treasury, by indefinite and illegal charges. By this bill these abuses are cut up by the roots; and these deductions, from the compensation of this officer, will render it necessary that his salary should be increased to the sum limited in the bill.

The sections abolishing the offices of weighers, gaugers, &c., and transferring their duties to inspectors, being under consideration, Mr. H. observed, on the 9th December, 1820, the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th May, of the same year, made a report of the offices in the customs which might be abolished. (Here Mr. H. read the report.) By this it appears that the Secretary was willing to dispense with not only several districts and ports of delivery, and their officers, but with all the weighers, gaugers, measurers, and markers, whose annual aggregate compensation is not less than $100,000. It is believed that this might be done by the inspectors without increasing their number, and without the ungrateful task of removals. The committee sent for the Secretary, and inquired whether these offices might safely be abolished, and, if so, why so many inspectors had been retained at such an expense, if, with their present number and pay, they can perform this additional service?

His answers were, that the present inspectors were amply sufficient; that the number had been increasing, from the representations of collectors, at the solicitation of friends; that many of them were old and destitute, and that it would be better to increase their labor than diminish their number. It is, moreover, apparent, that in many ports inspectors perform these services, and receive the pay, in addition to their per diem allowance. Instances are not few, in which these inspectors have charged the United States three dollars a day for every day in the year, and during the same period have received compensation in these offices of weighers, gaugers, &c., equal to the best salaries.

It appears by a report of the Secretary, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th January, 1821, that, in the district of Boston and Charlestown, there were six inspectors, who had received their three dollars per day for every day in the year, not omitting the additional day for leap-year during the same period; and found means to obtain, in these other capacities, about three thousand dollars more; each receiving from your Treasury an annual compensation of between four and five thousand dollars, and this not limited to one particular year, but an average for several years in succession.

So prompt were these men at their duty—or rather at their charging—that in this same place, among this moral and religious people, there were ten inspectors, who never found an opportunity to be absent at church for one single day in four years, and never lost a day by sickness during the same period; similar facts, too, in New York, indicate that there, there is great punctuality in charging Sundays and all, and that, among inspectors, there is much stronger evidence of health than worship. In Philadelphia, the extravagance in clerk-hire has lately been corrected, but the same prodigality exists in those subordinate offices. The compensations to a single weigher at that post, and who I believe is a son of the collector, are reported at the Treasury Department as follows: in 1816, $6,405; 1817, $7,804 48; 1818, $5,818 14; 1819, $5,602 01; and in 1820, $5,202 45. If in one port the duties of one description of office can be heaped upon the shoulders of one favorite, and in another some four or five different offices can converge to the use of another, there must be a radical defect in the system, or a gross prodigality and infidelity in the officers of the customs who have the immediate control. These instances only are cited to point out the mischiefs, yet the evil is by no means limited, but is becoming general. In the second and even third-rate ports, instances might be mentioned where inspectors change every day, and are occupied and receive fees, for the same period, as weighers, gaugers, &c., and even in some instances serve as clerks and deputies besides.

It has been said that these abuses are so palpable that the existing laws are adequate to their correction, and the collector who permits or connives at them ought to be instantly removed. The exercise of Executive power, and the selection of a few prominent examples, would no doubt be salutary; but so extensive and so habitual are these practices, the execution of the law, combined with the exertions of Executive power, will be scarcely sufficient to correct them.

It is apprehended by some honorable gentlemen that these inspectors will not be sufficient to perform the duties. Sir, you have called on the officer who presides over your revenue; you have asked him if these men and this pay will be sufficient, and he answers yes. Although I would repose implicit confidence in no Secretary, yet experience proves that we should be slow to believe that one would err in favor of economy.

Here the Secretary testifies against interest—against patronage. He offers to collect your revenue without the offices proposed to be abolished, and tells you they are useless. Would it not be, indeed, extraordinary to force upon him a horde of officers whom he does not want, at an expense of $100,000 per year?

FRIDAY, February 1.

The following letter, from the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, addressed to Mr. KING, of New York, was read by that gentleman to the Senate:

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 1, 1822.

DEAR SIR: My health has suffered so much on my journey, and since my arrival at the Seat of Government, that I am desirous, as soon as the weather and the state of the roads will permit, to return to my family. And I have to request that you will be good enough to communicate this determination to the Senate at their meeting this day.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,
DANIEL D. TOMPKINS.

Hon. RUFUS KING.

Election of President pro tem.

On motion of Mr. KING, of New York, it was thereupon resolved, that the Senate would, at two o'clock, proceed to the election of a President of the Senate pro tempore.

At 2 o'clock accordingly the Senate proceeded to the election of a President, and, on counting the ballots, the following result was declared:

For Mr. Gaillard	-	-	-	22 votes.
Mr. Macon	-	-	-	14
Mr. Lowrie	-	-	-	5
Mr. Dickerson	-	-	-	4
Scattering	-	-	-	1
				46

No person having a majority of the votes, the Senate proceeded to ballot a second time, when there appeared to be—

For Mr. Gaillard	-	-	-	25 votes.
Mr. Macon	-	-	-	17

[SENATE.]

Mr. GAILLARD, having received a majority, was declared to be elected President of the Senate pro tempore.

On taking the Chair, Mr. GAILLARD addressed the Senate as follows:

GENTLEMEN: No one can estimate more highly the value of your favorable opinion, nor could any one receive with more profound respect, or with more unfeigned gratitude, than I do, this fresh token of your confidence and favor. The gratification I derive from it would indeed have been complete, but for the unaffected apprehension I feel that, in the discharge of the duties assigned to me, I may disappoint your just and reasonable expectations. If purity of intention and an anxious desire to act correctly, which I bring with me to this station, should prove no security against the commission of error, I shall have to throw myself on that liberality and indulgence which you have been ever ready to exercise, and which I have already so frequently experienced from you. On this consoling and encouraging reflection I will rest; and I will only add, that, whatever of industry, of experience, or of capacity, I possess, shall be faithfully directed to an honest and impartial execution of the trust reposed in me.

On motion of Mr. KING, of New York, it was ordered that the Secretary communicate to the President of the United States, and to the House of Representatives, the election of the President of the Senate pro tempore.

MONDAY, February 4.

Rebecca Hodgson.

The Senate took up the report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the petition of Rebecca Hodgson. [She prays payment for a house rented to the Government for the use of the War Department, when the Government was first removed to Washington, in the year 1800, which house was burnt—the petition being grounded on the stipulation in the lease that the premises should be returned in the condition in which they were received, inevitable accidents excepted.]

The report was opposed at considerable length by Mr. PINKNEY, who argued and referred to testimony to show that the petitioner was entitled to payment according to the terms of the contract, that the claim was sustainable in law, were the Government suable, and that it ought to be allowed. He concluded by moving that the report be recommitted to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to report a bill for the relief of the petitioner to the extent of the value of the house.

Mr. RUEGLES spoke at length in reply to Mr. PINKNEY and in support of the report of the committee. He took a particular view of the circumstances of the claim, and the evidence on which it was founded, embracing the contract of the lease, to show that the petitioner had no rightful claim on the Government for indemnity.

Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, BARTON, VAN DYKE, and TALBOT, also offered some remarks on the subject; and

Mr. P. at the suggestion of some of the gentlemen, having varied his motion to a simple recommitment, without instructions, except to make a report on a re-examination of the case and the documents—it was recommitted accordingly.

TUESDAY, February 5.

Louisiana Land Titles.

Mr. BENTON submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any information which may be in the Department of State relative to land titles in Louisiana, particularly as contained in documents filed in the Department of State by order of Mr. Jefferson, if there be any. Also, a copy of the proclamation (if in the Department of State) addressed to the inhabitants of Louisiana in the year 1803, by General Salcedo and the Marquis de Casa Calvo, Commissioners on the part of His Catholic Majesty for delivering the province of Louisiana to the Commissioners of the French republic, announcing to the inhabitants the cession of the province. Also, a copy of that article of the Treaty of San Ildefonso, (if any such there be in the Department of State,) which secured to the inhabitants of Louisiana their rights of property; and if there be no copy of that treaty, nor of the article referred to, in the Department of State, that the President be requested to cause application to be made to the Courts of France and Spain for an authentic copy of the article in question, for the benefit of the inhabitants of the ceded province.

In offering this resolution, Mr. B. explained the object of it. The first clause was to procure from the Department of State, if there to be found, the copy of a paper concerning land titles in the State of Louisiana, which had once been printed by the order of this or the other House, but of which he had not been able to find a copy in the public Library, because this Capitol was once entered by an enemy who made war upon letters as well as upon men. The second clause called for another document which he was desirous to obtain; and the third called for a copy of that article of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, which secured the inhabitants of Louisiana in the possession of the rights and property which they had previously enjoyed. That article had never been published. It might be in the Department of State; but, if it should not be there, the resolution proposes that application be made to the Governments of France and Spain for a copy of it. As the object of the resolution was not to pry into State secrets, but to get a copy of an article said to be in existence, which was intended for the security of the people of Louisiana in their rights and property, he hoped it would be considered unobjectionable. If there be such an article in existence, it ought to be made known for the benefit of those whom it may concern.

The resolution lies on the table for one day of course.

WEDNESDAY, February 6.

Louisiana Land Titles.

The Senate took up the resolution offered yesterday by Mr. BENTON, requesting certain information from the President of the United States; and, after some further explanation on the part of the mover, in which he showed, from the unsettled condition of land titles in upper Louisiana, (Missouri,) the probable value of the information which he sought—the two first branches of the resolution were agreed to.

The question being stated on the third branch of the resolution, which called for a copy of a particular article of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, if in the Department of State, and, if not in the Department, then, that the President be requested to apply to the Courts of France and Spain for a copy of the same—

Mr. KING, of New York, said, he was very willing to go as far as to request of the President a copy of the treaty, if in the Department of State, but if it was not there he would ask no further. There would be an indelicacy, he thought, in applying to a foreign Government for a copy of a treaty which that Government had seen fit to keep private. It was a singular fact, Mr. K. observed, that the treaty by which Louisiana was originally ceded from France to Spain had never been made public; the only public document on this subject, was the letter from the King of France, (Louis XIV.,) to his Director General, D'Abadie, but the treaty was not published. So, likewise, with the retrocession of the country from Spain to France, the fact was made known only by a proclamation of General Salcedo and the Marquis de Casa Calvo. The Treaty of St. Ildefonso having been so carefully concealed by the parties to it, contained, no doubt, other stipulations besides that for the cession of Louisiana, which they did not choose to disclose. The reasons for this were reasons of State; and should our Government, under such circumstances, apply for a copy of the treaty, the answer, no doubt, would be that, so far as we were interested, we were informed of all that was necessary, and that we had no right to ask further. Should we say that there were things in the treaty which it was important for us to know, the reply would be the same, that what was kept back, was kept back for reasons of their own, in which we had no concern. As to the treaty containing any thing which affected private titles in the territory, every thing which related to that subject was embraced in the treaty by which the country was ceded to the United States. He had no objection, however, to requesting a copy of the treaty, if the Government possessed it, (though it was well known there was no such treaty in the Department of State,) but he would stop there—he could not consent to ask of a foreign Government to disclose to us what it had chosen not to communicate. He moved, therefore, to amend the resolution so as to correspond with this opinion.

Mr. LANMAN moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BARTON saw no necessity for referring the resolution; nor did he see any impropriety in requesting a copy of that part of a treaty which related to the inhabitants of a country now become a part of the United States, and which was intended for their benefit; and if it was not in the Department of State, he could imagine no impropriety in going further, and asking France and Spain for that particular article, though they might wish to keep the treaty, in the main, private.

The motion to refer was negatived.

Mr. BENTON said, he had been careful to ask only for that particular article of the treaty which related to the rights of the people of Louisiana, lest it might have the appearance of wishing to pry into State secrets, or interfering with what did not properly concern them. But, in deference to those for whose opinions in such matters he respected, he would modify his resolution, as suggested by Mr. KING.

Mr. LOWRIE remarked that, if it was improper to call for a part of a treaty, it would be at least as much so to ask for the whole treaty. This treaty, he said, though not public, might have been communicated to the Executive of our Government in confidence; and it would be improper to take a step which might lead to the publication of it. He was, therefore, averse to the modification which had been accepted by the mover, and moved to restore it to its original shape.

Mr. KING, of New York, replied that every one who had been a member of the Senate long must know that the Treaty of St. Ildefonso was not in the possession of our Government, but merely that article of it which related to the cession of Louisiana.

Mr. RODNEY was of opinion that the treaty in question had been published, he believed, in Dodsley's Annual Register. He was under this impression, from the circumstance, which he remembered, that when the Louisiana question was debated, in the House of Representatives, Mr. GRISWOLD opposed the purchase, because, among other reasons, the title was not clear and complete, in consequence of the Treaty of San Ildefonso not having been promulgated; to whom it was answered, Mr. R. said, that the treaty had been published in the work which he had mentioned.

Mr. LOWRIE's motion to amend was negatived—ayes 16, noes 20; and

The resolution was agreed to in its modified form—simply requesting a copy of the treaty if in the Department of State.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the Senate a copy of the patent (if any such there be in the Treasury Department) which issued under an act of Congress of June 1st, 1796, conveying to the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, three tracts of land of four thousand acres each, to include the towns of Gnadenhutzen, Schoenbrunn, and Salem, on the Muskingum, in the State of Ohio, in trust to said Society, for the sole use of the Christian Indians formerly settled there.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to collect, and communicate to the Senate at the commencement of the next session of Congress, the best information which he may be able to obtain, relative to the said Christian Indians, and the lands intended for their benefit, in the above-mentioned grant; showing, as correctly as possible, the advance or decline of said Indians in numbers, morals, and intellectual endowments; whether the said lands have ensured to their sole benefit; and, if not, to whom, in whole or in part, have such benefits accrued.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate furnish a copy of the above resolutions to the Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, addressed to the President of the Society, at Bethlehem, in Northampton county, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Territorial Government in West Florida— Complaint of Unlawful Imprisonment.

The PRESIDENT of the Senate laid before the Senate a petition which he had received from Marcos de Villiers and Arnoldo Guillemard, representing themselves to be ancient inhabitants of Pensacola, who have been illegally imprisoned by the acting Governor of the Territory of West Florida, and praying the interposition of Congress for their relief. The petition was accompanied by sundry documents, embracing an appeal from the petitioners to the acting Governor for their release from imprisonment, and his refusal.

Mr. BARBOUR, not knowing at the moment what would be the most proper disposition for these papers, though it was probable that a reference of them to the Executive would be most suitable, moved to lay them on the table.

Mr. LOWRIE moved also to print them; for, on hearing the papers read, he thought the reasoning of the memorial to the acting Governor was plausible, if not unanswerable; but he should like to read them.

Mr. ELLIOTT thought, as this petition would also, no doubt, be presented to the House of Representatives, it would be better for the Senate to take no step on the subject at present, but wait the proceedings of the other House, to whom perhaps inquiries into such matters, involving the conduct of Executive officers, more appropriately belonged; and that it would be better that the Senate should not adopt any course which might in anywise compromise its future proceedings, or the dignity of the body.

Mr. BARBOUR deemed it proper that each House should act independently for itself in such cases, without reference to any proceedings elsewhere.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presumed, as the papers involved the conduct of officers under the control of the Executive, that they ought to be referred to the President of the United States, either with or without any expression of opinion. There was no difficulty in the case, he thought. These men were a part of the Spanish officers who had been sent out of the province by General Jackson, and had now returned to Pensacola to behave themselves as peaceable citizens, and had been imprisoned by the acting Governor. It was a case for the Executive to act on.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, calling for a division of the question, it was first taken on printing the petition and documents, and negatived—ayes 19, noes 22.

The papers were then ordered to be laid on the table.

FRIDAY, February 22.

Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen.

The resolutions, moved on a previous day by Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, being under consideration,

Mr. BENTON said that he would undertake to show, by a dry detail of historical facts, the propriety of adopting them.

He said it happened about a hundred years ago, that the followers of the sectarian Schwenkfeld were expelled, by the reigning Elector, from the Electorate of Saxony; and about the same time a Dr. Spangenberg, Theologus Adjunctus in the University of Halle, lost his place in the University on account of some dispute with the divines. Being out of employment, these individuals united in a project to cross over to the British colonies in America for the purpose of civilizing and converting the Indians; and addressing themselves to Governor Oglethorpe, then in London, received from him the means of transportation to Savannah in Georgia. Arrived at that place, they immediately commenced their labors among the Creek Indians; founded a church and a school at a place called Irene, five miles from Savannah, and had the greatest success, according to the published accounts, in teaching and converting the natives. The noise of their employment and success drew others from Germany, and with the increase of laborers was duly extended the field of action. They spread to the North, and entered the colony of Connecticut, being invited, as the history of the mission reports, by the Indians themselves. Mr. B. said that he could not gainsay the alleged fact of the invitation, nor was it material to the point in hand; but he could say, that such an invitation implied a contradiction of every spring of human action, there being no principle in the breast of man, either civilized or barbarian, which can impel him to invite another to make an attack upon the articles of his faith and the sanctity of his God. Be that as it may, Mr. B.

said that the Brethren (for by that name they began to be known) established themselves in the village of Shekomeko, which, if it now stands, will be found between the rivers Hudson and Connecticut, some fifty miles west of Hartford. It was a principal town of the Mahikender tribe, and the Brethren immediately established a school and a church, and had the most wonderful success in teaching and converting. To do justice to their labors, Mr. B. said that he would read the account given of it by their own historian, Loskiel:

"In July the new chapel at Shekomeko was finished and consecrated; some of the Elders of the congregation of Bethlehem being present. The congregation usually met every forenoon to hear a discourse delivered upon some text of scripture. Every evening a hymn was sung. A monthly prayer day was likewise established, on which accounts were read concerning the progress of the Gospel in different parts of the world, and prayer and supplication made unto God for all men, with thanksgiving. The prayer days were peculiarly agreeable to the Indians: especially because they heard that they were remembered in prayer by so many children of God in other places. Both on these days and on all festival days, Shekomeko was all alive, and it may be said with truth, that the believers showed forth the death of the Lord both early and late. One day above one hundred savages came thither on a visit, and one of the missionaries observed, that, wherever two were standing together, our Lord Jesus and his love to sinners, as the cause of his bitter sufferings, was the subject of conversation."

Mr. B. said that the history went on to show that the converted Indians increased in number and grace until they became an example to the people of Connecticut. He mentioned particularly the case of a certain justice of the peace, as related by Loskiel, who came to Shekomeko to find out whether any thing was going on there contrary to the laws of the colony, and who was made ashamed of himself by the godly walk and conversation of the Indians, and returned home rebuked and edified by their example.

Mr. B. said that, continuing to increase in numbers and to widen their theatre, the Brethren appeared in Pennsylvania among the Delawares and Shawnese, then in great numbers upon the Susquehanna River and in the neighborhood of Philadelphia. He mentioned Nain, Shamokin, Bethlehem, Nazareth, and many other places, as founded at this time and filled with converted Indians, and read from Loskiel to show that a single congregation consisted of five hundred converts, and that the schools were thronged with girls and boys, divided into regular classes, and making wonderful progress in their studies. He alluded to the opinion of Dr. Franklin about these establishments, but passed on to the Muskingum, on the Ohio, where the vanguard of the Brethren arrived about the year 1770. Here they founded the towns of Gnadenhutten, Schoenbrunn, and New Salem, and were proceeding with their usual success, as testified by the historian, when the settlements were broken up, and themselves dispersed by the troubles of the Revolutionary war. It was not until after the return of peace in 1783 that they could return to their labors, and about this time they began to attract the notice of the American Government, and to receive from it promises of aid, in consideration of their great success in teaching and converting the Indians. He read from Loskiel, to show that the Brethren were now full of courage and confidence; that the schools and churches flourished; that the young especially exceeded the old; that their converts, in the whole, had amounted to fifteen hundred persons, "which they considered to be a stock large enough to be a light of the Lord shining into many heathen nations, for the eternal salvation of their immortal souls."

Mr. B. said it was to these Indians that the resolutions referred; for their use that twelve thousand acres of land were granted, and it was their present number and actual condition which he wished to learn. He said, it was about this time that the Brethren, with others, became incorporated, under the act of the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, by the name of "The Society of United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the heathen." The usual privileges to sue and be sued, to have and to hold real and personal estate, were imparted to it, and it was to this society that the land in question was granted in trust for the sole use of the Christian Indians of the towns he had mentioned.

Mr. B. adverted to the resolutions which he had submitted, and to the nature of the inquiry which they contemplated. He said the grant conveyed nothing but the use of the land, and that upon a precise limitation. If the use had failed, the limitation had attached, and the ground returned to the grantor. He said it would have been idle in him to undertake to put the Senate upon this inquiry, without being able to suggest a failure of the use; he therefore made the suggestion, but without going into particulars, hoping that the Senators from Ohio, so much more competent than himself, would do the Senate that favor.

Mr. B. said he was a friend to the Indians, and an enemy to the abuse of charities. He believed that great abuses had been committed on public and private charity, in the name of humanity to Indians. He did not include all missionaries in this censure. He knew that the best men upon earth had engaged in that business from the purest and most disinterested motives. He knew that the early history of North and South America was full of such examples—examples of men who, braving all dangers and hardships, died at the stake in flames and tortures, martyrs to their zeal to carry the light of the gospel into the darkest regions. Still he believed that great abuses had been committed, and he could hold it but little short of an abuse to attempt, at this day, with the experience of three hundred years before our eyes, to raise money from the weak and credulous for the purpose of converting the Indians. He said we had the experience of three hundred years, and every year of it would furnish illustrations of the truth of his position; but he would only go back two hundred, and that for the sake of a single example. Canada was then just discovered—the French held it—Henry IV. was then on the throne, and the Jesuit Father Cotton was his confessor. This Jesuit conceived the design of converting the Canada Indians, and the first question with him was to raise the ways and means. Man, said Mr. B., is an excitable animal and woman still more so, and, above all, a French man and a French woman. The Jesuit knew this; so he addressed himself to the ladies of the Court and city of Paris. The effect was electric. High and low rushed into the project. Enemies in every thing else, united in this. Mary of Medicis, wife of the King, and the Marchioness Verneuil, his mistress, vied with each other in the profusion of their donations. The Duchesses D'Aiguillon and Lesdignières, and the Countess Guercheville, figured in their train. The gazettes of the day were spangled with the names and titles of female patronesses of missions. Money, clothes, and valuable effects, flowed in upon the Jesuit. Young ladies were even sent to Canada to nurse the sick Christian Indians, and that superb establishment in Quebec, the Hotel Dieu, was founded by the Duchesse D'Aiguillon for an Indian hospital. To repay so much liberality the Jesuit missionaries sent back the most wonderful accounts of their success. According to their reports, the Six Nations, and divers other nations, were converted, and the island of Orleans, below Quebec, contained six hundred Indian monks and nuns, regularly divided, male and female, into two distinct societies.* The zeal of the ladies rose to frenzy, and Father Cotton had to moderate it.

Mr. B. said that the French Calvinists, all the while, insisted that the Jesuits were doing no good to the Indians, but acquiring much power and riches for themselves—for which they were, of course, stigmatized by the Jesuits as the enemies of the Indians. On which side the better reason was, might be guessed at from the fact, that, when the English Government succeeded to the sovereignty of the Canadas, they found the Jesuits in possession of very few converts, and in the enjoyment of very large revenues; no less than forty-four thousand dollars per annum, which went to the British crown upon the extinction of the order, some years ago: and there ended the charities of Parisian ladies in favor of converting American Indians.

But, Mr. B. said, it was not Father Cotton and the ladies only who had tried this business and failed in it. All the Kings of France, from the discovery of Canada in 1600, to the cession of that province and Louisiana in 1763, had made the same experiment, with the same wonderful success in the beginning, and the same miserable result in the end. In the reigns of these kings, the missionaries covered the valley of the Mississippi, and carried their adventurous zeal to the shores of Lakes Superior and Winnipeg, and to the banks of the Saskatchewan River, everywhere converting nations, and building chapels, and bringing to their altars innumerable worshippers of the only true and living God. And, yet, what is the present fruit of all this labor? If a traveller on the banks of the Mississippi should inquire for the monuments of that time, and of that work, he might be pointed to the walls of a fallen down house in the village of Kaakaskia, and told "that was the Jesuits' College;" he might be pointed to a stream of water below St. Louis called La Riviere des Pères, (river of the fathers,) and to another above called La Riviere des Moines (river of the Monks)—and informed that these walls, and these names, are the only vestiges which now remain of all the labors of that powerful order in this magnificent valley.

Mr. B. pointed to Lake Superior, and said it was the same thing there. The site of the chapel which contained 800 worshippers in the time of Charlevoix, was now unknown. Nay, more: the knowledge of the fact that missionaries had ever been there, was itself in danger of being lost. He had the authority of Sir Alexander McKenzie, for asserting that this knowledge, even thirty years ago, was confined to the stream of tradition, and to the memory of some superannuated old men. If such had been the fruit of missions patronized by such men as Henry IV. and the Duke of Sully, Louis XIII., Cardinal Richelieu, Louis XIV., and the great Colbert, led by an order who, for energy and devotion, have been styled the Janissaries of the Papal throne, Mr. B. said that he, for one, was ready to despair of any great success from our empty pockets and discordant forces.

Mr. B. said that he had covered no more ground than the terms of the resolutions required, and he had done so designedly. He had seen in a gazette of the city the copy of a constitution, and a list of the grand dignitaries of a vast society announced for the conversion of Indians. The list embraced all Presidents and Ex-Presidents; all Secretaries of War, and State, and Treasury, and Navy; all Judges and Governors, Generals and Commodores, Preachers and Schoolmasters, and all members, present and to come, of both Houses of the Congress of the United States. As a member of the Senate, he found himself included in the list, certainly without his knowledge, and equally certain without his approbation. He had, therefore, made this exposition of his sentiments to show that he did not countenance the views of the society. He was laid under a necessity of doing so, for the constitution and list is printed in this city; the elections are said to have taken place in this city; all is done, as it would seem abroad, in our very presence; and, if we do not except to the procedure, we agree to it; silence gives consent. And what impositions may not be practised? The ninth article of this constitution, creates a Committee of Ways and Means—five the complement, and three the quorum. This committee is enjoined “to devise and prosecute to effect the measures most practicable, and best adapted to supply the Society’s treasury with the necessary funds to carry on its operations.” This quorum of three are the soul of the Society; they are to raise the wind! How? Nobody knows. Who are they? Nobody knows. What may they not do in the name of this redoubtable society! They may run subscriptions through all parts of Europe and America, and who could have the courage to refuse a mite to such a formidable array of beggars? The weak and credulous would give what was due to their children, their servants, or their poor neighbors, under the delusive idea that the great men whose names they saw, were seriously engaged in converting Indians, and would faithfully apply all that was received to that object.*

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, said, in answer to the call thus made on him, by the gentleman from Missouri, that he could only observe that he was unable to give an estimate, tolerably correct, of the value of the property of Ohio, possessed by the United Brethren. He believed that the cultivated portion of their grant was comparatively small, and, to all appearance, the revenue derived from it could not be very considerable; he was uninformed what might have been the amount, as well as its application. The State of Ohio, for several years, exempted the land from taxation. In the course of time, since the first Moravian mission was sent to the Tuscarawas, (now fifty years or more,) it would seem, from their own accounts, that their zeal for propagating the gospel had been so successful as to assemble a large congregation of Indians, whom they had converted to Christianity, which congregation has now become nearly extinct; owing to massacre, wars, and dispersion, together with many of the vices that usually attended a degraded community, so that the unfortunate Indians, in that region, under the special protection of the Brethren, have dwindled to a few families; comprehending, in all, perhaps twenty individuals, inhabiting a wretched hamlet, called Goshen, on the Tuscarawas branch of the Muskingum; exhibiting, like the persons of the natives, an appearance of squalid wretchedness. They have among them a resident from the society, and are said to cultivate a common field in a rude and imperfect manner. This remnant shows no symptoms of mental improvement; but, on the contrary, many marks of their degradation appear in their idleness, want, and habits of intoxication among the men. As the condition of these Indians, to whom the professed benevolence of the United Brethren has been extended, seems, said Mr. B., in no way improved; the ostensible object of that same mission, in which Mr. Heckewelder spent above forty years, has totally failed.

Mr. LOWRIE, of Pennsylvania, observed that, on hearing the resolutions read, he had no objections to their passage. He was always in favor of information on every subject where there was any allegation of mismanagement, or, as in this case, a failure of the use. Of the present case, he knew nothing on either side, and he should not have said a word, had it not been for the general remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, which appeared to him to have been perfectly gratuitous, at least he was not able to see their application to the resolutions now under consideration. He did not like discussions of this kind to be brought before the Senate, unless arising out of the business immediately before us. Should it become necessary to discuss this subject, he, Mr. L., believed it would not be difficult to give a very different view of the subject from that given by the gentleman from Missouri. Without denying the facts adduced, Mr. L. said, he could produce other facts which would place the subject in another light, and he had long found it necessary, in coming to a correct conclusion, to hear both sides. If there have been mistakes on this subject, it is not surprising, and from those very mistakes information would be derived. It was likely that those engaged in this benevolent business had, at the first, kept too much out of view the necessity of teaching the Indians agriculture and the common arts of civilized life. The proceedings of the different missionary societies show that this error is now corrected. He did not intend to engage further in the discussion. He would not have said a word had it not been that an inference in favor of such general remarks might have been drawn from the circumstance of their being permitted to pass in silence.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolutions; and they were agreed to.

Death of Mr. Pinkney.

The Journal having been read—

Mr. LLOYD, of Maryland, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

It was to bring the public mind to consider what must happen to this formidable Society, by showing what had happened to all such from the discovery of the two Americas. The speech had the desired effect, and the Society expired in the birth.

fact, that my much esteemed and distinguished colleague is no more. An attempt to excite the sympathies of the Senate for a loss so great, and so afflicting, would betray a suspicion of their sensibility, and would do injustice to the memory of him whose loss we must all sincerely deplore. This chamber, sir, has been one of the fields of his fame. You have seen him in his strength. You have seen him the admiration of the Senate; the pride of his native State; the ornament of his country. He is now no more. But, for his friends and relatives, there is consolation beyond the grave. I humbly and firmly trust, that he now reposes on the bosom of his God.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, then rose, and submitted the following resolve, prefacing it with the observation, that, although the Senate and the country knew and honored the public character of the deceased, he had known him as a man, and knew how to appreciate the loss which they had all sustained:

Resolved, unanimously, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of the Honorable WILLIAM PINKNEY, which will take place to-morrow morning, at eleven o'clock; that the Senate will attend the same; and that notice of the event be given to the House of Representatives.

On balloting for a committee, the following gentlemen were chosen:

Mr. KING of New York, Mr. MAOON of North Carolina, Mr. BARBOUR of Virginia, Mr. RODNEY of Delaware, and Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, it was also unanimously

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the Honorable WILLIAM PINKNEY, deceased, late a member thereof, will go into mourning for him one month, by the usual mode of wearing a crape round the left arm.

Resolved, unanimously, That, as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the Honorable WILLIAM PINKNEY, the Senate do now adjourn.

And the Senate adjourned accordingly.

THURSDAY, February 28.

The Senate then, according to the order of the day, took up, in Committee of the Whole, the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. LLOYD, on the 10th of January, and postponed from time to time to this day:

Resolved, That appropriations of territory for the purposes of education, should be made to those States in whose favor no such appropriations have been made, corresponding in a just proportion with those heretofore made to other States in the Union.

Resolved, That the foregoing resolution be referred to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill pursuant thereto.

Mr. LLOYD rose, and addressed the Senate about an hour and a half in support of the right, the equity, and the expediency of the object proposed in the resolution; when, not having concluded the remarks which he wished to offer on the subject, he asked the indulgence of the Senate to be permitted to conclude them to-morrow; and, thereupon, the resolution was, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, laid on the table.

FRIDAY, March 1.

Appropriations for holding Indian Treaties.

The following Message, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, was received yesterday:

To the Senate of the United States:

Under the appropriation made by the act of Congress of the 11th of April, 1820, for holding treaties with the Creek and Cherokee Nations of Indians, for the extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within the State of Georgia, pursuant to the fourth condition of the first article of the articles of agreement and cession, concluded between the United States and the State of Georgia, on the 24th day of April, 1802, a treaty was held with the Creek Nation, the expense of which, upon the settlement of the accounts of the commissioners who were appointed to conduct the negotiation, was ascertained to amount to the sum of $24,695, leaving an unexpended balance of the sum appropriated, of $5,806; a sum too small to negotiate a treaty with the Cherokees, as was contemplated by the act making the appropriation. The Legislature of Georgia, being still desirous that a treaty should be held for further extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within that State, and to obtain an indemnity to the citizens of that State for property of considerable value, which has been taken from them by the Cherokee Indians, I submit the subject to the consideration of Congress, that a further sum, which, in addition to the balance of the former appropriation, will be adequate to the expenses attending a treaty with them, may be appropriated, should Congress deem it expedient.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25, 1822.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Lands for Education.

The Senate then resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution relative to an appropriation of public land to the old States, for education.

Mr. LLOYD resumed the speech which he commenced yesterday in support of the resolution, and occupied the floor about an hour.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Illinois, next rose, and spoke nearly two hours against the resolution, as follows:

Mr. President: notwithstanding that any opposition to the resolution upon your table, on the part of the Representatives of the new States, has been denounced as "disreputable to their characters for honesty and justice," not only by many of our most distinguished and patriotic public journals, but also by one of the most respectable States of the Union; yet, sir, a sense of duty will not permit me to decline an investigation of the subject, hopeless as it may be to oppose my feeble efforts to the transcendent abilities with which the proposition under consideration has been supported, and, unpleasant as it is, to subject myself to imputations, which the zeal of many of its ablest advocates affords me but little prospect of escaping. I shall, however, carefully endeavor to follow the example of the honorable gentleman who has just resumed his seat, (Mr. LLOYD,) in treating the subject with such deference to the feelings of others, as to furnish no ground of exception to any gentleman, with whom it may be my misfortune to differ in opinion; and permit me to say, sir, that equally with the gentleman from Maryland, appreciating the advantages of education, regarding it as a most efficient means of increasing the virtue, knowledge, and happiness of mankind, and of imparting additional moral power, stability, and embellishment to our republican institutions, it would afford me the sincerest gratification, to unite with him in any just and proper measure for the advancement of that important object. But, sir, it appears to me to be doubtful, at least, whether Congress can rightfully adopt, for that purpose, the measure now under consideration.

The appropriation which we are asked to make, is avowed to be for a mere State purpose, and in that point of view, I shall proceed to consider it under every modification of which it is susceptible. The question then is, can the resources of this nation be thus applied? This should be tested by principle rather than by the "precedents upon precedents" referred to and relied upon by the gentleman from Maryland; for this Government is much too young to acknowledge the force of any precedents not founded upon, and much less of those which are in opposition to principle; and gentlemen who are disposed to avail themselves of an argument deduced from mere precedents, in the present case, ought to recollect how little inclined they would be to respect such authority, in a variety of other cases that might be referred to.

In discussing this subject, said Mr. E., I may, I presume, safely premise that the duties, powers, and objects, of the Federal and State Governments, are separate and distinct; that the success of our whole governmental experiment, and the prosperity and happiness of this nation, depend upon the fidelity and wisdom with which those governments respectively discharge their appropriate functions. Each government has, for those important purposes, and as necessary thereto, its own particular resources, which cannot be yielded up, or misapplied, without impairing its capacity to fulfil the objects of its institution; for nothing could be more nugatory than a grant of powers without the means of executing them. The resources of this Government are found from experience to be, at this time, inadequate to its wants; any measure, therefore, whose tendency would be further to embarrass and cripple its operations, must be deemed highly inexpedient at least.

Mr. President, (said Mr. E.,) the gentleman from Maryland appears to have reviewed, with critical accuracy, all the events connected with the acquisition of the national domain; and he has, with great perspicuity, traced out the origin, and demonstrated the validity, of our title to it. But, sir, whether it has been acquired by conquest, cessions from particular States, or purchases from foreign powers, one thing is undeniable—it has doubtless been acquired by, and exclusively belongs to the Confederation, or Union. It must, therefore, be considered as national, and not State property, and, by fair inference, is applicable only to national and not State objects. It is true, as contended by the honorable gentleman, that it is a common fund, in which all the States are interested. So, sir, is the revenue, and every other species of property belonging to the United States, in relation to all of which the interest of the States is precisely the same. Being a common fund, applicable to the use and support of the General Government, the States can enjoy the benefits of it only in its just and legitimate application to national purposes. I hold it, therefore, that no State can rightfully claim, and of course to none can be granted, the separate and distinct use, and enjoyment of, the property, or funds of the nation, in consequence of a right to a common participation therein.

Independent, however, of these general considerations, the adoption of the proposed measure is, I think, forbidden by a just regard to the positive stipulations of the United States which ceded the public domain on the East side of the Mississippi River. Let us, said Mr. E., for a moment, attend to the circumstances under which those cessions were made, which have been so eloquently narrated and commented upon by the gentleman from Maryland.

During our Revolutionary struggle, which eventuated so happily, in the establishment of our liberty and independence, the pecuniary resources of the nation had been exhausted; and, at the close of the contest, it found itself loaded with a heavy debt, incurred in the prosecution of the war, which it had not the means of discharging; but which every dictate of justice, honor, and gratitude, required should be provided for, at the earliest practicable period, by every means which the nation could command.

Several of the States claimed large tracts of waste and unappropriated territory in the Western country, as being within their chartered limits. These claims had long been the subject of much animated, and sometimes irritating discussion, as is sufficiently obvious from the authorities read by the gentleman from Maryland. The States which had no part in those lands, had earnestly insisted that, if the dominion over them should be established by the common force and treasure of the United States, they ought to be appropriated as a common fund for defraying the expenses of the war. Congress, appealing to the generosity, magnanimity, and patriotism, of the States having those claims, had recommended and solicited liberal cessions of a portion of them, for the same purposes—promising, as inducements thereto, by the very resolution which the honorable gentleman has read to you, that all the lands which might be so ceded or relinquished, should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States; that they should be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which should be admitted into the Federal Union; and that the regulations for granting and for settling those lands should be prescribed by Congress.

Lands for Education.

The States thus appealed to, yielding at length to a laudable spirit of harmony and conciliation, made the cessions which had been requested of them—not, however, without stipulating very explicitly that those lands should be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the Union, as it then was, or thereafter might be; and that they should be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that common purpose, “and for no other use or purpose whatsoever.”

The United States, therefore, having solicited and accepted of the cessions upon such terms—under such circumstances—having bound themselves, by solemn compact, to dispose of those lands for the use and benefit of the Union—“and for no other use or purpose whatsoever,” Congress cannot now, I think, consistently with good faith and honor, disregard those solemn engagements, by withdrawing the whole, or any part of the fund so surrendered, from the use of the Union, and appropriating it to that of any one or more States.

Sir, said Mr. E., the stipulations of the United States embrace the whole of those lands. If, then, you can withdraw any part of them from the use for which they were specially solicited, ceded, and accepted, where, I beg leave to ask the gentleman from Maryland, is the limit to your power over them? Why may you not as well make partition of the whole of them among the several States of the Union? And how then would you fulfil the stipulations of the United States? First, that the regulations for granting and settling those lands should be prescribed by Congress. Secondly, that they should be settled; and, thirdly, that being settled, they should be formed into distinct Republican States, and admitted into the Federal Union. It cannot be contended that we are competent to delegate powers for such purposes to the States, for, if that be the case, there are no powers with which we are invested, that might not, with equal propriety, be transferred.

Mr. President, said Mr. E., it is no answer to these objections to contend, as the gentleman from Maryland seems to do, that the claims of the ceded States were not just and valid; for, however defective they may have been originally, the United States, by accepting of the cessions upon special conditions, must be considered as having admitted the right, and bound themselves to comply with the conditions: otherwise, there could be no faith and confidence reposed in any adjustment, arrangement, or contract, with Government. [Here Mr. LLOYD rose and explained the remarks he had made; and having resumed his seat, Mr. E. again proceeded.]

But, sir, let us inquire into the extent of the appropriation we are called upon to make. Instead of the “small slice,” as described by the gentleman from Maryland, it is to the enormous amount of about ten millions of acres of the national domain, which, at the average price at which those lands have hitherto been sold, would produce a sum nearly equal, if not entirely so, to the whole amount of the net proceeds of the sale of public lands, received into the Treasury of the United States, during the last nineteen or twenty years. It would be needless to review the extraordinary circumstances which, in this period, so powerfully contributed to augment the receipts of the Treasury from this source of our revenue. Similar causes are not likely to recur for many years to come; and, calculating upon the sales that have been made since those causes have ceased to operate, a much longer period, probably not less than double that length of time, would be requisite to effect sales to the same amount.

What then, Mr. President, is to be the consequence of granting this quantity of land to the States, in whose favor it is applied for? It surely cannot be seriously intended to vest the old States with the power to plant colonies of tenants in the new ones. This would be impracticable, and, to those States, utterly useless. Waiving other important considerations, which I forbear even to allude to, the vast extent of the national domain, and the cheapness of unimproved lands, thank God for it, afford but little prospect of renting such lands to advantage, or of even having them settled and improved for the use of them.

The object, then, must be either to authorize the States to dispose of the land, or that this Government shall become their auctioneer for that purpose. The former would be transferring to those States a power exclusively delegated to Congress—a right to do that which, according to the stipulations before referred to, can only be performed by Congress. For, I take it for granted that, if you cannot vest in the States the right to dispose of their respective interests in the whole of the public lands, you can transfer to them no power to dispose of any part of them. But, sir, supposing there is nothing solid in this objection, what is to be the effect upon your Treasury, of authorizing the States to sell the land proposed to be granted to them? They must enter into competition with you. In proportion to the extent of their sales, whatever they may be, yours must be diminished; because not only the price, the sale of land, must depend upon the relation which supply bears to demand; for if the price be so low, and the supply so great, that it ceases to be an object of speculation, there can be no motive to purchase it but for cultivation. As the Government, however, would still have an infinitely greater variety of lands to select from, the States could not sell at all to any extent without underselling the Government. This, therefore, they must do, otherwise their lands would be of no use to them. Recollect, sir, the millions of acres which you have granted in military bounties. These have already come into competition with you at the reduced price of twenty to forty dollars a quarter section, and have most materially curtailed your sales. Add to them the ten millions of acres now proposed to be granted, you must abolish your present system of sales, and abandon your minimum price altogether, or close up your land offices for twenty, thirty, or forty years to come.

Take, then, sir, if you please, the other alternative, that the Government shall dispose of the land for the benefit of those States. To this some gentlemen seem to think there can be no objection, because the constitution has delegated to Congress the power of disposing of the property of the United States, though that power is, by express stipulation, and plain and obvious inference, coupled with the positive duty of disposing of such property for the benefit of the Union. By this plan, however, the injurious effects of competition might be avoided, and the present minimum price preserved. But, as has been already shown, it would require some twenty years at least to dispose of the land, though not an acre should, in the mean time, be sold for the benefit of the Union. This would indeed be transforming Federal into State agents; abstracting them from duties for whose performance they were solely created, and devoting them to a pretty long servitude to mere State purposes. Now, sir, admitting we have a right to give away the land to the States, whence do we derive the power to constitute ourselves, and our successors, too, their agents and trustees? Or to convert this Government into such State machinery?

But, sir, putting the best possible aspect upon this plan, it can amount to nothing less than a virtual grant of money, to be paid out of the public Treasury, with a pledge of our already pledged, repledged, triple, quadruple, quintuple pledged public lands, for its payment. Is, then, that a proper time for making such an appropriation, when the receipts of the Treasury are not more than adequate to the current expenses of the Government? When the Government has to support itself by loans of five millions at a time? And when every man in the nation, of ordinary sagacity, must be convinced that we must soon resort to a permanent system of internal taxation? Sir, said Mr. E., it cannot be disguised from the people of this nation, that, in proportion as we misapply or impair any of the ordinary sources of revenue, additional burdens must be imposed upon them. And can it be supposed that they will be reconciled to an appropriation, to such an amount, attended with such consequences, without even the pretence of power on the part of Congress to enforce its application to the objects for which it is to be granted?

But, sir, what is to be the extent to which the new doctrines upon which the present proposition is supported, are to lead us? One false step begets another. If, because one thirty-sixth part of the national domain, in the new States, has been appropriated to the support of education therein, the States in which there is no public land are entitled to an appropriation of equal amount, as contended by the gentleman from Maryland, why may they not, with equal propriety and justice, claim a much larger proportion of the net proceeds of the sale of public land for a different purpose; and one, too, which has not escaped the attention of the honorable gentleman, but has been several times referred to by him in the course of his remarks? By stipulations with the new States, one-twentieth of those proceeds is appropriated to the making of roads in and leading to them. Are not roads, as well as education, equally necessary to every State in the Union? And if you grant the proposed appropriation for the support of education, upon the principles contended for by the gentleman from Maryland—not asked as a favor, but, according to his own language, “demanded as a right”—upon what ground can you refuse the suggested appropriation for public roads? If the latter be granted, then will not only this source of national revenue be completely annihilated, but other sources must be rendered tributary to the States. For if a sum equal to one-twentieth of the proceeds of the sale of public land, is to be granted to each State, then, as certainly as that twenty-twentieths are the whole, those proceeds can only satisfy twenty States, and the balance must be paid out of some other branch of the revenue.

In short, sir, it appears to me that we have no more right to grant away to the States the funds, than the powers of this Government; for, take from it its pecuniary resources, and destroy its character for good faith, it would be idle mockery to pretend to talk about its powers.

MONDAY, March 4.

Florida Territorial Government.

The Senate then took up the bill to establish a government for the Territory of Florida, and spent the remainder of the sitting in discussing and maturing its numerous provisions; in the course of which, Mr. WALKER offered an amendment containing provisions for annexing a part of West Florida to the State of Alabama. This amendment was ordered to be printed, and the bill was laid on the table.*

MONDAY, MARCH 4.

The Proposed Adjournment.

The Senate took up the resolution offered by Mr. KING, of New York, on Friday, proposing that the present session be adjourned on the first Monday in April.

Mr. K. merely observed that nothing had yet been done; that nothing more than the ordinary and necessary business of the session would be done; and it was better, therefore, to terminate the session.

Mr. SMITH said that, owing to the larger number of the other House, it was true it had not progressed with business as fast as the Senate; and it was not to be expected that it could. The great mass of business was generally considered and acted on in the other House first; they knew what they had to do, and it was better that a proposition to fix a day for adjournment should come from that House. Though much had not yet been done, it was no reason that much should not be done; but it could not be unless time sufficient were allowed. If the sessions should be limited to a period too soon for completing the public business, it would be followed by a bill to meet earlier at the next session; so that nothing would be gained by a hasty adjournment. It was certainly too soon to fix a day of adjournment; there was much important business before both Houses, which ought to be acted on deliberately; and it was impossible to say now exactly how long it would require.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, thought it was time to go home; nothing would be lost by postponing most of the important questions now before Congress to the next session; and he was the more in favor of an early adjournment, as it would, he hoped, be the foundation of an act for an earlier meeting of the next session. Under the present arrangement of the meetings and adjournments of Congress, the Northern members labored under the disadvantage of coming and returning at a bad season, both as it regarded the weather and the roads. He saw no reason why one session should be six months and the other three months long. By adjourning earlier and meeting earlier, every alternate session, the sessions would be equalized, and the inconveniences he had referred to would be done away.

Mr. KING, of New York, said, at the opening of the session, the President gave such a view of the public affairs as presented very little business for the consideration of Congress. The finances of the country, it was stated, were free from difficulty, the income being sufficient for the public expenditures; and, as the great business of the money affairs of the nation stood well, there was not much at the beginning of the session which demanded the attention of Congress. Mr. K. said the session had passed off in a very indolent manner, and it was desirable that it should be brought to a speedy close. If there was any thing of importance necessary to be done, it had already received such a portion of consideration as to be acted on within the time proposed by the resolution. But, he repeated, that, as there was nothing to do, and as nothing would be done, it was better to adjourn. If the other House should think differently, they could say so; it was for them to be responsible for protracting the session, if they deemed it necessary; but it was time the Senate should say that they were ready to close the session.

Mr. VAN DYKE said no inconvenience or injury could arise from adopting the resolution. Congress had been a long time in session; the records would show that very little had been done, and the files would show that little of what might be called public business claimed attention. It would be as well to remind the other House that the Senate had nothing before it which would prevent an adjournment, and that it would be prepared to close the session by an early day.

Mr. LOWRIE observed, that if this resolution passed, it would be at least admitted that many of the committees had been very unnecessarily occupied with the business referred to them. But, he conceived, if it was right in the Senate to impose on committees the labor of investigating subjects, it was proper for the Senate to consider and dispose of the reports which were made. He alluded particularly to the Committee on Public Lands, and the number of important cases referred to it, relative to private claims, which had been reported on, and which, in justice to the petitioners, ought to be acted on. As to public business, Mr. L. said that it was desirable that it should never be legislated on very rapidly or hastily. For these reasons he was opposed to the resolution, and moved, to try the question, to strike out the first Monday of April, and insert the third Monday, which would extend the session to the 15th of the month. He was as anxious as any member to terminate the session, but could not consent to do so until the public business was attended to, and the numerous petitions now before Congress disposed of.

Mr. LLOYD said, if the adoption of the resolution could expedite the adjournment, he would be in favor of it; but the experience of this morning proved to him that it would not; and, indeed, he never saw these resolutions have any effect but to give rise to debate. If we are seriously disposed to close the session, said Mr. L., let us go seriously to work on the business before us. The time spent in this very debate might have been saved, and something useful acted on. Mr. L. was not aware of many questions of national importance which required the attention of Congress; but, as long as the right of petition was secured to the people—as long as they had the right to come before Congress for a redress of grievances, it was the bounden duty of Congress to hear and decide on their petitions. These were generally presented to the other House through the immediate representatives of the people, and it was for that House to say when they could get through the claims before them, and complete their business. Mr. L. was in favor, therefore, of waiting for the House of Representatives to suggest a day of adjournment.

Mr. MAÇON said, gentlemen from the North complained that the roads were bad, at the seasons when Congress met and adjourned; but he had always understood that the roads were all turnpiked north of Maryland, and that it was the Southern members who labored under this disadvantage; but surely roads which the neighbors used every day could be travelled by members of Congress twice a year. This, however, was not the question. The real question was, whether the business could be done in a given time. He should vote for the resolution, no matter what day was inserted, as he wished to fix on some day; for, he said, legislation was like a snow ball; the more you roll it, the bigger it grows, and the longer we sit here, said Mr. M., the more business we make. Fix a day, and we shall get clear of those incessant motions for new subjects, and the business before us will be taken up and done.

Mr. SMITH, to show the futility of fixing on a day so long in advance, referred to an instance in which the Senate had proposed to the other House to terminate the session on the 10th of April, and they did not actually adjourn until the 15th of May. It was impossible to say whether the public business could be brought to a close by a particular day so far ahead. This, he remarked, had been called a talking Government; it was so; and he cared not what was said, so long as the public business did not go undone. Was the fatigue complained of, incurred in doing nothing? Was not the Senate, he asked, every day engaged in considering some business or other in which the people were interested? So long as he was conscious of not neglecting his public duties, he disregarded any thing that was said by the newspapers. As to the complaints of the printers, they would always complain, whether with or without reason; some of them wished to take away our desks, others might next propose that we dispense with our seats; and many, no doubt, would think our time well employed if it were entirely spent in reading the useful information of the newspapers. But the complaints referred to, Mr. S. contended, were in a great measure unfounded and unjust. Who could tell the time necessary for the investigation of the various questions which came before Congress for consideration, but those who were here to witness the intricacy of many of them, the difficulty of arriving at right conclusions, the numerous documents connected with them, the ingenuity of claimants, and the necessity of mature deliberation. Few persons at a distance could appreciate these reasons for delay, in deciding even on the multitude of private claims, and still less on the necessity of fully examining questions of great national concern before they were decided on. Was Congress, he asked, to transform itself into a Quaker meeting, take up every thing at a word, discard all debate, and decide every question by simple yea and nay? Mr. S. avowed his belief that the safety of the liberties of the country lay in deliberation; and, although much might be uttered here which was unnecessary, or even foolish, this was a small evil compared with the value of discussion and deliberation. It is very true that all the business before Congress was disposed of at one session; he should never forget it; and he well remembered that between eight o'clock at night of the last day of that session, and the following morning, the President of the United States approved and signed between seventy and eighty bills; there was no time allowed for discussion; no man dared attempt to speak on them; all that he could do was to say aye or no; the rule was suspended which required the bills to be read on different days, all the safeguards of deliberation were broken down; and he well remembered that seven laws passed three readings in ten minutes, for he had held his watch in his hand and noted the time. These were the fruits of precipitate adjournment. The same consequence would always ensue if time were not allowed for the deliberate transaction of the business. This was not the way to legislate on the important affairs confided to them by the people.

Mr. OTIS said, that, from the earnestness with which this resolution was debated, one would suppose that it was a motion to coerce the other House into an adjournment. He presumed the proposition must begin somewhere; and, under present circumstances, it could not be expected to originate for some time to come in the other House. They could not, after occupying so many weeks in preparing business for this House to act on, be expected to follow it with a proposition to us to adjourn. It would come with more propriety from this House, because it was for the Senate to say when they could probably get through the business sent up from the House of Representatives for concurrence. It was a fact, Mr. O. said, that the business of the country was unnecessarily procrastinated, and it was proper for the Senate to show that it, at least, was unwilling to prolong the session beyond a reasonable period, or to consume time unnecessarily.

The motion made by Mr. LOWRIE, to strike out the first Monday of April, and insert the second, was lost—ayes 15, noes 24; and the resolution was agreed to, ayes 28.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 6.

Government of Florida.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a government for the Territory of Florida, and spent some time in considering the amendments adopted yesterday in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee of the Whole, yesterday, on motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, struck out of the bill the following clause of the eleventh section:

"No slave or slaves shall, directly or indirectly, be introduced into the said Territory, except by a citizen of the United States, removing into the said Territory for actual settlement, and being at the time of such removal, bona fide owner of such slave or slaves; and every slave imported or brought into the said Territory, contrary to the provisions of this act, shall, thereupon, be entitled to, and receive, his or her freedom."

On the question of concurring with the committee in striking out the clause, Mr. MILLS made some remarks to show the expediency of retaining it in the bill. Mr. KING, of Alabama, replied, and Mr. MILLS further advocated a disagreement to the amendment. Messrs. BARROW and VAN BUREN joined briefly in the discussion, and Mr. LLOYD spoke against the clause at considerable length, and with much earnestness.

The question on agreeing with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the clause, was decided by yeas and nays, in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Brown of Louisiana, D'Wolf, Eaton, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lloyd, Macon, Noble, Pleasants, Smith, Southard, Stokes, Van Dyke, Walker, Ware, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Boardman, Brown of Ohio, Chandler, Dickerson, Findlay, Holmes of Maine, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Mills, Morrill, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Thomas, and Van Buren—20.

Considerable debate took place on a motion of Mr. EATON to amend the bill so as to provide that, in case of the absence of the Governor from the Territory, his duties shall devolve on the Secretary of the Territory. The motion being changed on the suggestion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, so as to embrace, verbatim, the similar provision of the act of 1789,[†] respecting the government of Territories, the amendment was agreed to.

[†] This provision is in the Orleans Territorial bill of 1804, and on the question to strike it out of this Florida bill, the argument rose no higher than that of expediency—as that the Floridas were thinly populated, and that the same reasons did not exist for restraining the increase of slaves in the Territory as in Lower Louisiana.

[†] Here the ordinance of 1787 is well quoted as "the act of 1787," as in fact it is—being adopted and continued in force by that act.

A motion was made to reduce the number of the Legislative Council from thirteen, as proposed by the bill, to seven, but was lost; and no other amendment being offered thereto,

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

THURSDAY, March 7.

Terrestrial Concavity—Theory and Project of Captain Symmes.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented a petition from John Cleves Symmes, of Cincinnati, in Ohio, stating his belief of the existence of an inhabited concave to this globe; his desire to embark on a voyage of discovery, to one or other of the polar regions; his belief in the value and great honor to his country of the discoveries which he would make; that his pecuniary means are inadequate to the purpose, without public aid; and suggesting to Congress the equipment of two vessels of 250 or 300 tons for the expedition, and the granting of such other aid as Government may deem requisite to promote the object. A motion was made to refer the petition to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was refused; and, after some conversation, it was decided to lay it on the table—ayes 25.

FRIDAY, March 8.

Cost of building Ships, and Expenses of Navy Yards.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, submitted the following motions for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, the expenses of building each vessel of war, at each navy yard in the United States, authorized by an act of the 2d of January, 1813, to increase the Navy of the United States, and the acts supplementary thereto; distinguishing each vessel so built; the expenses of timber, iron, copper, cordage, hemp, cloth, and other materials; the amount paid to agents or superintendents, specifying their names; the amount paid for labor, particularizing carpenters, mast makers, boat builders, block makers, blacksmiths, armorers, reemers, caulkers, gun-carriage makers, sawyers, riggers, and other laborers.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, the names and number of officers and men belonging to the Navy, employed in, or attached to, each navy yard in the United States, with the service each has performed, and the compensation each has received in pay, rations, and other emoluments, during the two last years, ending on the first of January last.

MONDAY, March 11.

South American States.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In transmitting to the House of Representatives the documents called for by the resolution of that House, of the 30th January, I consider it my duty to invite the attention of Congress to a very important subject, and to communicate the sentiments of the Executive on it, that, should Congress entertain similar sentiments, there may be such co-operation between the two departments of the Government as their respective rights and duties may require.

The revolutionary movement in the Spanish provinces in this hemisphere attracted the attention and excited the sympathy of our fellow-citizens from its commencement. This feeling was natural and honorable to them, from causes which need not be communicated to you. It has been gratifying to all to see the general acquiescence which has been manifested in the policy which the constituted authorities have deemed it proper to pursue in regard to this contest. As soon as the movement assumed such a steady and consistent form as to make the success of the provinces probable, the rights to which they were entitled by the law of nations, as equal parties to a civil war, were extended to them. Each party was permitted to enter our ports with its public and private ships, and to take from them every article which was the subject of commerce with other nations. Our citizens, also, have carried on commerce with both parties, and the Government has protected it, with each, in articles not contraband of war. Through the whole of this contest the United States have remained neutral, and have fulfilled with the utmost impartiality all the obligations incident to that character.

This contest has now reached such a stage, and been attended with such decisive success on the part of the provinces, that it merits the most profound consideration whether their right to the rank of independent nations, with all the advantages incident to it, in their intercourse with the United States, is not complete. Buenos Ayres assumed that rank by a formal declaration in 1816, and has enjoyed it since 1810, free from invasion by the parent country. The provinces composing the Republic of Colombia, after having separately declared their independence, were united by a fundamental law of the 17th of December, 1819. A strong Spanish force occupied, at that time, certain parts of the territory within their limits, and waged a destructive war. That force has since been repeatedly defeated, and the whole of it either made prisoners or destroyed, or expelled from the country, with the exception of an inconsiderable portion only, which is blockaded in two fortresses. The provinces on the Pacific have likewise been very successful. Chili declared independence in 1818, and has since enjoyed it undisturbed; and of late, by the assistance of Chili and Buenos Ayres, the revolution has extended to Peru. Of the movement in Mexico our information is less authentic, but it is, nevertheless, distinctly understood, that the new Government has declared its independence, and that there is now no opposition to it there, nor a force to make any. For the last three years the Government of Spain has not sent a single corps of troops to any part of that country; nor is there any reason to believe it will send any in future. Thus, it is manifest, that all those provinces are not only in the full enjoyment of their independence, but, considering the state of the war and other circumstances, that there is not the most remote prospect of their being deprived of it.

When the result of such a contest is manifestly settled, the new Governments have a claim to recognition by other powers, which ought not to be resisted.

Civil wars too often excite feelings which the parties cannot control. The opinion entertained by other Powers as to the result, may assuage those feelings and promote an accommodation between them useful and honorable to both. The delay which has been observed in making a decision on this important subject, will, it is presumed, have afforded an unequivocal proof to Spain, as it must have done to other powers, of the high respect entertained by the United States for her rights, and of their determination not to interfere with them. The provinces belonging to this hemisphere are our neighbors, and have, successively, as each portion of the country acquired its independence, pressed their recognition by an appeal to facts not to be contested, and which they thought gave them a just title to it. To motives of interest this Government has invariably disclaimed all pretension, being resolved to take no part in the controversy, or other measure in regard to it, which should not merit the sanction of the civilized world. To other claims a just sensibility has been always felt, and frankly acknowledged, but they in themselves could never become an adequate cause of action. It was incumbent on this Government to look to every important fact and circumstance on which a sound opinion could be formed, which has been done. When we regard, then, the great length of time which this war has been prosecuted, the complete success which has attended it in favor of the provinces, the present condition of the parties, and the utter inability of Spain to produce any change in it, we are compelled to conclude that its fate is settled, and that the provinces which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognized.

Of the views of the Spanish Government on this subject, no particular information has been recently received. It may be presumed that the successful progress of the revolution, through such a long series of years, gaining strength, and extending annually in every direction, and embracing, by the late important events, with little exception, all the dominions of Spain south of the United States, on the continent, placing thereby the complete sovereignty over the whole in the hands of the people, will reconcile the parent country to an accommodation with them, on the basis of their unqualified independence. Nor has any authentic information been recently received of the disposition of other powers respecting it. A sincere desire has been cherished to act in concert with them in the proposed recognition, of which several were some time past duly apprised, but it was understood that they were not prepared for it. The immense space between those powers, even those which border on the Atlantic, and these provinces, makes the movement an affair of less interest and excitement to them than to us. It is probable, therefore, that they have been less attentive to its progress than we have been. It may be presumed, however, that the late events will dispel all doubt of the result.

In proposing this measure, it is not contemplated to change thereby, in the slightest manner, our friendly relations with either of the parties, but to observe, in all respects, as heretofore, should the war be continued, the most perfect neutrality between them. Of this friendly disposition, an assurance will be given to the Government of Spain, to whom it is presumed it will be, as it ought to be, satisfactory. The measure is proposed, under a thorough conviction that it is in strict accord with the law of nations; that it is just and right as to the parties; and that the United States owe it to their station and character in the world, as well as to their essential interests, to adopt it. Bank of the United States—Officers to sign Notes.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the following bill to amend the charter of the Bank of the United States:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the directors of the Bank of the United States to appoint an agent and a register; and that all bills and notes of the said corporation, issued after the first appointment of such agent and register, shall be signed by the agent and countersigned by the register; that such bills and notes shall have the like force and effect as the bills and notes of the said corporation which are now signed by the president and countersigned by the cashier thereof; and that, as often as an agent or register of the said corporation shall be appointed, no note or bill signed by an agent or countersigned by a register, shall be issued until public notice of the appointment of such agent or register shall have been previously given, for ten days, in two gazettes printed at the city of Washington.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any president, director, cashier, or other officer, or servant, of the Bank of the United States, or of any of its offices, shall fraudulently convert to his own use any money, bill, note, security for money, evidence of debt, or other effects whatever, belonging to the said Bank, such persons shall, upon due conviction, be punished by imprisonment, not exceeding — years, and by fine, not exceeding — dollars; either, or both, of said punishments, according to the aggravation of the offence.

On taking up the bill this morning, Mr. TALBOT moved its indefinite postponement.

On this motion and those which followed, a debate took place which occupied the Senate till near four o'clock.

The motion to postpone the bill indefinitely was finally lost by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Brown of Ohio, Chandler, Lanman, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, and Williams of Tennessee—11.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Benton, Boardman, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Eaton, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lloyd, Lowrie, Mills, Morrill, Otis, Parrott, Pleasants, Seymour, Southard, Stokes, Van Dyke, Walker, Ware, and Williams of Mississippi—29.

Mr. PLEASANTS then moved to strike out the 2d section of the bill; and after some debate, this motion was also lost, by the casting vote of the Chairman, (Mr. DICKERSON), the votes being 19 for, and 19 against, the motion.

Mr. EATON moved an amendment to the 2d section, providing that "the court before whom the conviction shall take place, shall have power to enter a judgment against the party for the amount or value of the thing so fraudulently converted," &c.

The question was not taken on this amendment when the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, March 14.

Bank of the United States.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the charter of the Bank of the United States. Mr. HOLMES having withdrawn the amendment offered by him, and pending yesterday when the Senate adjourned—

Mr. BARBOUR moved to strike out the first section of the bill, amended, as follows:

"That it shall be lawful for the directors of the Bank of the United States to appoint an agent and a register to reside at Philadelphia; and that all bills and notes of the said corporation, issued after the first appointment of such agent and register, shall be signed by the agent, and countersigned by the register; that such bills and notes shall have the like force and effect as the bills and notes of the said corporation which are now signed by the president and countersigned by the cashier thereof; and that, as often as an agent or register of the said corporation shall be appointed, no note or bill signed by an agent or countersigned by a register, shall be issued, until public notice of the appointment of such agent or register shall have been previously given, for ten days, in two gazettes printed at the city of Washington: Provided, nevertheless, That all such notes issued by said bank, of and under ten dollars, shall be payable at the principal bank, or at any of the branches of said bank."

After considerable discussion, the question was taken on the motion to strike out the first section, and was determined in the affirmative—yeas, 23, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Brown of Ohio, Chandler, D'Wolf, Eaton, Holmes of Mississippi, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd, Macon, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Van Dyke, and Williams of Mississippi.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Brown of Louisiana, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Holmes of Maine, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lowrie, Morrill, Noble, Southard, Stokes, Walker, Ware, and Williams of Tennessee.

The remaining section was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, by yeas and nays—27 to 13.

FRIDAY, March 15.

Restrictive System.

Mr. KING, of New York, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which had been referred a memorial from South Carolina and one from Baltimore, praying a repeal of the restrictions on the West India trade, made a report vindicating at considerable length the expediency and policy of the restrictive system, as regards the trade with the British West Indies, and recommending that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the memorial of R. Appleby and others, of the Colleton district, South Carolina, and the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Baltimore, praying for the repeal of the laws closing the ports of the United States against British vessels employed in the trade between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies, report:

That, referring to the period between the completion of the Revolution and the adoption of the constitution, it cannot be doubted that the embarrassments of the agriculture, trade, and navigation of the several States were truly ascribed to the want of power in Congress to make adequate laws for their encouragement and protection; and no motive in favor of the adoption of the constitution, was more strongly or more generally felt than the opinion that the vesting of power in Congress to regulate trade, would serve to promote the welfare and prosperity of the Union.

The new Government, under the constitution, very soon experienced the influence created by the extraordinary changes that were taking place in France, and which, in the sequel, engaged all Europe in arms.

War between the great maritime powers invariably produces temporary relaxations of their laws respecting the trade and navigation of foreign nations with their respective territories. The suspension of these laws, and especially of such of them as regulated the colonial trade, had the effect of giving to the agriculture, trade, and navigation of the United States, the advantages which would have been given to them by a system of free trade, that should have for its basis the equal and reciprocal benefits of all nations.

The condition of neutrality that was adopted by the United States during the wars of the French revolution, secured to every commercial nation benefits which a peaceable and industrious people are able to afford during periods of great public calamity; and our example during these wars has served to prove that justice is the most profitable as well as the wisest policy of nations.

Since the establishment of the general peace, some of the maritime nations, notwithstanding the doubts that have been raised in regard to the truth of the former theories of trade, have returned to and resumed their ancient commercial policy; and, in consequence thereof, the United States have, in their own defence, been obliged to resort to the exercise of the powers to regulate trade vested in Congress for the purpose of protecting and cherishing the industry and navigation of the States.

Great moderation has been observed by the United States on this subject, and persevering endeavors have been made to adjust, by treaty, their commercial intercourse with foreign nations, and especially with England.

So far as respects the English territories in Europe and in Asia, the intercourse is arranged by the treaty of 1815; but this treaty contains no provision concerning the navigation and trade between the United States and the English colonies in the West Indies and North America. The value of this branch of trade, and the importance of the navigation employed in the same, have been long understood by both parties, and the actual embarrassment thereof, which now exists, cannot be ascribed to the want of a disposition on the part of the United States to have placed the same on a fair and friendly footing; but it continues to be insisted on by England, that not only the colonial trade, but the trade between the United States and these colonies, ought to be considered and regulated as a monopoly, that foreign nations are bound to respect, and with which they may not interfere.

The act, commonly called the navigation act of England, while it reserves the colonial navigation exclusively to the vessels of England and her colonies, opens the trade between England and foreign nations to the vessels of both, subject to equal and the same regulations.

The colonial, like the coasting trade, has been treated as a monopoly, so long as the same was confined to the navigation between territories of the same nation; but, whenever it may suit the convenience of a nation to open a trade between her colonies and a foreign nation, the claim to treat this trade as a monopoly is without just authority, being contrary to the rights of such foreign nation, which, within its own dominions, must possess authority to make such regulations as may be deemed expedient.

It is an unwarrantable extension of national monopolies, by ex parte laws, to attempt to include the navigation of a foreign nation within the rules by which the navigation between portions of the same nation is governed. If this may be done between the colonies and a foreign nation, it may also be done in respect to the navigation between any other portion, or the whole of the territories of such nation and foreign nations.

England allows the importation of lumber and breadstuffs from the United States into the colony of Jamaica, but forbids the same, unless the importation be made in English vessels; she also allows the importation of cotton and tobacco from the United States into England, but with equal right she may forbid the same, unless the importations be made in English vessels. This has not been done in the latter case, and there would be but one sentiment in the United States, should it be attempted; yet, in the former case, this is, and has been the law ever since the date of our independence, and it may, with equal right, be applied to Liverpool as to Jamaica.

After long endurance and fruitless efforts to adjust this question by treaty, Congress, with great unanimity, have passed laws to countervail the restrictions imposed by England upon the intercourse between the United States and her colonies in the West Indies.

England having forbidden the importation of supplies from the United States into the West India colonies in American vessels, the United States in their turn have forbidden the exportation of these supplies in British vessels: the two restrictions have put an end to the direct intercourse, and the trade is carried on indirectly; the supplies for these colonies being carried in American vessels from the United States to the Swedish and Danish Islands, and the produce of the English West Indies being brought in English vessels to the same islands, and there exchanged for the provisions and lumber of the United States. American supplies are also sent in American vessels to the free port of Bermuda, and there sold for cash; and flour in like manner is sent from the United States to the Island of Cuba, as well as to the port of Liverpool, and from these places carried in English vessels to Jamaica and other English colonies in the West Indies. In this condition of our navigation and trade, our tonnage continues annually to increase, and the value of our exports exceeds that of our imports.

In countries of great extent, and whose productions are various, though the people are generally employed in similar occupations, new regulations may, for a time, affect some portions of the country more than others; but every portion soon accommodates itself to the new regulation, and the advantages and disadvantages are, in a short time, certain to be equalized by the entire freedom with which every branch of industry is prosecuted.

It was on account of this diversity of products, and of the different manner of doing business in the several States, that jealousies formerly existed between them, which defeated every attempt to establish any common regulation of trade under the Confederation—the want of American tonnage sufficient to create the requisite competition in the exports of the country, added to the difficulties of this period.

But as the national tonnage is now fully sufficient for the national exports, and as Congress have offered to all nations a system of entire equality and freedom in the commercial intercourse between them and the United States, the time has come in which it has been thought to be due to the welfare and character of the United States to countervail the regulations, which so long, and so much to our disadvantage, have been imposed by England on the trade and navigation between the United States and her West India colonies.

This national measure, so long called for to protect the ships and seamen of the United States, was calculated to awaken the remnant of local jealousy that may still exist among us, against the influence of which we may with confidence appeal to the character and necessity of the law.

By the exclusion of English vessels, American vessels are employed in their place, and whatever is lost to the former is gained by the latter. By revoking the countervailing laws, we take away the profits now enjoyed by American vessels, and give them back again to the vessels of England, and, in doing so, grant a bounty to foreign ships at the expense of our own.

Navigation and maritime industry, for a peculiar reason, call for national protection: for the art of navigation is an expedient of war, as well as of commerce; and, in this respect, differs from every other branch of industry. Though it was once doubted, doubt no longer exists, that a navy is the best defence of the United States—and this maxim is not more true than that a naval power never has existed, and can never exist, without a commercial marine; hence, the policy of encouraging and protecting the ships and seamen of the United States.

In the commercial differences which arise between nations, the various branches of industry are differently affected, and calculations, founded on the supposed interest of either party, being often fallacious, may prove to be uncertain guides in the policy of nations, while, by referring every question of disagreement to the honor of the nation, in the purity and preservation of which every one is alike concerned, a standard is provided that can never mislead.

In the least as well as the most difficult disputes, national honor is the safest counsellor—and it should not be forgotten that public injuries long endured invite further aggression, and, in the end, degrade and destroy the pride and safety of nations.

In respect to the commercial difference which has so long existed between the United States and England, the claim of the latter exclusively to regulate the intercourse and navigation between the United States and her West India colonies, has affected the reputation and rights of the United States, and the public honor justifies the countervailing measures adopted on this subject; to recede from the same would be equivalent to their final relinquishment, and would not fail to encourage the belief that a wrong so long endured would no longer be opposed, and that further aggression might be made without resistance.

It must be always remembered, that the countervailing measures which have been adopted by Congress, are entirely defensive; and, as we desire to concur in the establishment of a free trade with every nation, we are ready to abandon the restrictions on the English navigation, as soon as England manifests a disposition to give up the restrictions which she was the first to impose on our navigation—and does public policy require, or will the national honor permit, that we should do so sooner? With these views, the committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of R. Appleby and others, of Colleton District, South Carolina, and of the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Baltimore, praying for the repeal of the laws imposing restrictions on English vessels employed in the trade between the United States and the English colonies in the West Indies.

MONDAY, March 18.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of the Mayor and Aldermen of St. Augustine, praying the donation to that city of certain squares and lots in said city, made a report unfavorable thereto, which was read.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which the subject was referred by a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, reported a bill to prevent war among the Indian tribes within the territorial limits of the United States. The bill was read, and passed to the second reading. The bill is as follows:

A bill to prevent war among the Indian tribes within the territorial limits of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized to take such measures as he may deem expedient and proper to prevent war among the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States, by employing the military force, or otherwise.

Land Titles in Missouri.

The Senate resumed, agreeably to the order of the day, the bill to enable the holders of incomplete French and Spanish titles to lands within that part of the late province of Louisiana which is now comprised within the limits of the State of Missouri, to institute proceedings to try the validity thereof, and to obtain complete titles for the same when found to be valid.

[The bill proposes to make the United States federal court, in the State of Missouri, a tribunal for examining into the validity of these titles, and to confirm them, when found to be valid, to the same extent that they would have been confirmed under the French and Spanish Governments, if their sovereignty had continued over the province of Louisiana.]

Mr. BENTON, in support of the bill, said, that he would undertake to show the mode and terms of conceding lands, under the French and Spanish Governments, in Louisiana; that lands, in point of fact, were there conceded according to this mode, and upon these terms; that many of these concessions were in an incomplete state on the day of the transfer of the province to the United States, but valid on that day against France and Spain, and in consequence valid to the same extent against the United States; that the United States has not yet provided by law for completing these titles, and that it is now her duty to do so.

Mr. B. went on to support the several positions which he had taken.

1. As to the mode and terms. He said that it required the concurrence of two authorities to concede the Crown lands in Spanish America—a local authority which originated the title, and a superior authority which confirmed it. The first was called a sub-delegate, and always resided in the province where the conceded land was situated; the second was for a long time the King, in person, at Madrid. The authority of the sub-delegate extended to three points—making the concession, fixing the terms of it, and ordering the survey. The superior authority issued the patent when the survey was returned, and it entertained appeals in behalf of the subject on every decision made by the sub-delegate.

This continued to be the mode until the year 1754. In that year a royal ordinance was promulgated upon the subject of granting the Crown lands, of the greatest moment to the inhabitants of Spanish America, and which had continued in force ever since. The entire ordinance might now be seen in the Department of State, in a book entitled "Leyes de la Recopilacion de Indias," and is the eighty-first article, and the one referred to by Morales. It emanated from Ferdinand VI., a prince known to history by the name of Ferdinand the Wise—a title, said Mr. B., above that for which his great grandfather, Louis

XIV., had labored so much in vain, and which Ferdinand acquired by putting an end to the wars which had descended upon him with his crown; by relieving his subjects from their taxes; by reclaiming the banditti from the mountains, and restoring them to the fields; by opening the dungeons of the Inquisition, and turning out the victims; by encouraging agriculture and commerce at home, and extending the care of his parental Government to the people of the New World.

The ordinance recited that experience had shown the injuries which had resulted to the King and the subject from the necessity of applying at Madrid for the confirmation of land titles; that many had omitted to profit by the royal bounty, because unable to defray the expenses of this application; that those who did apply paid more to get the confirmation than the land itself had cost; that, in consequence, people seated themselves on the Crown lands without titles, and without improving them, because they expected to be denounced and criminally pursued for the trespass;—the effect of all which was, that large districts remained without fixed inhabitants, without cultivation, and without cattle; to the injury of the King's service, and to the prejudice of adjoining provinces.

Such, said Mr. B., were the wise recitals of the ordinance of 1754. The enactments flowed directly from them. They ordained that the confirming as well as the originating authority should be local—the latter continuing to be the sub-delegates, the former being vested in the supreme courts, called Audiences, established by Charles V., in the vice-regal kingdoms of the New World.

But the beneficence of the King did not stop here. There were provinces remote from the seats of the Audiences, or separated from them by the sea—as Yucatan, Carthagen, Puerto Rico, Panama, Oumana, Havana, and others—in which it would be inconvenient to the people to go to the Audiences to obtain patents. In all these, as in others in like circumstances, it was expressly ordained, that the governors of the provinces should exercise the same powers, within their province, which the Audiences exercised in the vice-regal kingdoms. These powers extended to the appointment of sub-delegates, to the issuing of patents, and to the revision of the acts of the sub-delegates, by way of appeal; for which purpose the sub-delegate was bound to send up, free of cost, to the party, the circumstances of the case, in the form of a question proposed, (en consulta), to the end, as the ordinance declares, that no one should be induced, through fear of expense, to abandon his right.

Mr. B. said that Louisiana was not mentioned in the ordinance of 1754, nor could be, because not ceded to Spain till the year 1762, nor occupied by her until 1769. But, when acquired, she was in equal circumstances with those named, and the ordinance attached to her, and was practised upon by the first Governor, O'Reilly, from the first year of his administration, and by all his successors, up to the year 1799, when this branch of his authority was transferred, by a decree of Charles IV., to the Intendants General. Morales was the only Intendant General who undertook to exercise this authority. He published a set of regulations adverse to the interest of the province and to the spirit of the ordinance of 1754, for which he was remonstrated against by the cabildo of New Orleans, and dismissed by the King. The Lieutenant Governors of Upper Louisiana were sub-delegates, by virtue of their office, both under the Governors-General of Louisiana and the Intendant, Morales, and in that capacity they conceded their lands, fixed the terms of the concession, and ordered the survey, from the time that St. Ange, the first Spanish Lieutenant-Governor, arrived at St. Louis, in 1770, until the 10th day of March, 1804, when Don Carlos Delassus, the last of the Lieutenant-Governors, transferred the province to Major Stoddart, the first commandant of Upper Louisiana under the authority of the United States.

Mr. B. said that he had now stated the outline of the regular mode of making the ordinary concessions for land in Spanish America. Extraordinary grants commenced differently; they issued directly and in the first instance either from the confirming authority or from the King himself; the sub-delegates seldom originated them; the feeling of subordination being too intense in a despotic government to permit the inferior to venture upon the slightest exercise of a doubtful authority.

Having shown the mode of conceding lands, Mr. B. proceeded to state the terms upon which concessions were made.

He said that the Kings of Spain had acquired the two Americas on cheap terms, and were able to part with their lands in the same way. He had read, in acts of Congress, the expression, "Extinguish Indian titles," applied to the Spanish government in upper Louisiana. The expression, he said, was borrowed from our own practice, not from theirs. The Spanish Kings held no treaties to extinguish Indian titles; no such thing as a boundary line was established between Spanish and Indian lands. The Pope, Alexander VI., made a free gift of the New World and all its inhabitants to Ferdinand and Isabella, and the swords of Cortez and Pizarro made good the grant. Lands acquired so easily, for a long time had no value, and no one would accept them as a gift, except for the mines of gold or silver which they contained, or for the Indians who lived upon them, and who became slaves.

In the course of one or two centuries, the terms, as well as the mode, of conceding lands, settled down upon fixed principles, and received their latest improvement in the ordinance of 1754.

The concessions were made upon different considerations. First—by sales, properly so called. The Spanish word is "ventas," and obviously implies a sale for money. The second, by arrangement or composition. The Spanish word is "composiciones," and implies a consideration of some sort; but a consideration opposed to the idea of a quid pro quo in money; as public services in a military or civil capacity rendered to the King, or advantages redounding to the benefit of the province, by promoting its population, encouraging the cultivation of the ground, rearing of cattle, opening roads, building mills, exploring mines, &c. The third, by gifts. The Spanish word is, "Repartimientos," derived from the verb repartir, to divide. The noun, repartimiento, is the word used in the early history of Mexico and Peru, and signifies the respective portions of lands, and Indiana, and gold and silver mines, which fell to the shares of the first conquerors, when the spoil of the New World was divided out among them. Mr. B. said he had also been informed that the same word was used in Spain in testamentary devises, and imported the partition which a father makes of his estate among his children. He said that a still stronger word than this was used in the ordinance of 1754, the word "mercedes," which signifies "gracious gifts." The words of the ordinance are—"He resuelto que en las mercedes, ventas y composiciones de realengos, sitios y valdios, hechas al presente, y que se hicieren en adelante, se observe y practique precisamente lo contenido en esta instruccion.—El Rey." In English: "I have resolved that, in the gracious gifts, sales and compositions of the royal lands, places, and wastes, heretofore made, and which shall be made hereafter, shall be observed and followed precisely the tenor of this decree.—The King."

Mr. B. apologized to the Senate for going so much at large into these two points. He was induced to do so, because he saw an idea prevailing that valuable considerations were necessary to the validity of Spanish concessions. He hoped he had said enough to show that besides a sale for money, the Crown lands of Spain in the New World might be compounded for services or public advantages, and divided gratuitously among the King's subjects, as a father divides his estate among his children, and that these principles extended to the province of Upper Louisiana, now the State of Missouri, and governed the concessions there made, and for the examination and decision of which this bill is intended to provide.

Mr. B. proceeded to show that lands, in point of fact, were actually conceded in Upper Louisiana according to the mode and upon the terms which he had stated.

He read from Stoddart's Sketches of Louisiana, page 245, to prove that the quantity of 1,721,498 arpens (equal to 1,468,388 acres) had been conceded before the transfer of the province, and duly registered under the acts of Congress requiring the registration of incomplete titles; of which 868,771 arpens had been surveyed before the day of the transfer, (10th of March, 1804,) and that 852,722 arpens were unsurveyed on that day. He enforced the remark of the historian, that the quantity was incredibly small considering the magnitude of the province, the number of its population, and the length of time it had been settled.

Mr. B. here exhibited to the Senate a great number of petitions, with the original concessions attached to them. He said that the owners of these concessions had sent them so great a distance, with so much peril of being lost, for the inspection of the members of Congress, and to confront the insinuation of fraud and forgery, which they believed some agent of mischief had made against them. He showed that the concessions had been made by the Lieutenant Governors in their characters of sub-delegates, who had fixed the terms and conditions in the decree of concession, and ordered the survey. He admitted that none of the Crown lands had been sold for money in Upper Louisiana. He had never heard of such a sale. The considerations were in the way of public services and advantages; as, rewarding civil and military officers for meritorious services, raising wheat and rearing cattle for the supply of the Lower Mississippi, opening lead mines for the supply of the King's armies, and growing hemp for the supply of his ships. But the great consideration was to populate the country, as without people these articles could not be raised, nor the province defended against an enemy. The population of Upper Louisiana had proceeded with the slow pace which has always attended the settlement of a European colony. Though settled so long before Kentucky, as late as the year 1788, Upper Louisiana contained but a few inconsiderable villages, and no more than 6,400 arpens of land (5,440 acres) had been conceded and surveyed in the whole province. Mr. B. took the year 1788, because at that time Kentucky was pouring her produce upon New Orleans, and the Spanish authorities there began naturally to inquire of themselves if they could not procure the same articles from their own province in the neighborhood of Kentucky? The answer was obvious; but it required a statesman of the school of the Sullys and Colberts to accomplish the object. That statesman appeared in the person of the Baron de Carondelet. He held out the powerful inducement of lands to be given without taxes, and a market at New Orleans for all their productions.

In 1796, the reasons became stronger for populating this province. It became necessary to defend it. Spain, as the ally of the French Republic, was then at war with England, and their subjects waged against each other throughout the four quarters of the globe "the unprofitable contest" of trying which could do the other the greatest harm. Upper Louisiana was open to invasion from Canada upon the line of Lake Michigan and the Illinois River. It had been so invaded in the year 1780, when Spain, as the ally of the thirteen United States, was obnoxious in all her dominions to the attacks of the English arms. The riflemen of the West then saved St. Louis, and to them the Baron de Carondelet looked again when menaced by the same foe in 1796. Mr. B. stopped a moment to speak of an exploit too little known to history. He said that the British and Indians, to the number of 1,600, appeared before St. Louis in the year 1780. General George Rogers Clark was then upon the American bottom with the conquerors of Vincennes and Kaskaskia. The French of St. Louis sent to invoke his aid. He had but 400 men, and might have declined with honor. He might have said, our numbers are too few, the river is too wide and rapid; you are strangers, and live beyond the confines of my country; you may be in collusion with the enemy to draw me across the Mississippi, and to revenge in Louisiana the defeat of your countrymen in Illinois. But such was not the language of General Clark, nor of the 400 brave men that followed his steps. He or they knew not danger. Knew it not! May their spirits pardon me, said Mr. B., for applying to them such a fourth of July-day expression. They did know danger—were born in its presence, and grew up in its company; and each could say with Cæsar—

"Danger and I are brothers,
Twin lions whelped in one hour,
And I the elder and more terrible."

They were the riflemen of the West, and took counsel, not from danger, but from honor and courage. They divided into two bodies, and marched to the relief of St. Louis. Two hundred presented themselves opposite the town, and two hundred crossed the river below. At the sight of such boldness, the British and Indians, believing them to be the vanguard of a great army, suddenly retired, after killing eighty of the inhabitants, and leaving an impression of terror which still marks that year as an epoch of calamity; "l'année du coup." History, continued Mr. B., tells of the passage of the Rhone and Granicus; but here is the passage of a river unknown to history, yet surpassing the exploit of Hannibal and Alexander as much in heroism and magnanimity as the Father of Floods surpasses in magnitude the puny stream of Gaul and of Asia Minor.

In 1796 the same danger again menaced Upper Louisiana; the Baron de Carondelet looked to the same relief, the riflemen of the West: lands were gratuitously given them, free of taxes, and Kentucky and Tennessee poured their earliest settlers across the Mississippi. The celebrated Colonel Boone went at that time. Emigrants were also drawn from every part of the United States; and not only they, but the European French, flying from the storms of the Revolution, the inhabitants of St. Domingo escaping from massacre and conflagration, the Irish retiring from the calamities of their country, all found refuge in Upper Louisiana, and received gratuitous grants of lands from the Spanish Government. Mr. B.

Missouri Land Titles.

stated that it was at this period (the close of the last century) that Upper Louisiana gained two-thirds of its whole population; it was then that the chief part of the concessions were made; and the United States had reached the benefit of the Baron de Carondelet's policy; for she purchased the province immediately after, and in the war of 1812 these very people defended Missouri for her against British and Indians, (although the most exposed point in the Union,) without the aid of regular troops, without fortifications, and without calling militia draughts and volunteers from the neighboring States. And now these people, in company with the old inhabitants of the country, appear at your bar, and ask you to confirm to them the lands which were conceded to them by the authority of the King of Spain.

Mr. B. proceeded to show, that many of these concessions were incomplete on the day of the transfer of Upper Louisiana to the United States, but valid on that day against France and Spain, and, by consequence, valid to the same extent against the United States.

He stated that all concessions were termed incomplete, even though surveyed, until confirmed by the Governor General or Intendant at New Orleans, and a patent issued by them. He said it might readily be supposed that the greater part of these concessions were incomplete, when it is seen that they were made so near the close of the Spanish government; that such was the fact, he read from Stoddart's Sketches, page 245, to show that not one-twentieth of the whole quantity were complete. Even in Lower Louisiana, so much longer settled, so much nearer to the confirming authority, he showed that not one-fourth part of the conceded lands were held by complete titles at the time of the transfer of the province.

These incomplete titles were, nevertheless, considered and treated as property by the Spanish laws, and respected as such by the Spanish authorities. In support of this assertion, Mr. B. read from Stoddart's Sketches of Louisiana, page 245, and from a note which he had taken from a document filed by order of Mr. Jefferson, in the Department of State, relative to Louisiana, and which, on the subject of land titles, says: "Perhaps not one-fourth part of the lands granted in Louisiana are held by complete titles. Not a small part is held by occupancy, with a simple verbal permission of a colonial officer. A practice which has been always countenanced by the Spanish Government, in order that poor men, when they found themselves a little at their ease, might, at their own convenience, apply for and obtain complete titles. In the mean time such imperfect rights were suffered by the Government to descend by inheritance, and even to be transferred by private contract."

Mr. B. hoped that these quotations were conclusive on the two points that there were incomplete titles in Upper Louisiana on the day of the transfer of the province (10th March, 1804) to the United States, and that these inchoate rights were property in the eye of the Spanish law. These points being established, it followed, of course, that the titles in question were protected by the third article of the treaty of 1803, which secures to the people of Louisiana the free enjoyment of their religion, liberty, and property. He said that the Treaty of San Ildefonso contained an equivalent or stronger stipulation. That treaty had not been published, but its contents, in this particular, were made known officially in the proclamation of the Marquis de Casa Calvo and General Salcedo, Commissioners on the part of His Catholic Majesty for delivering Louisiana to the Commissioners of the French Republic.

Mr. B. proceeded to support his fourth and last proposition—that the United States had not yet provided by law for completing these titles, and that it was her duty now to do so.

The first act of Congress on this subject was passed on the 26th of March, 1804, sixteen days after the change of flags in Upper Louisiana. It declared the concessions and survey made after the Treaty of San Ildefonso, to be null and void; forbid future surveys; and denounced a penalty of fine and imprisonment against any person attempting to survey or to settle on public lands.

The first part of this act was in violation of the laws of nations, which admit the ordinary acts of sovereignty, done in good faith by the sovereign de facto, to be good and valid. But it was not necessary to argue the point, because it had been conceded by every subsequent act of Congress, in relation to both Upper and Lower Louisiana.

Several acts of Congress, afterwards passed, establishing boards of commissioners, with authority to confirm small tracts to actual settlers, and one, in 1807, which authorized the confirmation of tracts to the extent of 2,000 arpens, where there had been an actual possession for ten consecutive years. But the act of the most enlarged and liberal provisions, passed in 1814, authorizing the board of commissioners to confirm to the extent of one league square, (7,056 arpens, equal to 6,002 acres,) if conceded and surveyed before the 10th day of March, 1804. This act would nearly have settled the land claims of Missouri, if it had made a provision for the unsurveyed claims. But no provision was made for these, and the penalty against surveying remained in full force. By the laws of Spain, no time was limited for making the survey; no forfeiture accrued for not making it within any given time; it was left to the convenience of the party. Mr. B. read various passages from Stoddart's Sketches, in proof of this assertion. He said that no forfeiture had yet accrued under any law of the United States, for not one instant of time had ever been allowed for making surveys; on the contrary, the act of 26th March, 1804, stopped the surveys then in progress, and nullified many already made. The claims now in question were principally of the unsurveyed class, but this class included many actually surveyed before the 10th of March, but not returned to the Surveyor-General's office until after that day, and many others, surveyed in the Spring of 1804, before the act against surveying was known in Missouri.

Mr. B. then showed what provision Congress had made for the claims in question. By an act of 1805, they were required to be registered with the recorder of land titles, an office created by Congress, and to pay him twelve and a half cents for every hundred words of the registration. By an act of 1821, every claim so registered, is reserved from public sale, until the decision of Congress shall be made thereon. No decision has yet been made; no law has been passed by virtue of which their validity can be tried. In the mean time, these claims, so far as they have been de facto surveyed or located, are treated as property by the laws of Missouri, under the terms of the treaty of 1803. They are subject to taxation, to be sold on execution, to descend by inheritance, and to be transferred by sale.

Mr. B. expressed an earnest belief that he had made out a clear right to the relief which the bill contemplated. He believed that almost the whole of the claims embraced in it—he would not say every one, for he would not commit himself upon a declaration beyond his knowledge—but he believed that the body of the claims were valid, and such as would have been confirmed by the Spanish authorities without delay, and without expense. The United States, successor as well to the duties as to the rights of Spain, was bound to do the same thing. Eighteen years had elapsed since this duty had accrued; eleven since Congress pledged herself to decide them; four since the Secretary of the Treasury, under a resolution of the House of Representatives, had reported the same bill, in principle, which is now under discussion; fifty days since the bill had laid upon our tables, and no decision yet. "Hope, deferred," said Mr. B., "maketh the heart sick;" and if the decision of these claims is deferred much longer, the hearts of these claimants must be "sick unto death."

Mr. NOBLE was unwilling to grant six hundred and forty acres of land to the petitioner in addition to a pension of twelve dollars a month, which he had received since 1818; and because the men who accompanied Lewis and Clark were better rewarded than the soldiers who fought the battles of the country. He moved the indefinite postponement of the bill.

FRIDAY, March 22.

Case of George Shannon, one of Lewis and Clark's Men, in the Expedition to the Mouth of the Columbia.

[Yesterday, after the Senate had concluded the consideration of Executive business—

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, rose and stated that official duties had obliged him to transact some business at the public offices, and he was very much surprised to find that the bill granting to George Shannon a section of land, had been taken up in his absence and indefinitely postponed, contrary to the usual course and courtesy of this body, without giving an opportunity to the member who introduced the proposition to vindicate its merits. He had been charged with the memorial of Mr. Shannon, who was a distinguished citizen of Kentucky, who had performed distinguished services to his country, and now asked for a just reward for the personal sacrifices which he had made, and the sufferings which he had endured, for his country. Mr. J. said that Mr. Shannon had served the respectable county of Fayette several years in the Legislature of Kentucky—that, for his age, he was a promising and a distinguished individual, and he could not reconcile it to his feelings that the bill for his relief should be disposed of while he had been attending to official duties elsewhere—that Mr. Shannon was a high-minded, honorable man, and had been urged, by his friends, to present to the National Legislature his just claims for consideration—that, independent of his sacrifices and sufferings, his liberal disposition, and his patriotic devotion to his country, had kept him in indigent circumstances, with a large growing family to provide for. Mr. J. hoped, under these circumstances, that the Senate would reconsider the question, and place it in statu quo, that he might, on a proper occasion, present his views to the Senate.

The vote was taken on reconsideration, and carried, and the bill was then laid upon the table.]

*Indian Factory System.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill "to abolish the United States trading establishment with the Indian tribes, and to provide for opening the trade to licensed individuals," the question being on agreeing to certain amendments offered by Mr. BENTON to the bill when it was under consideration on Thursday last; which in substance provide for abolishing and bringing to a close the concerns of the present trading establishment, by persons to be specially appointed to that duty by the President of the United States, instead of the present superintendent and factors, as proposed by the bill; or, in other words, to take the winding up of affairs of the establishment out of the hands of the present officers.

* It may be well to remind the reader that, up to this time, the United States kept up trading establishments by factors, as well as a species of diplomatic intercourse by agents. The former were abolished by the act of this session; the latter continues.

Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, in support of the amendment, said, that the factory system grew out of a national calamity, and had been one itself. It grew out of the third article of Mr. Jay's treaty—that article which gave the British the right to navigate the Mississippi, and to trade with Indians within the limits of the United States; privileges to which we have been chiefly indebted for our subsequent Indian wars. The statesmen of that day had their eye to this consequence, and undertook to avert, by policy, the danger which they had incurred by treaty. Trade, they knew, governed all people, civilized or barbarian. They had recourse to trade, therefore, to gain the good will of the Indians, and to counteract the influence of the British. They apprehended that private traders had not capital or strength to accomplish these objects, and national trading houses were resolved upon. The factory system was established, and went into operation simultaneously with the surrender of the Western posts—the Summer of 1796.

The capital first invested was $150,000, and the annual sum of $8,000 was appropriated for the pay of the superintendent and factors. These sums were afterwards increased by successive acts of Congress, the former to $300,000 and the latter to $19,250; in the whole about $600,000 has been paid out of the Treasury on these accounts.

The act of 1811 locates the factories. They are to be on the frontiers—in the Indian country—on either side of the Mississippi.

It prescribes the terms of sales. The trade is to be liberal—the prices to be so regulated as to save the capital from diminution.

It defines the duties of the superintendent. He is to purchase and transmit to the factories all the goods intended for the Indian trade—to sell the furs and peltries received from them at different places in the United States at public auction, or otherwise dispose of them as may be most advantageous to the United States. He is to render quarterly returns of his purchases and sales, to the Treasury Department—to give bond in $20,000 with securities, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties, takes an oath to discharge these duties faithfully, and is not to engage in private trade.

It defines the duties of the factors. They are to receive the goods sent them by the superintendent, and dispose of them in trade with the Indian nations—to settle their accounts quarterly at the Treasury—to give bond and security, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties—to take an oath to discharge them faithfully, and are not to engage in private trade.

Under this act, nine factories are now in operation, to wit: one in the State of Mississippi, one on the Red River, beyond the Mississippi, one on the Arkansas, two in the State of Missouri, two on the Upper Mississippi, and two on the western shore of Lake Michigan.

Mr. B. admitted that these factories were located as directed by the act; they were all in the West, and upon the Mississippi River, or convenient to it.

He would now look to the practical operation of this system. He would examine, first, the conduct of the Superintendent in purchasing goods. Second, the conduct of the factors in selling them. Third, the conduct of the superintendent in selling the furs and peltries received from the factors.

Mr. B. said he would undertake to show that, in the discharge of each of these duties, great abuses had been committed. He might be tedious to the Senate, but he would not be diffuse. The subject required precision, and he would observe it. He would be precise in the allegation of misconduct, and equally so in the application of the proof. He would use no proof which had not the moral force of judicial testimony. He would limit himself to two kinds: First, the written statements of Majors John Biddle, O'Fallon, and Bell, and Mr. R. Crooks; the first three Indian agents, the latter a fur trader; the whole known to him, and known to be gentlemen of truth and honor. Their statements were given verbally to the Indian Committee, in the presence of the Superintendent, subject to his cross examination: afterwards reduced to writing by themselves, and again subjected to the examination and remarks of the Superintendent. Second, the written statements of the Superintendent himself, furnished upon interrogatories submitted by the committee. The whole printed by order of the Senate, and now lying on the tables of the members.

On the first head, the conduct of the Superintendent in purchasing goods. Three distinct descriptions of abuse are alleged against him: 1st. In purchasing goods not adapted to the Indian trade. 2d. In purchasing goods of bad quality. 3d. In purchasing at improper places, and at extravagant prices.

In support of the first specification, Mr. B. read from the printed exhibit marked A, furnished by the Superintendent himself, the following descriptions and quantities of goods, purchased at Georgetown, District of Columbia, and transmitted to the factories in the year 1820.

147 yards of silk for	-	-	-	$116 61
286 yards of vestings for	-	-	-	240 41
316 yards cords and velvets for	-	-	-	210 14
50 pieces Nankins for	-	-	-	53 00
20 pieces Leno muslin for	-	-	-	50 00
24 yards of cambric for	-	-	-	7 50
83 lbs. tea (quality not stated) for	-	-	-	88 00
216 pair of stockings for	-	-	-	79 68
8 gross of Jewsharps for	-	-	-	30 16

Mr. B. stopped at this last item to make a remark. Except this, all that he had read, was too evidently unsuited to the Indian trade, to need the slightest illustration; but this eight gross of Jewsharps might admit of a question. He had not seen them enumerated among articles of Indian commerce in Sir Alexander McKenzie's history of the fur trade, nor could he perceive in what manner they could be used efficaciously in expelling British traders from the Northwestern Territories. But the present Superintendent had superadded some objects of a different character; schemes for the amendment of the heads and hearts of the Indians; to improve their moral and intellectual faculties; to draw them from the savage and hunter state, and induct them into the innocent pursuits of civilized life. In the execution of these schemes, the Jewsharps might have their use. They are a musical instrument, and

"Music hath charms to soothe the savage heart."

It had been related of a musician of old, that he even tamed wild beasts, and bent down the tops of trees, and drew a woman out of hell, by the potent charms of music. In modern times it had also been said,

"He that hath not music in his soul,
Is fit for treason, stratagem, and spoil."

Mr. B. said that these instruments did not, in his opinion,

"Discourse very excellent music;"

but that was an affair of taste, and, "De gustibus non est disputandum."

They were certainly an innocent instrument, and on that account had been spared where better had been condemned. He alluded to an ordinance of the city of Hartford, during the late war, against drums and fifes, and which, as he had been told, contained expresse exception in favor of the Jewsharp.

They were innocent, and on that account precisely adapted to the purposes of the Superintendent, in reclaiming the savage from the hunter state. The first state after that, in the road to refined life, is the pastoral, and without music the tawney-colored Corydons and the red-skinned Amaryllises, "recubans sub tegmine fagi," upon the banks of the Missouri and Mississippi, could make no progress in the delightful business of love and sentiment. Even if the factories should be abolished, these harpe might not be lost. They might be "hung upon the willows," and Æolus, as he passes by, might discourse upon them melancholy strains, "soft and sad," adapted to the vicissitudes of human affairs, the death of the factories, and the loss of that innocent age they were intended to introduce.

Mr. B. resumed the reading of the exhibit.

5,088 lbs. sugar, $557 48 } Bought at New Orleans.
3,265 lbs. coffee, 979 50 }

And other articles adapted to a common country store, but unknown to the Indian trade.

He said this proved that articles of an improper kind were purchased for the factories in the year 1820; he would now prove that it was an old business, regularly followed up. He read from the printed document.

Major O'Fallon's Statement.—"About four years since, when I was stationed at Prairie du Chien, the factor received what was called soldier or citizen goods, to the amount of several thousand dollars, none of which was intended for the Indian trade; and it was said, and generally believed, to be a private concern."—Page 8.

Mr. B. then turned to the copies of five or six accounts, also printed, and furnished by Mr. O. as a part of his statement, showing that the factor at Prairie du Chien had sold every article above mentioned, and a great many others, to the white people of that place; among others, to Dixon, Brisbois, and Rolette, all of whom stand publicly charged with carrying arms against the United States during the war, at the head of the Indians.

Mr. B. proceeded to the second head of misconduct in the Superintendent, that of purchasing goods of bad quality. He read from Major Biddle's statement: "The quality of the goods in the factory at Green Bay is generally bad; the blankets, and other articles of wool, particularly so."—Page 1.—Answer to second question.

Mr. B. proceeded to read from the printed documents to show the bad quality of the goods sent to the factories.

Major O'Fallon's Statement.—"I have seen in factories, goods, evidently the remnants of old stores; and a few years since, I received from General Clark, who was then Superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis, a few goods for Indian presents, (furnished him by the factory department,) the most of which was of such inferior quality, that I was ashamed to offer them to the Indians, and have them still on hand."—Page 8.

Major Bell's Statement.—"In the course of the expedition, I was at a Cherokee settlement on the Arkansas; at the house of Webber there was a store, and a number of Indians making considerable purchases; inquired of them why they did not trade at the United States factory not far distant, and the reply was, that they could procure all the articles they wanted at this store, at a less price, and of a better quality than at the factory, and were allowed the same prices for their furs and peltries."—Page 9.

Mr. Crooks's Statement.—"Blankets and other dry goods (in the factories of the Northwest) generally, have been uniformly twenty-five to fifty per cent. inferior to the corresponding articles supplied by individual adventurers. And the factor at Chicago is also of opinion that remnants, or cut pieces of goods, do not answer quite so well as if they had never been unfolded or subjected to retail operations before they reached him."—Page 10.

Mr. B. conceived that this evidence was sufficient to convict the Superintendent of sending goods of inferior and bad quality to the factories. He went on to the third point: purchasing goods at improper places, and at extravagant prices. To show this, he had recourse to the exhibit of purchases for the year 1820, furnished by the Superintendent, as before stated.

One thousand two hundred and seventy-six pounds shot at twelve and a half cents per pound, one hundred and five dollars; bought at Georgetown, District of Columbia, and sent to the western factories.

This was either British or American shot; the friends of the Superintendent might take hold of which horn of the dilemma they pleased: in either case the purchase was a scandalous abuse. Shot was made in any quantity at Herculeaneum, thirty miles below St. Louis, at about two cents above the price of lead, which was five cents a pound in the year 1820, and of a quality so superior to the English, that it readily commanded a cent more in the pound in the New Orleans market. At Herculeaneum there were towers, not made by the hands of man, but of perpendicular rock, from one to three hundred feet high, on the margin of the Mississippi, from the top of which the melted lead was poured, and taken up in shot at the water's edge, and conveyed in boats wheresoever it was wanted. He said it was from this place that the western factories should have been supplied. It would have cost but little more than half the Georgetown price, and saved the cost of carriage across the mountains. But it was the system of these times to make the West purchase from the East. During the late war, Mr. B., as Lieutenant-colonel in the United States Army, had received in Nashville, Tennessee, a consignment of tent-poles and wooden mallets, from Philadelphia. The English had a proverb, "Carry coals to Newcastle;" the Spaniards had another, "Carry water to the sea." The Americans may have theirs also, "Carry wood to Tennessee." ["Carry lead to Missouri," said a Senator.] Mr. B. said he would not say "lead." The word in the document was "shot," and he might be met with a contradiction if he used one for the other, the two articles being so utterly distinct, that their names could not be composed of any letter used in spelling the other.

Mr. B. then read from the document an account of axes, spades, corn-hoes, drawing-knives, nails, frying-pans, saddles, bridles, candle-wick, spurs, gun-locks, saws, bed-cords, tools, curtain and finger rings, shoes, kettles, tin pans, tin cups, crockery wares, sad irons, horse and cow bells, chisels, augers, locks, 19,000 yards domestic cottons, &c., bought at Georgetown, at high prices, from a select few, whose names regularly recurred on every page, when the greater part of the same articles could have been purchased at Pittsburg for less price, and entire saving of the land carriage.

He spoke next to this item of the carriage.

The Superintendent, in answer to an interrogatory, stated the minimum cost from Georgetown to St. Louis at four and one-half cents per pound; the maximum, at nine cents. St. Louis was taken as a central point on the Mississippi, where a transport agent was stationed, and warehouses kept for the reception of goods, furs, &c., on their transit, and through which a moiety, perhaps, of the whole quantity annually passed.

Mr. B. was constrained to believe that the carriage of these goods had cost more than the sum stated. His belief was founded, not upon the document now furnished by the Superintendent, but upon one furnished by him at the last session of Congress, and bound up in volume eleven of the State papers, No. 47.

He opened the book, and showed an exhibit: One column contained a statement of the amount of merchandise sent by the Superintendent to the factories, from the year 1811 to the year 1820, amounting to $466,874. The next column showed the cost of transporting the same, amounting to 110,548. The next column showed the contingencies attending this transportation, (the particulars not stated,) amounting to 20,728.

From this document, it would seem that nearly one-third of the value of the goods was consumed in getting them carried to the places of sale! Mr. B. said he knew that he was tiring the Senate; but it was necessary to be minute and particular. The question was to abolish a system conceived by eminent statesmen for valuable purposes, which had stood for twenty-seven years; and which question, in its progress, involves the conduct of respectable men, not as an object, but as a consequence of the inquiry.

Having finished the examination of the Superintendent's purchases, the next inquiry was into the conduct of the factors, in making their sales. In performing this duty, they were bound to sell to the Indians—to sell on liberal terms—to sell so as to save the original stock from being diminished. On each point it is insisted that the law has been constantly and openly violated. On the first point Major Bidle says, "My impression has always been, that the factories were as open to every applicant as any other store, having seen various persons purchasing small articles there. An outfit of goods was furnished by Mr. Erwin, factor at Green Bay, to William Morrill, who was licensed by me in September last, to trade on the Fox River."—p. 1.

Major O'Fallon says. "I know very well that they (the factors) have been in the habit of selling to officers, soldiers, and citizens, and in fact to any body, without reserve. Mr. Johnson, factor at Prairie du Chien, has been in the habit of equipping traders without license, and sending them to trade with the Indians, on hunting excursions, unrestrained; and did, in one instance, furnish goods to a Canadian, who was an experienced trader, but at that time considered a most exceptionable character, from the circumstance of his having borne arms against us by the side of the Indians, during the late war."—p. 7.

Mr. Crooks says, "It is within my knowledge that goods have been sold to persons engaged in the fur trade, by the United States factories at Fort Osage, Fort Edwards, Prairie du Chien, Chicago, and Green Bay, more particularly at the first, third, and last of the places mentioned. And I have every reason to believe it is the constant practice of all the factors to sell the goods to the officers and soldiers of the posts where they are located, and generally to the white and mixed population around them."

Mr. B. went on to the next point, the rate at which these goods were sold.

Major Biddle says, "that he, as agent of the United States, paid 50 per cent."—p. 1.

Major O'Fallon says, "that he and others paid from 40 to 60 per cent. upon the St. Louis prices."—p. 7.

Mr. Crooks says, "they were regulated by no rule. Their rates were capricious, governed by the competition, higher or lower, as that was far off or near at hand, weak or vigorous." (p. 12.) He gives many copies of accounts, signed by factors, in which 66½ were regularly charged on wholesale operations; the retail much higher. Ladies' morocco shoes sold at $1 50, which the Superintendent says cost 75 and 87½ cents, being an advance of about 100 per cent. Tea, the quality and first cost not stated, but supposed to be the same as that sent in 1820, to wit, $1 a pound; the fair price of which, at the factory, could not have exceeded $1 12½ cents, yet sold there for $3 50 and $4 a pound, being an advance of 300 or 400 per cent. Powder sold at 80 cents a pound, which must have cost about 25 cents; advance, more than 200 per cent.

Before quitting the conduct of the factors, Mr. B. said he was bound, in justice, to say, and he said it the more readily, because they were not here to speak for themselves, that, from the manner in which the Superintendent had remarked upon their conduct in selling the Government goods at such high prices, and to others than Indians, excusing some things, admitting some, being silent as to some, that the factors appear to have acted on these points with the knowledge and approbation of their principal.

Mr. B., in pursuing the operations of the factory system, came back to the Superintendent, and examined his conduct in the last scene of his duties—that of selling the furs and peltries received from the factors. In doing this, the act of Congress made it his duty to sell at different places in the United States, to sell at auction, or otherwise dispose of these articles as might be most advantageous for the United States.

In execution of this law, the sales had been principally at Georgetown, perhaps the last place in America that any man would think of for a fur market; and many had been made at private contract, which could hardly be considered as the most advantageous way of conducting the sales for the public. And the event proved the fact; for the prices obtained were below the market price.

Mr. B. examined the sales of beaver and of deer skins, made by the Superintendent in 1821. Of the first, the whole quantity received was 1,108 pounds, and sold for $2,115 02—a fraction less than $2 a pound. The current price was $3 at St. Louis. The proportion of Southern beaver must have been great to justify so low an average as $2. Of deer skins, 124,082 pounds were received, and sold for $24,074 90—a fraction less than twenty cents a pound. The current price at St. Louis was thirty-three cents, and nothing but an excessive proportion of bad skins could have reduced the average of the Superintendent's sales to so low a rate.

A private sale of deer skins within the present year, (1822,) to Korckhaus, of Philadelphia, to the amount of near $20,000, was also shown, in which the average price was equally low, though a credit of three and five months was given. And a letter was read from Mr. Astor's agent in New York, complaining of this private sale, in which he had no chance to bid.

Low as was the average of the beaver and deer skins sold in 1821, that price is still to be charged with transportation and contingencies, which must be deducted before the clear gain could be counted. No data for this calculation is furnished in the sales of the last year; but, by having recourse to the exhibit furnished by the Superintendent in 1820, to be seen in volume eleven of the State papers of that year, it may be ascertained how much these items have amounted to on other sales of the same articles.

The whole amount of furs and peltries sold by the Superintendent, from 1805 to 1809, was - - -	$474,007
The transportation of the same, for the same period, to New Orleans and Georgetown, where all the sales were made, was - - -	159,948
The contingent expenses of the same, for the same period, were - - -	39,399

Put these two items together, and it will be seen that the mere expense of getting the public furs and peltries from the factories to the places of selling them, and the expenses of the sale, was near 50 per cent. upon the total value of the articles sold!

Mr. B. said that he must now proceed to the examination of another point, which implicated the Superintendent in the double culpability of practising an imposition upon the Indians and a speculation upon the Government. To feel the force of the facts as they were disclosed, it would be necessary to recollect that the factory goods were the property of the Government, and the factors nothing but trustees in the pay of the public, and having no interest in the goods.

Major Biddle's Statement.—"In the bills for articles bought by me, (of the Green Bay factor,) as agent, the original price is stated, to which 50 per cent. is added. I have said that the quality was bad. Convinced of this, and of the high price, I sent to the agent of the American Fur Company, at Mackinac, for a small invoice of goods, to the amount of the money left in my hands after defraying the expenses of the agency. And I have no hesitation in saying that they formed a more acceptable present to the Indians than double the sum paid for them would have procured from the factory."—pp. 4, 5.

Major O'Fallon's Statement.—"I do not recollect to have been furnished with any thing by the factories on account of Government. But they have sometimes furnished other Indian agents with annuities and Indian presents; and a few years since, when they were permitted to act in the capacity of sub-Indian agents, they gave presents out of the factory goods themselves, which were charged to and paid by the Indian department. A few years since, I received from General Clark, then Superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis, a few goods for Indian presents, (furnished him by the factory department,) the most of which was of such inferior quality that I was ashamed to offer them to the Indians, and have them still on hand."—pp. 7, 8.

Mr. B. returned again to the last document. It showed the total expenditure in the Indian Department for the year 1818, to have been $559,367 47, of which one item had been stated; another was $120,250 for presents in money to Indians.

Mr. B. next examined the amount of business done by the factories. He took the year 1821, and the exhibit of the Superintendent, showing the total amount of furs and peltries received from each factor, and the amount for which they were sold.

1. Green Bay.—Sent nothing, and no excuse.

2. Red River.—Sent nothing, factor dead.

3. Marais des Cygnes.—Sent nothing, just established.

4. Fort Edwards.—Does something better; sends $14 worth of beeswax.

5. Chicago.—Does better still; sends $329 98 worth of mink, raccoon, and muskrat skins.

6. Osage.—Better still; sends $1,566 64 worth of skins, being $444 less than the salary paid by the United States to the factor and sub-factor for their personal attention to this important concern.

The other three, Prairie du Chien, Choctaw, and Arkansas, sent between them to the amount of about $30,000. The whole making a miserable display upon the large capital invested, and the annual salaries of $19,250, paid the Superintendent and his subordinates from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. B. said that he had now shown to the Senate, by unimpeachable testimony, the continued and enormous abuses which had been practised by the factories. He would now ask for the benefits resulting from them.

Had it expelled the British traders from the Northern and Western Territories? On the contrary, they had remained there till the late war, and might have been there yet if the treaty at Ghent had revived the third article of Mr. Jay's treaty.

Did they keep the Indians at peace? So far from it that Fort Wayne, Chicago, and Madison, (the sites of factories,) were the first objects of attack and pillage in the late war.

Do they create respect and attachment for the American Government in the bosoms of the Indians? See Major O'Fallon's statement.—"The factory system has no good effect in conciliating the good will of the Indians towards us; on the contrary, it is calculated to give them unfavorable impressions, and alienate them from us, by exhibiting the Government of the United States in the light of a common trader."—p. 8.

Do they prevent the Indians from now going to the British for presents? Mr. Crooks's statement shows the contrary.—Fort Malden and Drummond's Island is the annual resort of Indians, who go by the factories to receive presents, even at this day.

Do they protect Indians from the extortions of traders? So far from it, they are themselves the greatest extortioners, selling the meanest goods for the highest prices.

Have they reclaimed the Indians from savage habits, and converted them to Christianity? Listen to the evidence: Major O'Fallon.—"In reclaiming them (the Indians) from savage habits, and converting them to Christianity, these establishments have the same effect as individual traders."—p. 8.

Mr. Crooks's.—"Little as I value the factory system, considered as a means of attaching the Indians to the United States, I do think they are, if possible, still less capable of producing religious reformation either in the Indians or anybody else. The factories have now degenerated into mere places of trade, to which all colors, descriptions, and denominations of people resort for barter, and bear a much more striking resemblance to common country stores, than to the public establishment of a benevolent Government. The desperate efforts which the factors make to secure individually their reputations as traders, and jointly to prop the questionable pecuniary credit of the whole system, are, in my opinion, but little favorable to that serenity of mind, mildness of disposition, and undeviating conformity to a strictly moral deportment, which we, in civilized society, consider essential qualities in those we trust as our guides "to another and a better world." Even we value example as high as precept; with savages the former is most likely to be efficacious. And believing these gentlemen (factors) to be equally fallible with the generality of their brethren in trade, I should imagine they were selected by the Superintendent of Indian trade more for their trafficking than apostolic abilities, as the head of that department is too intimately acquainted with the nature of missions among a rude people, to have appointed the present incumbents to teach repentance and remission of sins to the children of the wilderness."—p. 16.

Yet this system is vaunted for its moral and religious influence upon the heads and the hearts of the Indians, and many good citizens of the United States have been so far imposed upon as to send petitions here, praying its continuance, and an increase of its capital on that account—petitions, which it is believed were made here, and sent out to be signed, and brought back in time to help this precious system to stand the shock of the present attack.

Mr. B. said he hoped it was now fully shown to the Senate, by unimpeachable testimony, that the factory system was worse than useless; that every public consideration required it to be immediately abolished, the accounts of all concerned to be settled up and closed; the capital to be returned to the public Treasury, so far as it could be found;* the salaries of all its officers to be stopped, and an exhibit of its profit or loss to be shown at the next session of Congress; that the amendment offered by him was intended to accomplish these purposes, and, with that view, was submitted to the consideration of the Senate.

When Mr. B. had concluded—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, replied at some length, to show the grounds on which the Committee on Indian Affairs had reported the bill submitted to the Senate.

The subject was then postponed until tomorrow.

TUESDAY, March 26.

Indian Factory System.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill concerning Indian trade.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, continued, at

* None could be found; for the bill was passed, and the concern placed in other hands, to be closed and settled up; and thus the glowing representations which the Superintendent (Mr. Thomas L. McKinney) had been so long making to Congress, were mere romance, and deceptive inventions. It was one of the instances of the extreme difficulty of getting rid of any Government establishment, no matter how vicious, after it once takes root and has created an interest for itself. It then becomes a set-fast—a sluggish, deep-seated sore, insensible to either poultice or plaster, and only amenable to the knife and the actual cautery. So of this Indian trading establishment. It was commenced as an experiment, and for the limited term of three years, under Washington's administration, and for the double purpose of supplying the Indians with suitable goods, at cost and carriage, and to wean them off from the British traders—then controlling them through their trade in all the Northwest. Instead of terminating at the end of three years, when it was already seen that the experiment was a failure, the establishment was continued thirty years! and then only terminated by the most determined efforts.

some length, the speech he yesterday commenced in support of the bill, and against the amendments offered by Mr. BENTON.

Mr. JOHNSON, in answer to some remarks of Mr. BENTON, concerning the official conduct of the agents employed in conducting the system, said that it was not on the ground that any of those agents had abused the trust reposed in them, that the Committee on Indian Affairs had reported the bill. It was other considerations which, in the opinion of the committee, made it expedient to abolish the factory system, and to provide more effectively for opening trade and intercourse with the Indians by licensed traders. He had examined with attention, he said, the documents connected with the subject, and to which the gentleman from Missouri had referred, and could perceive in them nothing which showed that the Superintendent of Indian trade, or that the factors, or agents, had not faithfully discharged their duty; that, so far as he was informed, he believed them all to be honest, correct men. He said that he had but a slight personal acquaintance with the Superintendent, but the character of that gentleman here, for integrity, stands high, and that, from the best information he could obtain, he was of opinion that the Superintendent had fulfilled the duties of his office with ability, and perhaps as well as any other man could have performed them.

It is said by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, that great abuses had been committed by the Superintendent in purchasing goods of bad quality, and not adapted to the Indian trade; in making the purchases at improper places, and at extravagant prices; and in the manner of selling the furs and peltries received from the factors. Mr. J. said that some of the gentlemen who were examined before the committee, seemed to think that such abuses had been committed. But, from an examination of all the documents laid before the committee, and from other information which he had received, he was of opinion that the Superintendent had performed his duty with the utmost zeal and integrity. With respect, he said, to the quality of the goods purchased for the factories, there seemed to be a difference of opinion. Governor Cass, of Michigan, in a letter to the Superintendent, dated in August, 1816, says: "I have been much gratified to find the goods sent here for the Indians are well selected; perfect justice has been done. I am informed by persons in the Indian Department, that such a selection was never sent to this country. In fact, I cannot conceive that they could be better suited to the objects to which they are sent." He said that the factor at Fort Osage, also, speaks favorably of the goods sent to him. It is probable, he remarked, that some of the goods alluded to by the gentlemen who were examined before the committee, were remnants of the old stock on hand. He was informed that a great portion of the goods now in the factories, had been purchased about the close of the late war with England, when goods were exorbitant, and difficult to be had at any price. He believed, at that period, that the price of merchandise was from fifty to one hundred per cent. higher than twelve months' subsequent thereto. As to the places at which the goods had been purchased, he considered a matter of no consequence, as it did not appear that they could have been obtained on better terms at any other place. Nor does it appear, he observed, that the furs and peltries received of the factors, could have been disposed of to more advantage. The act of 1811 makes it the duty of the Superintendent, under the direction of the President of the United States, and upon such terms and conditions as he should prescribe, to cause the furs and peltry, and other articles acquired in trade with the Indian nations, to be sold at public auction, in different parts of the United States, or otherwise disposed of, as may be deemed most advantageous to the United States.

Upon the whole, he was of opinion that the conduct of the Superintendent and factors, in relation to the different subjects upon which the gentleman from Missouri had commented, might be satisfactorily explained, without implicating the character of any of them. These gentlemen, he remarked, had no personal interest whatever in the Indian trade; they were absolutely prohibited from being, in any manner, personally concerned in carrying it on. They act, he said, under the obligations of an oath, and have given bond, with security, for the faithful performance of their duty. They act, too, under the instruction of the Government, and are compelled to render an account, quarter-yearly, of all money, goods, and other property, which come into their hands, or for which they ought to account. Thus, it will be perceived, that the Superintendent and factors have acted under high responsibilities, and that the Government has had every opportunity of judging of the propriety of their conduct, and it is to be presumed that if any of them had violated their duty, they would have been removed from office.

Mr. LOWRE, of Pennsylvania, said that, for several years he had been seeking information on the factory system, that he had carefully examined the voluminous documents the Senate had ordered to be printed on the subject. He had come to the full conviction that the factory system had not answered the purpose intended by its establishment. This conviction, however, said Mr. L., has not been produced in my mind by the reasons which seem to operate with the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON.) His remarks go more to show the abuses of the system, and, indeed, frauds of the Superintendent and factors, than to any defect in the system itself. My view of the subject is the reverse of this. I think it would not be difficult to show that all the transactions, so ably commented on by the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) could have happened in the absence of every thing involving fraud or official misconduct on the part of these officers. They are not here to answer for or defend themselves, and the evidence before us is not sufficient, in my judgment, to condemn them. Placed in these circumstances, their former good characters ought to go for something. The factors are first nominated by the President, and then have to pass the ordeal of this body. I do not know any of them personally, and with the Superintendent my acquaintance is not of long standing. The official intercourse I had with him, during two years that I was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, gave me a good opportunity of knowing him. It is but justice to him to state, that I consider him an able and a faithful officer, and, what is of as much esteem with me, an honest and an upright man.

My objection to the continuance of this trade goes against the system itself. In the first place, the capital is entirely inadequate for the object. On this point I have not data to speak with precision, but, to supply the whole of the Indian trade, I apprehend that ten times the amount now invested would be necessary. This alone would be conclusive against the system. The present capital is found difficult to manage. The Indian border, where this trade is carried on, extends over several thousand miles. In such an extended market, the purchase of articles suitable for the wants, real or imaginary, the wishes and the caprices of the various tribes; the transportation, care, and sale of the furs and peltries, involve such a complication of circumstances, that it is impossible for the Government to conduct the concern to advantage. All these difficulties exist with the present investment, and all these difficulties would increase with the enlargement of the capital. Nothing but individual enterprise, individual industry and attention, is equal to such a business. Indeed, I dislike the idea of this Government becoming a trader, and coming, as they must come, in competition with private traders. This Government, like the Government of every free country, requires a great deal of machinery to keep it in motion. Let the public functionaries be limited to those objects which must be attended to. Leave the Indian trade to individuals. If it wants regulations, let those regulations be made. The wisdom of Congress is certainly sufficient for this purpose. I never knew much advantage result to any Government from becoming traders, speculating in funds, or even holding bank stock. In every competition, individual interest is always too sharp-sighted, where the Government is a party.

Still, if I believed this trade to be of advantage to these poor Indians, no consideration of loss, on our part, would induce me to withdraw it from them. But advantage to them, while you supply so small a part of their trade, is out of the question. Open a trade, under proper regulations and restrictions, and the Indians will be better supplied, and on better terms. Competition, the great regulator of the trading community, will, of itself, be found sufficient.

As to the detail of the bill, I prefer the sections reported by the committee. I think the factors should be permitted to close this business, and, to prevent loss, a reasonable time should be allowed. Either plan, however, will answer the purpose. It is satisfactory to find such a unanimity of sentiment in the Senate on the propriety of withdrawing these establishments.

The bill was then laid over until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 27.

Indian Trade.

The Senate resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to abolish the present establishment of Indian trade, and to provide for opening that trade to licensed individuals—the amendments offered by Mr. BENTON (going principally to discontinue the establishment in June, 1822, instead of 1823; to take the settlement of its affairs out of the hands of the present officers, and to confine the present bill to that abolition simply) being the question still pending.

Mr. RUGGLES made a few remarks in reply to some former observations of Mr. BENTON, and in support of the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. LANMAN also submitted his reasons for preferring the bill as it was, to the amendments.

Mr. VAN BUREN spoke at some length to show that the objections urged against the existing establishment of Indian trade, applied more to the organization of the system than to the system itself; and to show that, if it were proper to abolish it, the winding up of its concerns ought to be confided to the present officers, as proposed by the bill, rather than to other persons, as proposed by the amendments, &c.

Mr. LOWRIE also added some remarks to the same effect.

Mr. BENTON replied to those gentlemen who had adverted to his remarks, and advocated, at considerable length, not only the course he had proposed to adopt on this subject, but the reasons and facts he had urged in its support, many of which he repeated and enforced.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, replied to Mr. BENTON also at considerable length, and supported the bill against the objections made to it.

Mr. VAN BUREN subjoined some further remarks against the amendments.

Mr. MACON spoke against any system of Government trade with the Indians, as unprofitable to the nation, inexpedient, and every way more objectionable than a well-regulated system of licensed private trade—contending that the Government could not attend to all the minutiae of Indian trade, and at the same time all the affairs of Europe, and, in addition to these, all the affairs of South America, which were now taken in hand. He was in favor of the amendments.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, had no objection to discontinuing the factory system, though it had been productive of much good; but he wished at the same time to substitute some other more eligible, such as the bill provided, and spoke against the amendment for this, and also for the reason that it would not leave time enough to wind up the concerns of the system, if directed to be done by June next.

Mr. BENTON, then, after observing that some time had elapsed since the amendment was first offered, stated that he would modify the proposition by adding, after the first of June, 1822, the words, "or as soon thereafter as can conveniently be done."

The bill was then postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, March 28.

Indian Trade.

The Senate then resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the bill to abolish the establishment of Indian trade and to provide for opening that trade to private individuals—the amendments offered thereto by Mr. BENTON still pending.

Mr. SMITH delivered the reasons, at considerable length, which influenced him to favor the amendments in preference to the original bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, took the other side, and spoke some time in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, made some remarks in favor of the amendment; when

The question was taken on Mr. BENTON's amendments, and they were agreed to—ayes 17, noes 11.

Mr. BENTON then moved to recommit the bill, that the different objects which it embraces, viz: the abolition of the present system—the establishment of a system of private trade, &c., might be reported in separate bills.

After a good deal of debate on the subject, in which Messrs. OTIS, BENTON, TALBOT, JOHNSON, of Louisiana, RUGGLES, LOWRIE, and LANMAN, took part; and, before taking any question, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 29.

Indian Trade.

The Senate resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the bill to discontinue the Indian trade system, and provide for opening the trade to individuals under certain regulations.

Mr. BENTON withdrew the motion which he made yesterday to recommit the bill with certain instructions; and, in lieu thereof, moved to strike out all those sections which proposed to establish a system of private trade, by license, under the management of a principal Superintendent to reside at the Seat of Government, and assistant superintendent to reside at St. Louis, in Missouri. The effect of this motion was to limit the present bill to a simple abolition and settlement of the concerns of the present factory system.

The question was taken on this motion without debate or objection, and carried; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

MONDAY, April 1.

Maison Rouge's Claim.

The engrossed bill to permit a judicial investigation and decision of the claim of the Marquis de Maison Rouge, to a tract of land in Louisiana, was read the third time, and then, for the purpose of introducing an amendment, to compel the District Attorney to take an appeal to the Supreme Court, should the decision be adverse to the United States, Mr. EATON moved to recommit the bill.

Mr. BROWN, of Louisiana, opposed the motion, on the ground that the amendment was unnecessary, inasmuch as the District Attorney would certainly deem it his duty to prosecute an appeal, should the decision be in favor of the complainant; that the claim was one of too great magnitude and of too much importance to presume that an attorney would omit to appeal, and that the Government might safely confide in that officer to perform his duty in that respect without any compulsory provision in this bill.

After some further conversation on the subject, the motion prevailed, and the bill was re-committed.

TUESDAY, April 2.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to Congress the translation of two letters from the Minister of France to the Secretary of State, relating to the claim of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais upon this Government, with the documents therewith enclosed, recommending them to the favorable consideration of Congress.

JAMES MONROE,

WASHINGTON, March 29, 1832.

Indian Affairs.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, at their next session, such information as may in the mean time be obtained, showing the number of persons of whole or part Indian blood, detached from their tribes, and living among the white people in each of the States of Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana, and the Territories of Arkansas and Michigan; the names of the heads of each family, and the number of their children, and whether their father or mother, and which, is of whole or part Indian blood; the names of each single person of the same description above the age of twenty-one years; the state of education among them, the religion which they profess, and the places of their residence; the causes which have induced them to quit their tribes and settle among the white people; and whether they have received donations in land from the French and Spanish, or American Governments, and if any, how much, from what Government received, where situated, and whether the donee now possesses it.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the said information to be collected from the United States Indian agents, and such others as he shall think proper, by causing the appropriate inquiries to be addressed to them; and the substance of their information to be digested into a report, and communicated to the Senate.

In introducing the preceding resolutions, the mover, Mr. BENTON, stated his objects to be to obtain correct information with respect to the description of persons therein mentioned, with a view of making some provision to better their condition. He knew of many persons in the States and Territories of the description mentioned, some of whom had applied to him to propose a law to give them lands, as had been given to the early white settlers in the same countries. He had delayed acting on their request in order to obtain full and correct information, to make it the basis of a law that would operate generally in behalf of all such persons now residing in the white settlements, and others who may choose to do the like; conformably to the idea contained in the President's inaugural address of the fourth of March last.

Maison Rouge's Claim.

The Senate then resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill authorizing a judicial trial of the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge to a tract of land; which bill was, at its third reading, yesterday, re-committed to a committee for the purpose of incorporating certain amendments.

Some debate occurred on certain amendments of form which were offered, and, after adopting one to compel the United States attorney to appeal to the Supreme Court in case the decision of the District Court be in favor of the claimant, the bill was again ordered to be read a third time, by yeas and nays—26 to 18, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. BROWN of Louisiana, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lowrie, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Seymour, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Van Dyke, Ware, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Boardman, Brown of Ohio, Chandler, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Holmes of Maine, Lanman, Macon, Ruggles, Van Buren, and Walker.

THURSDAY, April 4.

Drawback on Cordage.

The Senate took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill to allow a drawback on the export of cordage manufactured from foreign hemp.

Mr. D'WOLF remarked, that he did not observe the chairman of the committee (Mr. DICKERSON) who reported the bill, in his seat; he therefore took the liberty to state to the Senate, that the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures had taken the subject-matter of the resolution, proposing a drawback on articles manufactured from foreign materials, under consideration, and resolved to report the bill now before the Senate, proposing a drawback on one article only—cordage made from foreign hemp. Mr. D'W. observed, that he was not desirous of making speeches; and having communicated his views upon the subject, on offering the resolution, if there were no objections to the bill, he hoped it would pass, and if there were, he should wish to hear them.

Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, BROWN, of Louisiana, and HOLMES, of Maine, made some remarks, questioning the policy of the measure as it regards the home growth of hemp, the revenue, &c.

Mr. D'WOLF then rose and observed, that he considered the policy of the measure sound; that his opinion was in unison with that of the gentleman from Kentucky, that if it militated against the domestic production of hemp, he would abandon the project. But, Mr. D'W. said, he was well satisfied it would not have that effect; that, although it would have a tendency to encourage the importation of hemp, it would encourage the exportation of cordage more, and the balance of encouragement was in favor of the home grower of hemp, who always wished to see the market bare of the article when he brought forward his crop for sale. He said that the Government depended on the consumption of imports for its revenue; and more than this, he believed, they could not have. Congress, said he, takes special care to retain the duties on all that is consumed, as well by the elements (fire and flood) as by the people, which he took leave to remark, operated rather unequally, and bore hard upon the importers, being a direct tax upon them. As to the revenue being injured by the measure, he did not believe that would be the case if fairly considered—all laws were liable to abuse; it would not do to say that Congress should not legislate on subjects of this nature for that reason. The revenue was and must be derived from the industry of the people, be it in what shape it may. We have, said he, Committees of Ways and Means, but I have never known them to do or say much about the means; the time of Congress being consumed upon the ways of collecting and disposing of the revenues, and the means were left to take care of themselves. Mr. D'W. considered that the industry of the people was the means, and that any measures which went to encourage their industry, must be favorable to the revenue; the growers of cotton support the revenue, because they furnish exports, which gave the means to produce imports, and from imports we collect our revenue, as does every branch of industry which adds to the Commonwealth give the means for revenue. The rope maker, who adds value to the imported raw material, and thus makes an article of export, adds to our means of revenue.

He wished, he said, that we were not so much in the habit of classing our industry. He believed it was imported policy to consider the different branches of our industry as adverse interests. He wished we could view the industry of the whole country as one interest. He had taken much pains to look into this subject, and it had not been in his power to find any branch of home industry which would be liable to suffer by the measure now proposed. He was not of the opinion with some gentlemen, that the trade of the country is flourishing; it may be well enough to say so to foreign nations, with whom we have commercial disputes, but he did not believe the fact to be so. He had looked at the book sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the exports and imports; he found included in our exports the amount of gold and silver coin sent out of the country, which was about two and one-half millions; deduct this from our exports, and it leaves them about the same as the imports. This was not a flourishing state of trade; but if it was a true state of it, he should not be much alarmed. He was not, he said, a gloomy man, nor very desirous to show the worst side of a bad case, but he had always thought he was not adding any thing to his own estate, unless he was selling more of the produce of his own industry than he purchased of others. He had attempted to make some statement for his own guide in this business, but had not finished it; the result, so far as he had gone, led him to the conclusion, that the people of this country are indebted to Europe more than one hundred millions of dollars; the items of debt are many. To pay the interest of this debt, whether it be public or private, it must take a part of our exports, say five millions at least; and this, if paid, leaves a balance against us of that sum, which is adding to the aggregate amount of our debts abroad; and any gentleman who feels disposed to offset this item against the freight our ships make in carrying our produce to market, and profits on our exports, I will offer him, said Mr. D'W., the hundreds of thousands of barrels of flour now piled up in the ports of Europe, and the West Indies, sour and spoiled, on the hands, and on account of the shippers in this country. As for profits on our produce exported, he believed no well-informed merchant would pretend there were any; if we obtain within ten per cent. of the cost, it is considered doing pretty well; it is on the return cargoes we depend for our profits, if we get any.

The shipping interest and trade of the country, Mr. D'W. thought important to the nation. Spanish America, said he, is now offering a trade to the world, and our competitors, the British, are eager to engross it; we have not the manufactured articles with which to supply that country, nor the manufactories to consume their raw materials; but we have ships, seamen, and enterprise, and some capital, (although not so much as Great Britain,) and we can come in for a share of this trade, if the Government will grant the same aid to enable us to compete with them. England allows drawbacks on cordage to amount of duties, both on the hemp and tar; they obtain their hemp from Russia, the same country which supplies us. We have the machinery and art for making cordage, in as great perfection as the British, or any other European nation, and our people are as capable and industrious; but unless we get the drawbacks, we must give up that branch of trade. The measure now proposed will employ some shipping to bring the hemp for making cordage to export, and as far as this goes, creates consumption of the article in our own country, and of course directly adds to the revenue. We shall go to Europe and obtain manufactures for the Spanish American markets, and carry thither the raw materials of that country, to such ports as may admit us; but the merchant who finds the manufactured articles needed in his own country, and a market at home for his return cargo, must have great advantages over him who has to look to foreign countries for both. Hence, if it be any object with Government to aid commerce, he could see no way to do it better than by this measure, as far as it went. Mr. D'W. asked if the drawback on refined sugar injured the market for the grower of the raw sugar in Louisiana? He thought he must be answered in the negative—and, if it did not, how would the drawback on cordage injure the market for the grower of hemp? The imported hemp having paid the duties, is naturalized, is domesticated, and made harmless; it is domestic hemp, making one common stock with the home-grown article; and he contended it made no difference to the revenue whether the cordage exported and obtaining a drawback, was made of the imported or the home-grown hemp—he said it made no difference to the revenue; you have, said he, a common stock of the imported and home growth, and if it be more than the consumption of your country, you may as well allow the surplus to be exported in cordage, by giving back the duties on the hemp, so far as it has any effect on your revenues, as to have it laying over, to be in the way of your new importations, and your new crop of home growth. He did not advance these ideas in regard to the revenue, as an argument in support of the bill, but merely to satisfy those gentlemen who feared the revenue would be injured by it. When, however, said he, your home growth shall be equal, or exceed your consumption, and you find the drawback on cordage equal to, or exceeding the duties on the imported hemp, then, to be sure, it may be time to think of refusing or reducing the drawback, unless it should be your policy to consider it as a bounty on the home grower of hemp, and allow it for that purpose. Hemp is an article which cannot be exported in its raw state, there being no market, unless carried back to Europe from where it came.

Mr. D'W. said he hoped for an opportunity of giving some further views on the bill, should its policy be further questioned.

Mr. TALBOT contended that it would be impossible for us to import hemp from Russia, manufacture it here, and then compete with Russia in the sale of the article in the foreign market; that this bill would produce no good effect, but that, if it should have any practical operation, it would be one detrimental to the revenue; that at present Russia hemp was preferred in foreign markets, from its superior beauty, &c., and, instead of discouraging the home product, it ought to be promoted, and the duty on foreign hemp increased. He concluded by moving to postpone the bill to Thursday next, to wait the progress of a bill in the other House, and to allow time for examining the present proposition with some attention.

Mr. MORRILL confessed that, if he believed the effects predicted by Mr. D'WOLF from this measure would result from it, he would readily vote for it; but he was of a contrary opinion, and believed that it would discourage the production of domestic hemp, and therefore be injurious to the agricultural interest, &c.

Mr. OTIS made a few remarks in favor of an earlier consideration of this bill than Thursday next; and expressed his opinion in concurrence with the views offered in its favor by Mr. D'WOLF, which views he conceived to possess much weight, and to be entitled to consideration.

The bill was then postponed to Monday next, the motion having been varied to that day.

FRIDAY, April 5.

Ship-building and Navy Yards—their Cost and Expenses, and personal Establishment of Men, Officers, and Workpeople.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motions of Mr. HOLMES of the 2d instant, for requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate certain information relative to the Navy of the United States; and the same having been modified, were agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate the expenses of building each vessel of war built at each navy yard or other place in the United States, authorized by the act of the 2d January, 1813, and the acts supplementary thereto; distinguishing, in each vessel so built, the expenses of timber, iron, copper, cordage, hemp, cloth, and other materials; the amount paid to agents or superintendents, specifying their names; the amount paid for labor, particularizing the sums paid to carpenters, mast makers, boat builders, block makers, blacksmiths, armorers, caulkers, gun-carriage makers, sawyers, sail makers, and riggers, and other laborers.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate the names, number, and grade of the officers, and the number of men, belonging to the Navy, employed in and attached to each navy yard and each naval station in the United States, with the services each has performed, and the compensation each has received in pay, rations, and other emoluments, during the two last years ending on the first of January last, including the value of the benefit to any officers for the use or improvement of any public property.

Resolved, That the information required by the above resolutions be furnished to the Senate at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Relief of Land Purchasers.

The Senate took up the bill supplementary to the act of last session, "for the relief of the purchasers of public lands" (to extend the time to September, 1822, in which the purchasers may avail themselves of the provisions of that act.)

Mr. THOMAS explained the reasons which induced the Land Committee to report this bill, and the considerations which rendered its passage reasonable and proper.

Mr. CHANDLER offered a few remarks adverse to the policy of legislating any further on this subject.

Messrs. BROWN, of Ohio, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, BARTON, and WALKER, severally advocated the justice and expediency of this bill, urging the shortness of the time allowed, after the passage of the late act, for the purchasers to make the necessary application to the land offices, the injustice of excluding a great portion of them, who were actually unable to make application in time, after the necessary instructions and forms reached the different land offices, in preparing and forwarding which much of the time allowed by the act was consumed, and leaving very little for a compliance with the law, by those for whose relief it was intended, &c.

On motion of Mr. KING, of New York, who wished gentlemen to have time to compare the provisions of this bill with those of the act of last session, the bill was postponed to Tuesday next.

MONDAY, April 8.

Georgia Claims.

On motion by Mr. ELLIOTT, sundry authentic letters between the Governors of Georgia and the War Department, with others from various persons, in relation to Indian depredations on Georgia in the years 1792, 1798, and 1794, communicated by the Governor of Georgia to the Senators from that State, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TUESDAY, April 9.

Drawback on Cordage.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to allow drawback on cordage manufactured from foreign hemp, and, without further debate, the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and was decided in the negative—yeas 11, nays 17.

So the bill was rejected.

WEDNESDAY, April 10.

John J. C. Oldfield.

The Senate took up the report of the Committee of Claims, unfavorable to the petition of John J. C. Oldfield, of Baltimore. [The petitioner was the innocent purchaser of two drafts, issued by the Treasurer of the United States, to the Paymaster General, in favor of two widows for pensions, which drafts, it was afterwards found, were issued on the authority of fraudulent certificates and papers, forged for the purpose, and that the pretended endorsement of these widows on the drafts were forged. Mr. Oldfield, the purchaser of these drafts, prays that the Government will pay them.]

Mr. EATON, deeming the claim on the Government an equitable one, moved to reverse the report, so as to give it a character favorable to the prayer of the petitioner, and supported his motion with a number of remarks. Messrs. BARTON and VAN DYKE, (members of the Committee of Claims,) opposed this motion, and spoke to show that there was no obligation on the part of the Government, in law or equity, to allow the claim. Mr. LLOYD argued to show that the claim was a fair one, and ought to be paid. Mr. EATON added further arguments in favor of the claim. Messrs. LANMAN and RODNEY replied to Mr. E., and advocated the other side of the question. After some further debate, in which Messrs. LLOYD, D'WOLF, EATON, and VAN DYKE, took part, the motion to reverse the report was negatived without a division, and the report was agreed to.

FRIDAY, April 12.

Mr. STOKES submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of giving the assent of Congress to an act of the General Assembly of North Carolina, entitled "An act to incorporate a company entitled the Roanoke Inlet Company," and for other purposes.

MONDAY, April 15.

Georgia Militia Claims.

Mr. ELLIOTT, from the Military Committee, made the following report, which was ordered to be printed :

The Military Committee, to whom was referred the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of providing for the final settlement of the militia claims of the State of Georgia, for services rendered under orders of the President of the United States, during the years 1792, 1798, and 1794, report :

That, in the examination of this subject, sundry authentic letters and other documents were submitted to their inspection ; among which, the following, being deemed the most material, are here so arranged and condensed as to present to the Senate, with the least possible detail, the merits of the case, viz :

A letter from the Governor of Georgia to the Secretary of War, dated 22d of May, 1792, communicating to the department official information of the hostile disposition of the Creek and Cherokee Indians, as manifested in the murders which they had just committed, and the houses they had destroyed by fire. After stating these facts, the Governor proceeds: "When you maturely deliberate on the present position of the federal troops, and contemplate the orders to that effect, you will doubtless foresee a series of complicated difficulties that may attend the army in the event of general hostilities. The movement of the army ought to be governed by circumstances; and, whilst it is to remain subject to orders issued at the remote distance of one thousand miles, I cannot help feeling for the situation of the defenceless settlers scattered over an extensive frontier of at least three hundred miles. The savage depredations that have taken place for near three years past have been considerably to the westward of the Rock Landing, from which, to the river Ingalo, there is a frontier of about one hundred and thirty miles exposed to Indian ravages. When I point out this as a defenceless ground, I do not leave out of view that portion of the frontier from the river St. Mary's to the Rock Landing; for, should a pressure take place to the westward, the Indians have sufficient agency to retaliate on the settlers on the lower frontiers. From these considerations, additional exertions towards a general defence will be indispensable."

On the 15th of June, 1792, Major Richard McCall, the commandant of the federal troops in Georgia, thus addressed the Governor of the State: "I have just returned from the Big or High Shoals of Oconee. On my way up, I found the settlements breaking. At this particular crisis the settlers neglecting their crops will, of course, be an injury to the frontiers. I have, therefore, in consequence of your Excellency's permission, called into service some militia. The reports of Captains Barnet and William Strong, my letter to General Clark, and my instructions to the different officers, will show the occasion of the measure."

The Governor of Georgia was informed by letter from Andrew Pickens, dated at Hopewell, 12th September, 1792, that the Cherokee Indians, instigated by Spanish agents, had manifested an unfriendly disposition, and that four towns had actually determined on war; that the chiefs of the Creek nation had not returned from Pensacola, but were soon expected with a large supply of ammunition, at which time it was expected a general war would commence between that nation and the United States. This letter was accompanied with one from Captain R. B. Roberts, commanding the United States troops at Fort Matthews, Big Shoals of Oconee, informing the Governor of the contents of a letter received by him from Mr. Shaw, the superintendent of the Cherokee nation, which induced him to look for a predatory war, if nothing more serious. "The weakness of this post," continues the Captain, "although it is my duty to defend it to the last, is such as to render its tenure very precarious; the strength of it only twenty-four privates! The frontiers here are truly deplorable. No ammunition, no authority, and no settled mode adopted by Government for their protection.

As I am on the spot, I hope your Excellency will not imagine I presume to dictate; but really, sir, if the militia are not called out immediately, in force, this settlement will be totally broken up, and dreadful consequences will ensue." To this letter the Governor replied on the 18th of September, 1792, "that the commandant of the federal forces had long since been served with a provisional arrangement of the militia, by which it will appear that ample provision has been made by the Government for any events that have as yet arisen; and, in case emergencies should require additional aid, to the one-third of the militia, under orders agreeably to the aforesaid arrangement, there shall be no delay on my part in affording every support that the situation of the State will admit." In confirmation of this statement, copies of general orders of the years 1790 and 1792 are found among the papers referred to the committee for examination. By these, the militia of the State are classed, and held ready for active operations whenever their services should be required.

On the 27th of October, 1792, the Governor of Georgia was informed by the Secretary of War of the determination of five towns of the Cherokees, consisting of from three to five hundred warriors, and aided by the Upper Creeks, to commence hostilities against the United States. "But," adds the Secretary, "as Congress is on the eve of their session, this information will be communicated to them. The constitution having invested that body with the powers of war, no offensive operations can be taken until they shall be pleased to authorize the same. At present, the information does not warrant the conclusion that more of the Cherokees than five towns, and the Creeks before mentioned, are for hostilities; but when the flames of war are lighted up, it will be difficult effectually to restrain them within narrow limits. If the information which you may receive shall substantiate clearly any hostile designs of the Creeks against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures for the defence thereof as may be in your power, and which the occasion may require." On the 18th of November, 1792, the Governor was informed by Major Henry Gaither, of the federal troops, that, believing it to be necessary, in consequence of his permission to do so, he had called into service two additional troops, one from Wilkes county, and the other from the county of Elbert.

In a letter of the 29th of April, 1793, the Secretary of War was thus addressed by the Governor of Georgia: "From depositions of Benjamin Harrison and Francis Pugh, and from the information of Joseph Dabb, there is little expectation of avoiding a general war with the Creek and Cherokee Indians. Blood has been spilt in every direction on the extended frontier of this State, and one man killed in South Carolina." After stating the plans he had adopted for temporary defence, he adds: "I shall follow this plan of operation until measures be taken by the President for the better protection of the unfortunate settlers on this exposed frontier. If I find the pressure become great, the opposition must keep pace with the several emergencies."

On the 8th of May, 1793, his Excellency again wrote the Secretary of War that, "such was the havoc and carnage making by the savages in every direction on our frontiers, retaliation by open war became the only resort; that the horrid barbarities recently committed (some recitals of which were enclosed) had compelled him to cause the additional aid of six troops of horse to be drawn into the service." On the 30th of May, 1793, the Secretary of War acknowledged the receipt of the several letters which had been addressed by the Governor to that Department, and adds, "that, from considerations of policy, at this critical period, relative to foreign powers, and the pending treaty with the Northern Indians, it is deemed advisable to avoid for the present offensive expeditions into the Creek country; but, from the circumstances of the late depredations on the frontiers of Georgia, it is thought expedient to increase the force in that quarter for defensive purposes. The President, therefore, authorizes your Excellency to call into, and keep in service, in addition to the regular force stationed in Georgia, one hundred horse and one hundred militia foot, to be employed, under the orders of Lieutenant Colonel Gaither, in repelling inroads, as circumstances may require." After directing the manner of forming and employing this force, the Secretary concludes thus: "The case of a serious invasion of Georgia by large bodies of Indians must be referred to the provisions of the constitution; but the proceeding with efficacy in future (the necessity of which appears but too probable) requires absolutely that no unnecessary expense shall be incurred in the mean time." In reply to the Governor's letter of May 8th, the Secretary of War, on the 10th of June, says: "The State of Georgia being invaded, or in imminent danger thereof, the measures taken by your Excellency may be considered as indispensable. You are the judge of the degree of danger, and of its duration, and will undoubtedly proportion the defence to the exigencies. The President, however, expresses his confidence, that, as soon as the danger which has induced you to call out so large a body of troops shall have subsided, you will reduce the troops to the existing state of things, provided the safety of the frontiers will admit the measure." After speaking of some military supplies that had been forwarded, he thus concludes: "As a general and open Creek war, in the present crisis of European affairs, would be complicated and of great magnitude, the President is anxiously desirous of avoiding such an event." 'Enclosed is a copy of a letter to the Governor of South Carolina, in case circumstances should require you to call for aid from that State.'

The language of this letter to the Governor of South Carolina is strongly expressive of the President's apprehensions of a state of serious hostilities with the Indians. The Secretary says to the Governor: "The President of the United States has received authentic information from Georgia of the unprovoked and cruel outrages of parties of Creeks upon the frontiers of that State; and, as it is at present uncertain to what degree the evils complained of may be extended, the President has directed me to request your Excellency that, in case the frontiers of Georgia should be seriously invaded by large bodies of hostile Indians, you would, upon the request of the Governor of said State, direct such parties of the militia of South Carolina to march to the assistance of Georgia as the case may require; for the expenses of which the United States will be responsible."

On the 19th of July, Captain Constant Freeman was sent into Georgia, as agent of the War Department, to regulate the issues of public property to the troops who might be in the service of the United States, and to prevent or remedy any abuses which existed. Having, immediately on his arrival, entered on the duties of his appointment, on the 17th of October, 1793, he directed Major Gaither to attend to the instructions which he had communicated to him from the War Department, in relation to the monthly muster and inspection of the militia in the service of the United States, promising to aid the person he should appoint with the necessary instructions.

On the 19th of February, 1794, his Excellency George Matthews, who had succeeded Mr. Telfair in the Government of Georgia, having in person examined the exposed parts of the State, offered a plan for its defence to the War Department. He protests against the orders which forbid the militia from pursuing the Indians, whose tracks were stained with the blood of those they had just murdered, over a temporary and artificial line, as calculated to encourage the Indians, and to deprive the citizens of the State of the opportunity of reprisal, enjoyed by all nations under such circumstances. This letter is concluded with the following remarks: "I have now to request that some person may be appointed to muster the militia that now are or have been in service, as I presume Captain Freeman has informed you of Major Gaither's having refused to make the appointment. I can, sir, with great sincerity assure you that, in the defence I may require for this State, I have not a wish to make the expense one shilling more than is requisite; and when you reflect that we possess a frontier of more than four hundred miles, exposed to numerous tribes of hostile Indians, I flatter myself the plan I now submit will not be deemed extravagant. I have to request, if the arsenals or military stores of the United States will admit of it, that you send forward equipments for three or four hundred horse. I trust the President will not think this unreasonable, when it is taken into view that this State forms an extensive barrier, or rather picket, to the United States."

In letters of the 25th of March and 14th of May, 1794, the Secretary of War acknowledges the receipt of Governor Matthews' letter; assents to the propriety of his plans, generally, for defence of the State; and sanctions particularly the erection of block-houses throughout the whole line of exposure, at the distance of twenty-five miles apart. On the subject of the pay of the militia theretofore employed, the Secretary observes: "As to the number of militia kept up by your predecessor during the last year, no returns or muster-rolls have been received—of course no judgment can be formed of their amount; some reports have made the number before mentioned to you. When the returns and musters shall be received, the question will be impartially considered by the President of the United States, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, he can consider himself as authorized to pay them. If he cannot, (which is most probable,) the question will be submitted to Congress." In relation to the muster and pay-rolls, the agent of the War Department, Captain Freeman, thus addressed the Governor of Georgia on the 28th of April, 1794: "I am very happy that your Excellency has ordered the muster and pay-rolls for the militia to be prepared and forwarded; and that we so perfectly coincide respecting the nature of the service which has been performed. I make no doubt but that all obstacles will be removed as soon as the former accounts of the militia can be laid before Congress, and that in future regularity and order will be introduced."

General Appropriation Bill.

[SENATE.]

On the subject of those claims, Captain Freeman, in a report to the Secretary of War, made the 25th of October, 1802, after stating what muster and pay-rolls he had forwarded to the War Department, and particularly noticing those for the service termed authorized, remarks: "When the Accountant received the first estimates, he required explanations relative to these claims, and afterwards a certificate from the Governor that the militia had been called into service for the defensive protection of the frontiers. This requisition I transmitted to his Excellency, who made a statement of the militia services; I transmitted it to the Secretary of War, from whom I received a letter which encouraged the hope that those claims would be admitted and paid; and other letters afterwards received from the Accountant confirmed this belief. However, from the peculiar circumstances of the Government at that time, the attention of the Secretary of War was wholly occupied upon other objects, and he left the Department before any decision took place. It is proper to observe, the citizens of Georgia never thought the force authorized by the President of the United States adequate to the protection of the frontiers."

From the foregoing exposition of the papers submitted to the examination of the committee, and the contents of others yet to be noticed, the following facts seem to be established: That during the years 1792, 1793, and 1794, the State of Georgia was almost constantly in a state of serious alarm and danger from Indian hostilities, against which she was not permitted to defend herself, as was her obvious policy, by carrying the war into the enemy's country, and by burning and destroying their villages and crops, to relieve her citizens from the painful necessity of being for years in arms upon her frontiers. That Georgia was not permitted to pursue this course, because it was the duty and one of the attributes of the Federal Government "to provide for the common defence;" and its policy in this instance, having a due regard to the safety of other parts of the Union, and the success of pending negotiations with other Indian tribes, forbade war with the Creek and Cherokee Indians. That the President became at length seriously convinced of the dangerous situation of the State, and, not having Federal troops at his disposal, did on the 27th of October, 1792, invest the Governor of Georgia with discretionary powers in relation to the force to be employed for the safety of the inhabitants, but confined his operations strictly to defensive measures. That the Governor continued in the exercise of this discretionary power until the 30th May, when it was suspended by a letter of that date from the Secretary of War; but from the increasing pressure upon every part of the frontier, the power to act discretionarily was again restored in the broadest terms in the letter of the Secretary of War of the 10th of June, wherein he says: "The State of Georgia being invaded, or in imminent danger thereof, the measures taken by your Excellency may be considered as indispensable. You are the judge of the degree of danger, and of its duration, and will undoubtedly proportion the defence to the exigencies." So ample was this power thus given for defensive purposes, that in its exercise the Governor of Georgia was not restricted to the use of the means within the State, but was informed that the Governor of South Carolina had been required, should he request it, to order a detachment of the militia of that State to his assistance. That, under this authority, the Governor of Georgia did call out and place under the command of the Federal officers in that State, large bodies of militia, who were employed along a frontier of nearly four hundred miles for defensive purposes, during the periods to which this inquiry was directed. The services of which troops are acknowledged, and the estimates of the pay claimed by them, amounting to $129,375 66, are found in the documents examined by the committee, and in relation to which the then Secretary of War, Mr. Pickens, wrote the agent of the War Department in Georgia in August, 1795: "The large estimate for services, about which my predecessor doubted, I have looked into, and will immediately further examine. From the complexion of these claims, connected with the Governor's certificate, which I received enclosed in your letter of the 28d of June, I am inclined to think that they must be generally admitted."

And, again, in a communication to the Governor in September following, the Secretary of War assures him that "money for paying the Georgia militia is preparing to be forwarded. No delay will take place that is avoidable. The post is on the point of starting. I shall write you particularly by the next."

That the President did intend to intrust the defence of the State of Georgia to the discretion of the Governor is apparent from his requiring, as necessary to a decision on these claims, his Excellency's certificate that the troops were called into service by him, and employed for defensive purposes. That they were not, therefore, admitted and paid by the Administration under which they were authorized, can be accounted for only upon the grounds suggested by the agent of the War Department, that, "from the peculiar circumstances of the Government at that time, the attention of the Secretary of War was wholly occupied upon other objects, and he left the Department before and decision" could be made.

Under this view of the subject, your committee are of opinion that the defence of Georgia was a necessary measure on the part of the Federal Government, but became expensive and protracted from the peculiar situation of the United States, which did not permit an invasion of the Indian territory; that the forces employed by the Governor in defensive operations under the authority of the President, did not exceed the exigencies of a frontier of nearly four hundred miles, constantly exposed to the incursions of treacherous enemies inhabiting the adjacent territory, and whose security from pursuit enabled them to concert in safety upon the very confines of the State, their plans of robbery and murder; and, consequently, the expenses of this defence are justly chargeable against the United States. They, therefore, recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to report a bill appropriating $120,375 66 in full discharge of the militia claims of Georgia.

FRIDAY, April 19.

General Appropriation Bill—Stoppage of Pay to such Officers as may be Indebted to the United States.

The Senate then resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the appropriation bill for the civil list; the question being on the amendment proposing to extend to the military appropriation bill heretofore passed, the provision prohibiting the payment of the salary of any person while he shall appear to be in arrears to the United States. The amendment to the provision was adopted without a division.

Mr. EATON thought the proviso in the bill altogether inexpedient, and would prefer to strike it out; but believing that would not be acceded to, he should make no such attempt, but be satisfied with an endeavor to qualify it. As it stood, it amounted to a declaration that there was no honesty amongst the public officers of this Government—a charge he was unwilling to make, for the reason that he did not think it was deserved. The provision, in its operation, would, he thought, produce much injury; officers of the Army and Navy on distant service, might not be able to settle their accounts within the period limited by law; the adduction of vouchers could alone remove the debit resting against them; and, until this was done, their salary or pay could not be received by their families. He said the black book, as it was usually called, was a very sufficient argument against the provision as it stood. Last year the balances reported amounted to 15 millions of dollars; and, although during the last year 10 millions of this had been settled, there had been paid the inconsiderable sum of $80,000. Under the operation of this bill, none of those charged as defaulters could have received any salary due them, although upon a settlement scarcely any thing was found to be due. He therefore moved to amend the provisions so as to apply to arrears which shall "arise under any judgment had against the party; or where the balance is ascertained to be justly and equitably due."

A debate ensued on this and other amendments, which continued about three hours, of which the following is a very brief view:

Mr. LLOYD did not approve of this provision, because he suspected the honesty of any officer of the Government, or because he had any confidence that the statement of the list of balances implied that the persons there named were defaulters—he knew its fallacy too well to believe that to be the case; but he supported this provision on the broad principle, that every man indebted to the people ought to discharge that debt before he receives any more of the people's money for his services; and he argued at some length to enforce the correctness of the principle, and the expediency of carrying it into operation. He would, however, be willing to modify the provision; and read an amendment which he intended to offer.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, was utterly opposed to the amendment offered by Mr. EATON, as it would do away the value and utility of the provision, and establish an odious discrimination amongst the public debtors. It would give to those who keep back from a settlement of their accounts a preference over those who come forward and settle promptly, because those who settled and were found indebted would be subject to its operation, while those who avoided settlement would be exempted from the provision. He knew there was the power of coercion by suit, but it had not heretofore been effectual, either from the neglect of those who ought to prosecute, or the address of debtors in warding it off. This amendment, he said, would moreover give an improper power of discrimination to the Executive branch of the Government, &c. He was therefore in favor of the rigid enforcement of the provision; but the committee had this morning agreed to propose an amendment, which would go to embrace those only who should have been in arrear one year; and he spoke to show that this would be a sufficient relaxation of the principle. He would withhold not a dollar from any officer, which they had a right to; but, while they were indebted to the public, every dollar due to them should go to the payment of that debt. As related to members of Congress, there was no danger that the people would elect men who were indebted to the public and could not or would not settle—they would never elect defaulters.

Mr. VAN BUREN thought that the principle and object of the provision were correct; but its application to the extent proposed by Mr. Holmes would be carrying it too far—this was the danger in the adoption of all new principles. The adoption of this provision to the extent it came from the other House, would be an instance in which, in the attempt to do right, they would fall into the error of doing wrong; it would be acting on the incorrect presumption that the Government was always right, and the individuals always wrong, in their statements. He cited cases in which men were apparently indebted to the Government, yet who owed nothing justly—amongst the examples was that in which officers received during the war Treasury notes at par—they were compelled to receive them at par—and were obliged to disburse them at a loss, and thus became losers and apparent debtors; they had an equitable claim on the Government for the difference, but the accounting officers could not allow it, and the disbursing officers of course continued to appear, and were reported debtors to the Government. He asked if men standing in this predicament, gallant and heroic men, who had sustained the honor of their country in the hour of danger, should be kept out of their just dues for such a reason? He argued at some length to show that, for these and other reasons, the provision ought to be modified at least, if not expunged altogether, and spoke to show that the amendment suggested by Mr. Holmes would not remove the unjust and oppressive operation of the provision. He would prefer the amendment of Mr. Lloyd, but even then it would be a harsh and often an unjust provision; arguing that the whole would be retroactive, so far as it applied to those who had made contracts on the public faith, and would have all the odious character of an ex post facto law; would be ruinous, &c.

General Appropriation Bill.

[SENATE.]

Mr. SMITH avowed himself in favor of the clause as it came from the House of Representatives—and, if it were to be modified, he would take only that modification which was suggested by Mr. HOLMES. The clause had in view simply to compel those who owed the public to pay their debts, and this was called an ex post facto law. He exhibited to the Senate, for he could not undertake to read them, the voluminous lists of those who had been reported public debtors of more than three years' standing, to show the necessity of this provision. He replied to, and rebutted, in detail, the arguments of those gentlemen who had opposed the provision. He was not apprehensive that it would apply to members of Congress—he knew not of any to whom it would apply; but, if it did, it would be right and just: he deemed it in the highest degree reprehensible for any man intrusted with the public money to lay his hands on it; and such a man ought to be excluded from the public confidence.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, did not view the large books exhibited by Mr. SMITH to the Senate, in the same light as that gentleman; he felt for those volumes no respect or veneration, for he considered them as no more than official slander. He cited a case, with which he was personally acquainted, in which one gentleman, who lost his life in the service of his country, had been represented as a delinquent to the amount of $36,000, which account, on an examination, had been pared down to $2,500, to show how fallacious the official lists of balances were. Many appeared defaulters because they lost their vouchers in the chances of war; some of his friends thus appeared, whose vouchers were sunk in the waves of Lake Erie, when the holders were more intent on meeting the enemy than in preserving papers. He referred to other cases in which men would be thrown under the operation of the provision, by having become the securities of disbursing officers; and was opposed to any measure which would embrace in one sweep the swindler and the honest man. He argued, also, that the law was already ample; because new appointments must be submitted to the Senate, and those now in office were at the will of the President, and could now be dismissed where they were delinquent. The Government had, moreover, the power of bringing suit, and could even take the body, and imprison the debtor at pleasure, when the pound of flesh must be exacted; and he concluded by declaring he thought it the most exceptionable principle that was ever ingrafted in the laws, because it would operate retrospectively, and of course on those who had fought the battles of the country.

Mr. LOWRIE said the simple principle of this provision was, that no money ought to be paid by the Government to a man who is indebted to the Government. If this principle were put to any farmer in the country, he would approve it: it was also conformable to the rules of the Senate in the case of appointment; when persons were nominated to office, they were referred to a committee to ascertain if they had settled up their public accounts. But it was argued there were difficulties in the way of the adoption of this principle; and these difficulties, Mr. L. argued to show, were not substantial. As to the list of balances, he drew no argument from that in favor of this provision; for he knew the nature of that list too well, and doubted the expediency even of printing it, while the accounts were in a course of settlement. Mr. L. replied to some of the objections of Mr. VAN BUREN, and concluded that, although there would be cases of much hardship, under this provision, yet it would do much good, and he was in favor of it. The Heads of the Departments had decided, he learned, that every officer could settle his accounts within a year, and the amendment of Mr. HOLMES would place the provision on the principle adopted by the departments.

MESSRS. VAN BUREN, HOLMES, LOWRIE, and SMITH, severally enforced their views on this subject.

Mr. RODNEY presumed no one would deny that an officer who was an ascertained and bona fide debtor to the Government, ought to be made to pay the debt, and that the provision under consideration ought to apply to all such. So far, all would doubtless agree to, but it was impolitic, he argued, to go further. The great list of balances which had last year overshadowed the country, had been in one year, it appeared, reduced ten millions, and scarcely any part of these ten millions of settled accounts was found due; that book was no evidence of delinquency, and ought to have no influence on the present question. Should the provision be adopted in its full extent, it would allow too much to interpretation, too much to the discretion of the accounting officers, who would then have it in their power to favor some in the settlement of their accounts, while they keep others in suspense, and thus be enabled, by partiality, to commit injustice, &c.

Mr. LLOYD, whose only object was to obtain payment of the public money, moved to modify Mr. EATON's amendment, conformably to what he had suggested previously, but the modification was negatived—yeas 14, nays 14.

The question was then taken on Mr. EATON's amendment, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, D'Wolf, Eaton, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Knight, Lanman, Parrott, Pleasants, Rodney, Seymour, Southard, Stokes, Talbot, Van Buren—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Chandler, Dickerson, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of New York, Lloyd, Lowrie, Macon, Morrill, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Smith, Taylor, Thomas, Walker, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—21.

Mr. LLOYD then moved to amend the provision to read as follows:

SENATE.]

Stoppage of Pay to Defaulters.

[APRIL, 1822.]

That no money appropriated by this act, shall be paid to any person for his compensation who is a debtor to the United States, on an account stated and admitted, or on judgment, until such person shall have paid into the Treasury, or secured to be paid into the Treasury, in such manner as the President may direct and approve, all sums for which he may be so indebted.

The question was taken, without debate, on agreeing to this amendment, and was negatived, by yeas and nays—yeas 19, nays 22.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, the provision was amended so as to limit its operation to those who have been for one year in arrears—yeas 25.

Mr. FINDLAY, in answer to those who had said this was a novel principle, stated that the principle had been in operation several years in Pennsylvania; that when adopted there, it was objected to for reasons similar to those used by its opponents on the present occasion; but none of the objections or inconveniences predicted, had in practice been realized. He had assisted in its adoption there, and he had no doubt its effects would be equally as salutary in personal affairs. He did not, however, approve of the exact shape of this provision, and moved a slight amendment; but it was negatived.

Mr. VAN BUREN then, for the reasons he had previously offered on this point, moved to add to the provision the following:

Provided, further, That nothing in this section contained, shall extend to balances arising solely from the depreciation of Treasury notes, received by such person to be expended in the public service.

This amendment was agreed to by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd, Pleasants, Seymour, Stokes, Van Buren, Williams of Tennessee—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Chandler, Dickerson, Gailard, Holmes of Maine, Lowrie, Macon, Morrill, Noble, Parrott, Ruggles, Smith, Southard, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Walker, and Williams of Mississippi—18.

Mr. BARBOUR asked if it was designed to apply the principle of this provision to those who became debtors by being security for public officers; if so, he thought it would be carrying the principle too far, and therefore moved an amendment, making the provision to embrace principal debtors only.

This amendment was opposed by Messrs. LLOYD, HOLMES, of Maine, and WALKER, as an inexpedient and unnecessary discrimination; and it was advocated by Messrs. EDWARDS, TALBOT, BARBOUR, and JOHNSON of Kentucky, on the ground of its justice and expediency, and its conformity to legal principles. After considerable debate, the amendment was negatived—yeas 17, nays 18.

The Senate then proceeded with the bill, and made some unimportant amendments, and then laid the bill on the table.

SATURDAY, April 20.

General Appropriation Bill—Repair of the Cumberland Road.

The Senate again resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the General Appropriation bill.

Mr. TALBOT moved to insert in the bill an appropriation of $9,000, for repairing the national road from Cumberland to Wheeling; on which motion a brief debate took place.

Mr. BARBOUR remarked, that in opposing the motion, he must disclaim any hostility to the road, whose improvement was the object of the appropriation. So far from it, he considered it as a monument of the liberality of the national councils, and, as far as a freedom of intercourse for social or commercial purposes is friendly to good feelings, in so far was it important to the strengthening of the Union. Whatever might have been the constitutional objections at the commencement of this question, said Mr. B., our predecessors, among whom we find some of the most distinguished men this country ever produced, and remarkable for the correctness of their reading of the constitution, resolved, and with the consent of the States of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, to complete this great national measure, so essential to the interests of vast regions of our country, and have actually expended $1,800,000, by successive appropriations, for near twenty years. To refuse now a pittance to keep this road in repair, established under such circumstances, would indicate a versatility of political opinions, and so fatal to the public interests, as to bring a reproach on our Government. But Mr. B. remarked that he opposed the motion on the ground that it was impolitic to incorporate a provision in this bill, which could not be expected to succeed, and by which this important act of legislation, so essential to the interests of thousands, and whose just claims have been already too long delayed, would be further postponed. Furthermore, it was known that a bill was now pending in both Houses to erect toll-gates on this road. This was perfectly correct, because those who use ought to pay for keeping it in repair. If at the time when that bill comes up, a motion should be made for an appropriation to put the road in a condition to justify the erection of toll-gates, Mr. B. said, as at present advised, he should vote for it.

The appropriation was advocated by Messrs. TALBOT, LLOYD, HOLMES, and RUGGLES, and was agreed to—yeas 21, nays 10.

Stoppage of Pay to Defaulters.

Mr. TALBOT then moved to strike out the clause of the bill which provides that "no person that has been in arrears one year to the United States, shall receive any compensation under this act, until he shall have accounted for and paid into the Treasury all sums for which he may be liable;" and in lieu thereof, to insert the following as a new and distinct section:

And be it further enacted, That no person or persons entitled to receive moneys from the United States in virtue of this or any other act for the appropriation of moneys, enacted during the present session of Congress, shall receive payment thereof, if any such person or persons shall be at the time of application for such payment, really and truly indebted to the United States on his or their own account, either by judgment not enjoined or appeal from, by bond or other obligation on which no credits are claimed, or by account which shall have been finally closed and settled at the proper department, and which has not been appealed from or contested, until all sums thus due from such applicant shall have been paid up or satisfactorily secured.

A division of the question was required by Mr. WILLIAMS of Tennessee, so as to be first taken on striking out the existing provision.

Mr. TALBOT avowed his concurrence in what appeared to be the almost unanimous opinion of the Senate as to the correctness of the general principle of this provision; but, for the reasons which he submitted in detail, he preferred it in the shape which he had proposed. He could never believe that it was proper, equitable, or just, to carry the principle to securities, however just it was to look to securities in the last resort for payment of a debt due the Government.

Mr. D'WOLF delivered his sentiments at some length against the whole provision. He thought it inexpedient in principle, that it would be a disgrace to the Government, and hoped in God it would be rejected altogether.

Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. HOLMES of Maine, and Mr. VAN BUREN, severally added some remarks; when

The question was taken first on striking out the provision, and was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lloyd, Parrott, Pleasants, Rodney, Seymour, Southard, Talbot, and Van Buren—17.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Brown of Ohio, Chandler, Dickerson, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of New York, Lowrie, Macon, Morrill, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Smith, Thomas, Walker, Ware, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—22.

And the proposition of Mr. TALBOT fell of course.

Mr. BARBOUR, encouraged by the nearly equal division of the Senate, in Committee of the Whole, renewed the motion which he offered without success in committee, to make the provision applicable to principal debtors only, and not to include securities.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, briefly opposed this amendment; and Mr. RODNEY submitted the grounds why, in such a case as the provision contemplated, the discrimination between the principal debtor and his security was proper, just, and expedient; repeating his concurrence in the soundness of the general principle, which he approved so heartily, that he should prefer to see one so important and valuable in a separate act, instead of a simple proviso in a common appropriation bill.

Mr. KING, of New York, Mr. D'WOLF, and Mr. VAN BUREN, added a few words each; when the question was taken on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. BARBOUR to except securities, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Knight, Pleasants, Rodney, Seymour, Southard, Stokes, Talbot, Van Buren—19.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Chandler, D'Wolf, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of New York, Lanman, Lloyd, Lowrie, Macon, Morrill, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Smith, Taylor, Thomas, Walker, Ware, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—28.

Mr. LLOYD then moved the adoption of the following, as an additional proviso to the section:

Provided, also, That no person shall be considered as in arrears under the provision of this act, unless on bond or obligation for the payment of money, upon which credits have not been claimed: on a claim confessed or admitted or on judgment tendered in a court of law: And on securing the arrears to be paid into the Treasury, in such manner as the President may direct and approve, such debtor shall not be liable to the provisions of this act.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, objected to the amendment; and Mr. LLOYD offered at some length his reasons in favor of it—deeming it consistent with the principle of the provision, which he heartily approved, but the proviso he thought necessary to give the principle its fair and just operation. Mr. D'WOLF reiterated his decided hostility, and his objection to the whole principle of the proviso, which he deemed injurious to the honor of the nation.

The question was then taken on the proviso offered by Mr. LLOYD, and negatived, by yeas and nays:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, D'Wolf, Eaton, Edwards, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lloyd, Parrott, Pleasants, Rodney, Seymour, Southard, Stokes, Talbot, and Van Buren—20.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Benton, Chandler, Dickerson, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of New York, Knight, Lowrie, Macon, Morrill, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Smith, Taylor, Thomas, Walker, Ware, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—22.

Mr. EATON then offered the following, as an amendment of the proviso:

"But in all cases where the pay or salary of any person is withheld in pursuance of this act, it shall be the duty of the accounting officers, if demanded by his agent or attorney, to report forthwith to the agent of the Treasury Department the balance due; and it shall be the duty of said agent, within sixty days thereafter, to order suit to be commenced against such delinquent and his sureties; and on failing to do so, the pay or salary of such supposed delinquent shall not be withheld."

An earnest, and in some degree warm, discussion of this amendment ensued, in which Messrs. EATON, HOLMES of Maine, JOHNSON of Kentucky, LOWRIE, VAN BUREN, and D'WOLF, took part, and which turned, incidentally, on the general principle of the provision also.

Mr. WALKER moved to expunge that part of the amendment which followed the word "sureties;" which modification, after some debate, in which Mr. WALKER, EATON, and BROWN of Ohio, took part, was accepted by Mr. EATON.

The amendment, as modified, was then agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, for the reasons that he submitted, offered the following additional proviso:

Provided, nevertheless, The person so applying and claiming the right to be sued, shall first tender to the public officer ample security to indemnify the Government against the costs of the suit.

The proviso was negatived, yeas 16, nays 21.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, then offered an amendment, to exempt from the operation of the provision those persons who stand in arrears as the sureties for disbursing officers during the late war, unless where judgment has been rendered against himself or principal.

The amendment was negatived, by yeas and nays—14 to 25, as follows:

YAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, Eaton, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Pleasants, Rodney, Seymour, Talbot, and Van Buren.

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Chandler, D'Wolf, Dickerson, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Macon, Morrill, Noble, Parrott, Ruggles, Smith, Southard, Taylor, Thomas, Walker, Ware, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

MONDAY, April 22.

Revolutionary Pensions.

The Senate took up in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives, supplementary to the acts of 1818 and 1820, allowing pensions to Revolutionary soldiers, &c.

[Under the act of 1820, several thousand pensioners were stricken from the pension roll, who were deficient in the proofs necessary to entitle them to be continued on the roll.* Subsequently those so stricken off presented further proofs in support of their right to enjoy the benefits of the act of 1818; but the Attorney-General, whose opinion was taken in the case by the Secretary of War, decided that the persons who had been struck from the roll, under the act of 1820, could not, even on the adduction of further proof, be restored thereto by the Secretary of War, inasmuch as the Secretary's authority has ceased, as related to them. And the present bill was intended to "authorize and require the Secretary of War to restore to the list of pensioners the name of any person who may have been, or hereafter shall be, stricken therefrom, in pursuance of the act of 1820, whenever such person, so stricken from the list of pensioners, shall furnish evidence, in pursuance of the provisions of said act, to satisfy the Secretary of War that he is in such indigent circumstances as to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country."]

The Committee on Pensions, to which this bill had been referred, reported the same with a recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed; and the question was on agreeing to this recommendation.

On this question a debate ensued, which continued nearly two hours. The indefinite postponement was opposed by Messrs. DICKERSON and MORRILL; and it was supported by Messrs. NOBLE and BROWN of Louisiana. The question being taken on the indefinite postponement of the bill, it was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Benton, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, D'Wolf, Edwards, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lloyd, Lowrie, Macon,

* PENSIONERS.—In the short synopsis which we published on Tuesday in the Senate proceedings, of the operation of the pension act of 1820, and the object of the bill recently before Congress, some pains were taken by our reporter that the facts should be correctly stated, and, with that view, the statement was submitted to one or two of those who were presumed to be most familiar with the subject. It appears, however, by the subjoined letter from the gentleman who superintends the Pension department, that the statement is in some respects liable to misconstruction: which letter, to avoid any further misapprehension, we think it best to insert entire.—*Editors Nat. WAR DEPARTMENT, PENSION OFFICE, 23d April, 1822.

GENTLEMEN: There is an error in your report of the proceedings of the Senate of yesterday. It is therein stated, that "several thousand were stricken from the pension roll who were deficient in the proofs necessary to entitle them to be continued on the roll." Not so. Not a man has been dropped from the list under the act of May, 1820, who has not exhibited "the proofs necessary." I.e. the evidence prescribed by law, a schedule of property: but the bill which passed the House, and which was rejected by the Senate, authorized the Secretary of War to restore those to the roll who, since they were dropped therefrom, have become indigent enough to need "the aid of public or private charity." The publication, you will readily perceive, is calculated to lead to a very unfavorable conclusion, in regard to the due administration of the law; because, on referring to the act, it will be found that no authority is given to the Secretary to drop any name from the list, except on the evidence of the schedule. Be pleased to correct the error, and oblige your obedient servant.

WEDNESDAY, April 24.

Lead Mines Revenue.

Mr. BENTON submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to make known to the Senate, whether any revenue has accrued to the United States, and if any, how much, from leases of lead mines in the valley of the Mississippi; whether any lease, promise, or agreement, is now in force for the use and occupation of any such mines, with copies thereof, if written, and the substance thereof, if verbal; with the names of the lessees, and their places of residence; whether the said leases, if any such there are, have been made with or without public notice, at auction or by private contract, by whom and with whom, with a copy of the powers under which each acted; also, a copy of the regulations, if any have been made, for carrying into effect the acts of Congress which authorized the lease of lead mines.

Importation of Spirits.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, delivered in the following report; which was read, and ordered to be printed:

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the importation of foreign spirits, report :

That, in their opinion, the agricultural as well as manufacturing interest of the United States would be promoted by prohibiting the importation of foreign spirits. That the quantity of spirits that would in a short time be manufactured in this country to supply the place of that now imported, would afford a source of revenue more efficient, and much less precarious than that now derived from the importation of foreign spirits. But, as an immediate prohibition would injure the commercial interest of the United States, as well as diminish the revenue, until a system of excise could be brought into operation, the committee think it would be expedient to arrive gradually at the objects in view, by increasing the duties on foreign spirits. A bill, however, for this purpose, must be considered as a bill for raising revenue, and can only originate in the House of Representatives. The committee therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the importation of foreign spirits.

Navy Appropriations.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the Navy appropriation bill, Mr. PLEASANTS withdrew the amendment he offered on Monday to the bill, to make an additional appropriation for the suppression of piracy—having ascertained that the object was provided for, and the amendment unnecessary.

Mr. KING, of New York, moved to recommit the bill to the Finance Committee, with instructions to strike out the clause (inserted on Monday) providing that, when the Navy rations are drawn in money, the ration shall be valued at twenty cents (instead of 25 cents, which the regulations of the Navy have, since 1814, fixed the commutation price of the ration at

On this motion a long discussion took place, which continued until three o'clock, and in which Messrs. KING of New York, HOLMES of Maine, PARROTT, CHANDLER, PLEASANTS, JOHNSON of Louisiana, LANMAN, EATON, LOWRIE, BROWN of Ohio, MACON, and WALKER, took part. The motion to recommit the bill for the purpose stated, was ultimately agreed to.

THURSDAY, April 25.

Importation of Slaves.

Mr. EATON submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate the report of the Attorney-General, relative to any persons (citizens of the United States) who have been charged with, or suspected of, introducing any slaves into the United States, contrary to existing laws.

Lead Mine Rents.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of the 24th instant, for requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate certain information relating to certain lead mines in the valley of the Mississippi, and agreed thereto.

The Fur Trade of the West—Its Value as a Branch of Commerce and as a Means of controlling the Indians—Its Regulation as a Free Trade in the hands of Licensed Citizens.

The Senate then took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend the act of 1802, regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes.

Mr. BENTON moved an amendment to the first section in the following words : "And the power to grant licenses shall be vested in persons at points convenient for carrying on the trade."

[The bill and amendments propose to place the fur trade on liberal principles; opens it to all American citizens, and none others; vests in Superintendents of Indian Affairs, and Indian agents, the power to grant licenses for two years with the near tribes, and seven years with the remote tribes beyond the Mississippi; subjects to seizure and forfeiture the goods of all traders who carry ardent spirits to trade with the Indians; and repeals the section of the former act which subjects the traders' license to be recalled without notice or proof of misconduct.]

Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, spoke in support of the bill and these amendments.

He considered the fur trade as an object of national concern, and entitled to the notice of the Senate. He spoke of it in two points of view:

1. As a branch of commerce.
2. As the means of controlling the Indians.

On the first point—Mr. B. quoted several books to show the value of the fur trade, as carried on under the Spanish Government, at St. Louis; under the Republic, at the same place; and by the British trading companies on the waters of the Mississippi and Missouri, and on the lakes and rivers out towards the Arctic region.

The work of Perrin, a French writer, sent by Napoleon to examine the resources of Louisiana, about the year 1800, estimates the furs, robes, and peltries, taken on the waters of the Missouri, at 600,000 livres tournois annually, and those taken on the waters of the Upper Mississippi at 1,200,000; the latter being almost exclusively in the hands of the British.

The work of Major Stoddart, written in 1804, states the value of this trade, at St. Louis alone, to have averaged $208,000 annually, for fifteen years before the transfer of the province, amounting, in the whole, to upwards of $3,000,000 in that time.

Mr. B. exhibited a table which showed the value of the trade for the year 1816. It was taken from the office of the Superintendent of Indian affairs at St. Louis, (Governor Clark,) and embraced all the business done within the limits of the United States by the American and British traders, and by the United States factories, and amounted to $441,200; of which $29,800 was exported by the way of New Orleans; $122,020 was taken up the Ohio River into the Atlantic States; $258,400 was taken through the Canadas, on the line of the Illinois River, the lakes, and the St. Lawrence; and the remainder, $81,000, was consumed in the country.

Mr. B. referred to Sir Alexander McKenzie's History of the Fur Trade, and Winterbotham's View of America, to show the value of this trade, as carried on by the Northwest and Hudson Bay Companies. The first had amounted, annually, for forty years, to a million and a quarter of dollars per annum—fifty millions in the whole; and much of it taken from the territory of the United States. The second, being a monopoly for a long time in the hands of Crown favorites, produced but a trifle, say $140,000 annually, until the late Earl of Selkirk purchased the charter, and came in person to push the trade. The two companies are now united. The name of the Northwest is merged in that of Hudson's Bay, under whose charter the trade is now carried on with increased activity, and with such prospect of emolument that the stock of the company is quoted, in the latest London papers, at one hundred per cent. advance.

Mr. B. said, that the trade in the hands of American citizens had not increased for some years. A rivalry had existed between the private traders and the Government traders; and the latter, having the ear of the Government, had been able to prejudice the former, without doing anything themselves proportionate to the capital of $800,000, which was placed in their hands. He had not precise data for fixing the amount of the private capital now embarked, but would estimate it at $120,000 for the waters of the Upper Mississippi, and $200,000 for the Missouri and its tributaries. These sums were intended to cover only the stock in trade; the expenses in boats, boatmen, provisions, clerks, interpreters, &c., was a distinct item, and a large one, amounting, in some instances, to seventy-five per cent. upon the capital.

Mr. B. said, that this view was sufficient to show that the fur trade, as a branch of commerce, was entitled to the notice of statesmen and to the protection of the Government; yet he had only presented a limited view of its value; he had confined his observations to the waters of the Upper Mississippi, and to the Missouri below the Mandan Villages; he had not carried the eyes of the Senate to the Rocky Mountains, and shown them there the richest fur region in the world, belonging, by law, to the citizens of the Republic, and possessed, in fact, by the subjects of the British Crown. The Republic owns the section of the Rocky Mountains between the latitude of 42 and 49 north, say 500 miles from north to south, and, on an average, 800 wide; the summits of the ridges penetrating the region of perpetual snow; the valleys rich and beautiful, covered with grass, clover, wood, and wild fruits, finely watered; abounding in horses, buffaloes, antelopes, and the most valuable of the furred animals, not excepting the ermine; in a word, presenting all the characteristics of the Alpine region in Switzerland, before it was cultivated. The Republic was indebted to the enterprise of Lewis and Clark for the discovery of this rich region. Several companies of American citizens had attempted to avail themselves of that discovery. Lisa, who, with 250 men, ascended the Missouri to its source in 1808, and was expelled by the hostilities of the Blackfeet Indians, supposed to be instigated by the Northwest Company. Messrs. Hunt and Crooks, with 60 men, who crossed to the Columbia about the year 1811, and were compelled to abandon their enterprise, by the events of the war, which soon after broke out; and a company of 100 men, headed by Major Andrew Henry, a companion of Lisa's in the expedition of 1807, 1808, now ascending the Missouri, and who will, in all probability, be attacked by the Aricaras, the roving bands of the Sioux, or the Assiniboinas; tribes intimately associated with the British fur companies.

Taking the trade of the mountains into the estimate, and Mr. B. computed the capital it would annually employ at a million of dollars, and that it would give employment to 2,000 men. The British companies traded upon a greater capital, employed about 2,500 men, and were at this time bringing out 800 regular troops from England, to be stationed convenient to the northern bend of the Missouri, which approximates to the line of their forts and trading posts on the rivers of the Winipee Lake.

APRIL, 1822.]

The Fur Trade of the West.

[SENATE.]

The nature of the capital would enhance the value of the trade to the country. It would consist, in good part, of articles of home growth or production—powder, lead, shot, axes, hatchets, knives, guns, tobacco, and coarse fabrics of wool and cotton; many of which would be got in the West, convenient to the trade, and would give a spring to the industry, which now languishes for want of aliment to feed it.

The nature of the proceeds would still further enhance the value of the trade. It would give, in return, articles of the first value and necessity—the common furs, universally in demand as the chief material for making hats, and the richer kind, esteemed, both at home and abroad, as an article of dress; worn by monarchs for magnificence, ladies and city gentlemen for beauty, and by travellers as the best defence against frost, and commanding in foreign parts, China, Japan, Germany, and Russia, twice or thrice their value in the American market.

Mr. B. contrasted the value of the fur-trade with the commerce carried on with many foreign powers, and for the protection and preservation of which the Republic keeps up expensive establishments of embassies, consuls, and ships of war, and which consume less amounts of American produce, and give in return articles of incomparably less value. He particularized the commerce of Russia, which consumes $147,000 of American produce, (taking the year 1822 as the criterion,) and gives in return raw hemp, or its fabrics, to the prejudice of the growers of hemp in the Western States; the trade with Sweden, which takes $154,000, and returns iron, to the manifest injury of our own districts which produce that metal; with Portugal, which takes $147,000, and sends wine, to put our own whiskey out of countenance, and discourage the grain growers; and all the ports in the Mediterranean, Levant, and Adriatic seas, taking in the whole, but $615,000, and sending back articles of taste and fancy, of little or no substantial use. Mr. B. considered all this commerce as a miserable object compared to the fur trade; yet the latter was neglected, and the richest part of it left to the quiet enjoyment of the British, to the great prejudice of the Western States; while the former was cherished, at an annual expense of more than half a million of dollars, in ambassadors, consuls, and naval armaments; and the slightest interruption to it would be considered, by all the Cis-Alleganian States, as just ground of complaint and remonstrance on the part of the Republic.

Mr. B. spoke of Mr. Jefferson's ideas, suggested in his instructions to Lewis and Clark—the practicability of taking the furs of the Rocky Mountains direct to China, upon the line of the Columbia River and the Pacific Ocean. He said the problem had been resolved; it had been done; it was done by the company which crossed the mountains in 1811, and there was no difficulty in it. The Columbia River was of easy navigation, a good harbor in its mouth, and the Pacific Ocean void of peril. The region of the mountains, so formidable to the progress of Lewis and Clark, is now traversed by various and easy passes. The first and main ridge is crossed upon a good road, made by buffaloes and Indians, leading from the Falls of Missouri to the forks of Clark's River, (150 miles;) points between which the first discoverers travelled about 1,200. The next bed of mountains on which they found snow twelve feet deep in June, is now turned upon the right by descending Clark's River two or three degrees, and then passing west, over land through an open level country, to Lake Wayton, whence issues the navigable Lantau River, entering the Columbia at a short distance, and avoiding the falls and rapids at the foot of the mountains. Mr. B. had no doubt but that East India goods would enter the valley of the Mississippi upon the same route. He would not discuss the question now, but he would say, that the sea between America and Asia was peaceful; that the tide flowed up the Columbia 183 miles; that the river was deep and gentle, and periodically flooded; that the land carriage was short and easy, over a region which furnished snow for sleighs six months in the year, and convenient to the fine horses on the Plains of the Columbia; that the longest part of the route was in the descent of the Missouri, (2,575 miles from the falls to the Mississippi,) which, being down the stream, was nothing; that the articles to be brought in were of little weight, great value, and small bulk, such as were once carried some thousand miles upon camels, and constituted the wealth of merchants whose opulence is yet seen in the ruins of Alexandria and Palmyra, and upon the line on which the commerce of Asia had ever flowed.

On the second point.—The fur trade is the true means of controlling the Indians. The history of these States, when colonies, and ever since, is full of the proofs. The King's Governors always operated upon the Indians through their traders. The French authorities in Canada, and in the valley of the Mississippi, did the same, and they both operated successfully upon them. The consequence was, that, in every war between the French and the British, the Indians came in more as principals than auxiliaries, and always took the side of the power to whom their respective traders belonged. In the war of the Revolution these truths were too recent not to be known, and too convincing not to prevail. The Congress of 1776, to gain the good will of the Indians, addressed themselves to the American traders. They even advanced money to purchase goods, to be sold without profit to the traders, to enable them to carry on their trade, and to preserve their influence among the neighboring tribes. The sum of 40,000 pounds sterling, was voted at one time (January, 1776) for this object; and the goods distributed to the traders at 2½ per cent. on the cost and freight. Our enemies, the British, acted upon the same principle, and with more success, because they acted with more perseverance, and had greater means at their disposal. In the late war the same results were seen. A trading-house in Pensacola directed the Creeks against us; the agents of the North West Company led a dozen nations against the frontiers of Ohio. The Republic had comparatively but few on her side. The reason was, that she had no traders among them to gain their affections; only factories, "to improve their moral and intellectual faculties, to convert them into farmers and Christians," charitable institutions, without doubt, but so little capable of controlling the warlike spirit of the savages, that the factories were themselves the first objects of attack on the breaking out of hostilities.

Mr. B. would not fatigue the Senate with further remarks on this point. He only wished to revive the recollection of the policy observed by our ancestors when Indian affairs were better understood than at present. He trusted that he had said enough to sustain the positions which he had assumed in favor of the fur trade, and shown that its importance, both as a branch of commerce, and the true means of governing the Indians, entitled it to the national protection.

The bill and amendments are calculated to give it some protection. They repeal the 7th section of the act of 1802, because that section gives to superintendents and agents the power to recall the licenses of traders, without showing cause, and trying the truth of it. He had heard of no license improperly recalled, but it might happen; and a trade so valuable, in which so large a capital would be embarked, should not be subject to a sudden suspension at the will of any man. They (the bill and amendments) authorize licenses to be granted for seven years. Heretofore they were limited to two. This period was fixed when the Mississippi was the boundary of the Republic; it is no longer an adequate time, when that river, ceasing to be the ultima thule of the trader, has become his starting point. The British companies have just had their license (charter) extended twenty-one years, and the Russians twenty; and seven years is sufficiently short for the American trader, who goes to the Rocky Mountains to contend with the former, and to the Columbia River to contend with the latter. The section intended to be repealed left the trade open to British subjects; it was obliged to do so under the third article of Mr. Jay's Treaty; but the late war had abrogated that treaty, and it was worth a war to get rid of it. The Treaty of Ghent had not revived the odious privileges of the third article, and it was the bounden duty of Congress to avail itself of this advantage, and to exclude British traders from the navigation of the Mississippi and the trade of our Indians. The bill and amendments propose to do so; they confine the licenses to American citizens, and the goods of those who have no licenses will be subject to seizure and confiscation. The bill facilitates the acquisition of licenses to American citizens, by vesting the power to grant them in officers stationed at convenient points for carrying on the trade. The Governors of Michigan and Arkansas, as superintendents, have this power. All the agents have it. A superintendency is established at St. Louis to exercise it; and this facility will give to that town the advantage which its geographical position has always claimed, and which the improvidence of Mr. Jay's Treaty had conferred upon Montreal—the advantage of being the entrepot of the American fur trade.

Mr. B. said there was a further protection due to the fur trade, not now contemplated by the bill before the Senate, and he regretted to say, not countenanced heretofore by the Congress. He alluded to the military expedition to the Upper Missouri. His local position beyond the Mississippi had given him an opportunity of gaining local intelligence, and, presuming upon this, he would differ in opinion from the majority of the Congress which had stopped this expedition. He applauded the policy which selected the Mandan villages for a military post, which intended to place on that point of approximation to the British establishments of Lake Winipeg, an adequate force to overawe her traders, and to encourage our own in carrying their commerce to the region of the Rocky Mountains. He considered this expedition as a branch of that enlightened system of national defence which, embracing the vast circumference of the Republic, and seizing at once all the commanding points on the Lake, the Gulf, the maritime and western frontier, endeavored to provide for every part an efficient and appropriate defence. He knew that a waste of money had taken place in the ascent of the Missouri, and he was willing to go all lengths with the Senate in correcting that and the like improvidences in other places; but he utterly protested against the justice of seizing upon a circumstance to defeat a plan of national defence, so honorable to the administration which had formed it, and so well calculated to secure posterity, as well as ourselves, from the calamities of a country engaged in war, and open, upon a hundred lines, by land and water, to the invasion of the enemy's arms.

MONDAY, April 29.

South American States—Diplomatic Intercourse with such of them as have Established their Independence.

The Senate, according to the order of the day, took up, in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives making an appropriation of $100,000 to defray the expenses of missions to the independent nations on the American continent.

The amendment reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations to the bill, (to increase the appropriation to $110,000, and subjecting the bill specifically to the limitations of the general law concerning the compensation of public ministers,) was negatived—Mr. KING, of New York, having expressed the opinion that they were unnecessary.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, proposed to amend the bill by adding thereto the following proviso:

"Provided, nevertheless, That no money shall be drawn from the Treasury for that purpose until the President shall be fully satisfied that such missions will not interrupt the friendly relations of the United States."

And the question being taken on the adoption of this amendment, it was decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Chandler, Eaton, Holmes of Mississippi, Lloyd, Macon, Ruggles, Smith, Taylor, and Williams of Mississippi—9.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Benton, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, Dickerson, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Morrill, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Rodney, Seymour, Stokes, Talbot, Van Buren, Walker, Ware, and Williams of Tennessee—28.

Mr. EATON proposed to amend the bill so that the President should not appoint any Minister but with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. KING, of New York, said such an amendment could not be necessary, because the Constitution of the United States was sufficiently explicit on the subject. It was only in appointments that become vacant during the recess that the President was authorized to exercise the right of appointing to office. In original appointments, where there had not been an incumbent of the office, such a power under the constitution did not attach to the Executive, and hence could not be exercised. It was quite unnecessary, therefore, to provide, by any statutory provision, for that which was already sufficiently guarded by the constitution.

Mr. E. was aware that the views of the gentleman were correct. He had no doubt but that the correct meaning of the constitution was such as was stated by Mr. King; but, however this fact might be, it was not to be disguised that the President of the United States had, by the course he had pursued on a former occasion, manifested a different understanding of the constitution. Mr. Madison had nominated Ministers to negotiate the Treaty of Ghent in the recess of the Senate; and these were not vacancies, but original appointments. If this had been acquiesced in by the Senate, and such he understood had been the case, it might be considered as authority for the Executive to adopt that course again. Such a course he thought unauthorized, and he wished, by the adoption of the amendment proposed, to say so. The Senate should retain the powers that belonged to it; nor was it less material that it should judge of the merits and qualifications of those who might be appointed.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, remarked that the constitution was certainly definite enough upon this subject; the amendment proposed could not make it more so; and he was altogether unwilling, where the rule was prescribed already by an instrument, from which neither the President nor this body had a right to depart, to attempt either to enlarge it, or to declare what should or should not be its true construction. The President was competent to judge of this matter without any opinion being offered by the Senate.

Some remarks were offered by Messrs. WALKER and KING, of Alabama, as to the practice of the Senate, the intent of the constitution, &c.; when

Mr. EATON observed, that, having referred to the Executive Journal of the Senate, from which the injunction of secrecy had been removed, he had found that the principle acted on by Mr. Madison, in relation to the Ministers who formed the Treaty of Ghent, had not been acquiesced in, but had been protested against by the Senate; it was, therefore, not to be viewed as establishing any precedent, and he would withdraw the amendment he had offered.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be read a third time, and was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Benton, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Morrill, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Rodney, Ruggles, Seymour, Southard, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Van Buren, Van Dyke, Walker, Ware, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—39.

NAYS.—Messrs. Lloyd, Macon, and Smith—3.

TUESDAY, April 30.

Repeal of Florida Territorial Laws.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, agreeably to notice, having obtained leave, introduced a bill to relieve the people of Florida from the operation of certain ordinances. [This bill proposed to repeal the ordinance of Governor Jackson, of July 18, 1821, concerning naturalization, and the ordinance of the City Council of St. Augustine, of October 19, 1821; imposes fines and imprisonment on any person who shall hereafter attempt to enforce said ordinance; and provides for refunding to the people of Florida all moneys which they have paid under said ordinances.] The bill was twice read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

United States Militia Fines.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, vesting in the respective States the right of the United States to all fines assessed for the non-performance of militia duty during the last war, and the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, tomorrow.

The bill making an appropriation to defray the expense of missions to the independent nations of the American continent, was read the third time, passed, and returned to the other House.

Trade with British West Indies.

Mr. KING, of New York, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the following bill, which was read:

Be it enacted, &c., That on satisfactory evidence being given by the President of the United States, that the ports in the islands, or colonies, in the West Indies, under the dominion of Great Britain, have been opened to the vessels of the United States, the President shall be, and hereby is, authorized to issue his proclamation, declaring that the ports of the United States shall thereafter be open to the vessels of Great Britain, employed in the trade and intercourse between the United States and such islands or colonies, subject to such reciprocal rules and restrictions as the President of the United States may by such proclamation make and publish, any thing in the laws, entitled "An act concerning navigation," or an act, entitled "An act supplementary to an act concerning navigation," to the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

WEDNESDAY, May 1.

Trade to Norway.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In the Message to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of their present session, it was mentioned that the Government of Norway had issued an ordinance for admitting the vessels of the United States and their cargoes into the ports of that Kingdom, upon the payment of no other or higher duties than are paid by Norwegian vessels, of whatever articles the said cargoes may consist, and from whatever ports the vessels laden with them may come.

In communicating this ordinance to the Government of the United States, that of Norway has requested the benefit of a similar and reciprocal provision for the vessels of Norway, and their cargoes, which may enter the ports of the United States.

This provision being within the competency only of the legislative authority of Congress, I communicate to them, herewith, copies of the communications received from the Norwegian Government in relation to the subject, and recommend the same to their consideration.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, May 1, 1822.

The Message and documents were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Vaccination.

The bill from the House of Representatives to repeal the act concerning vaccination was next resumed.

Mr. LLOYD laid before the Senate an explanatory letter from the late vaccine agent, (Dr. Smith,) and moved that the bill with the letter be recommitted; but, after some debate, this motion was lost.

It was then moved to postpone the bill indefinitely; and a debate of considerable duration followed, in which Messrs. MORRILL, MACON, LLOYD, DICKERSON, HOLMES of Maine, EATON, and others took part. This motion was also lost; and then the bill was ordered to a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barbour, Barton, Benton, Brown of Louisiana, Brown of Ohio, Chandler, Dickerson, Findlay, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lamm, Lloyd, Lowrie, Macon, Pleasants, Rodney, Smith, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Van Dyke, Walker, Ware, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—29.

NAYS.—Messrs. Eaton, Edwards, Knight, Morrill, Parrott, and Ruggles—9.

Duties on French Vessels.

The bill in addition to the acts concerning navigation, having been previously read a second time, was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING, of New York, moved the addition of the following section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in the event of the signature of any treaty or convention concerning the navigation or commerce between the United States and France, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, should he deem the same expedient, by proclamation, to suspend, until the end of the next session of Congress, the operation of the act, entitled "An act to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships and vessels, and for other purposes;" and also to suspend, as aforesaid, all other duties on French vessels, or the goods imported in the same, which may exceed the duties on American vessels, and on similar goods imported in the same.

Mr. KING remarked that this section was intended to enable the President of the United States to meet France, in case that Government should, before the next session of Congress, remove the existing commercial difficulties between the two countries, by repealing what was usually termed her "eighteen dollar act." He did not say what probability there was of a removal of these difficulties; he could only say there was a hope, an anxious hope, entertained for their removal—and, should that event happily occur, the section now proposed would enable the President to meet promptly any steps which France might take towards so desirable an end.

Lead Mine Leases on the Upper Mississippi.

[SENATE.]

The amendment was adopted without objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

United States Militia Fines.

The bill vesting in the respective States the right of the United States to all fines assessed for the non-performance of militia duty during the late war, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. The bill was amended, on motion of Mr. FINDLAY, so as to limit it to the State of Pennsylvania, and after a short discussion, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

While the above bill was under discussion—

Mr. LOWRIE said, that, when he first introduced this bill, he had given an abstract of some of the facts and principles involved in it. At that time he had intended, when the bill came up for consideration, to have given a full and detailed exposition of the whole subject; but, as the session was so near a close, he would limit his remarks as much as justice to the subject would permit.

The United States, said Mr. L., could not have collected these fines but for the assistance of the State. This is a fact to which I wish to call the particular attention of the Senate.

At the time these delinquencies happened, there was no law on this subject but the act of the Congress of 1795. That act provided for the punishment of delinquents by courts-martial, but did not specify how, when, or by whom, such courts-martial should be selected and organized. To every practical purpose, therefore, on this point, the act of Congress was a dead letter, and any individual, with a knowledge of this circumstance, might set at defiance every requisition made for his services in defence of the country.

The principles of law which govern this subject are now, in some measure, settled by the decision of the Supreme Court. The distinction is there laid down and supported, between an order and a requisition. If the Secretary of War, under the authority of the President, issues an order to any officer holding a military commission under the State authority, all fines, arising from delinquencies under that order, belong, of right, to the United States. But if a requisition is made to the Executive of the State, the fines arising from delinquencies belong to the State.

These principles have also received the sanction of the Executive branch of this Government, to an extent sufficient for my present object. During the time my colleague was Governor of Pennsylvania, some doubts were entertained whether the power of remitting these fines was in the President of the United States or the executive of the State. On the 8th January, 1818, in a letter from the Secretary of the Commonwealth, the opinion of the President was requested on this point. To this request the following answer was given:

“DEPARTMENT OF STATE, April 14, 1818.

“SIR: I am directed in answer to your letter of the 8th January last, to state to you, as the opinion of the President, that the power of remitting the fines, in the cases referred to therein, is not vested in him, but in the Governor of the Commonwealth.

“As, in coming to this conclusion, it was necessary to give a particular examination, both of the laws of the United States and the statute of Pennsylvania relating to the subject, and as it was, for some time, expected that a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case involving the question, might have rendered any further proceedings, on the part of the President, in relation to it, unnecessary, this answer has been, much to his regret, delayed until this time. In communicating it to you, I am further directed to request you would manifest to the Governor of Pennsylvania, the high satisfaction he has taken in remarking the promptitude and efficiency with which the requisition upon the Commonwealth, on the occasion to which these transactions refer, was answered and complied with, and the liberal and patriotic spirit with which the State contributed her support to the defence of the country.

“I have the honor to be, &c.

“JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.”

As the case is now decided, the State acted gratuitously, in placing these fines at the disposition of the General Government. But, it must be recollected, that, at that period, the law was not settled. When the militia law of the State passed, in 1814, I was then in that Legislature. This very provision embarrassed the Legislature; and some of our members of Congress were requested to procure such information as was at Washington, on this subject. But nothing satisfactory was received, and the Legislature of the State was obliged to act from the best lights they had. It will, at least, be admitted, that they took the most patriotic side. It was no part of the policy of that State to discuss principles of right with the Federal Government, when the enemy was at the door. The Legislature, by the act of 1814, supplied the defect in the act of Congress of 1795, and, lest the public service should be injured, they agreed to your unreasonable provision, that the United States should be furnished with the men, and have the fines besides.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 8.

Lead Mine Leases on the Upper Mississippi.

Mr. BENTON, of Missouri, asked leave to submit a resolution, founded upon the Message of the President received last night, covering a report from the Ordnance branch of the War Department, on the subject of lead mine leases in the valley of the Mississippi. He would explain the grounds upon which the resolution would be predicated. The Ordnance report showed, that a set of rules had been adopted for leases of lead mines, in virtue of a supposed power in the act of Congress, of March 8d, 1807. Mr. B. was of opinion that the act did not in fact, nor could not in law, impart such power.

The lead mines were national property, and, as such, it belonged to Congress alone to make rules for their disposition. He referred to the constitution, and contended that Congress could not, if it would, devolve upon others the power which that instrument had given to the representatives of the people alone, to dispose of the national property. The report also showed that two leases (provisionally) for 160 acres each, upon the application of the honorable RICHARD M. JOHNSON, had been made this winter to Messrs. J. Johnson and others, of Kentucky, to be taken where the lessees please, between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River, to endure for three years, with the right of renewal, free of rent for two years, and paying one-tenth of the ore raised on the third, and a stipulation about paying for improvements. The lease purported to be conditional, but seemed to be in a train of execution. The lessees were authorized forthwith to make their selection and go to work. An officer of artillery (Lieutenant Burdine) had been ordered to meet the lessees at the Great Crossings, in Kentucky, on the first of March, and proceed with them to select the mine. A small detachment of regular troops were to give them support and countenance. Three Indian agents have been directed to hold themselves in readiness to proceed with the lessees, to explain to the Indians the views of the Government in making the leases, and securing the lessees in the uninterrupted prosecution of the work. Mr. B. took two objections to these leases:

1. Disadvantageous to the Republic.
2. Illegal.

First. Disadvantageous, he said, because the mines intended to be covered by the lease were worth an immense sum, and were parted with for a song. The leases would be located on the left bank of the Mississippi, between Ouisconsin and Rock River. Mr. B. showed a table of the Indian trade at St. Louis, in 1816, which exhibited the quantity of 180,000 pounds weight of lead sold by the Indians from these mines, to the fur traders. He referred to Mr. Brackenridge's Views of Louisiana, page 65, to show that, in 1811, the same item amounted to 500,000 pounds weight. At five cents a pound, the average price at St. Louis, the first of these quantities would command $9,000, and the second $25,000. Mr. B. said, that the richness of these mines was known to everybody at St. Louis, and if there let out at auction, to the highest bidder, upon due notice, would have commanded an immense sum.

Second. These leases were illegal, because the act of 1807, upon which the lessor relied, was special, and would exclude the present lessees. Mr. B. read the act, and argued that it did not extend to the whole United States, but only to territory ceded by foreign powers, (Louisiana,) or by some State. The mines in question were on the Virginia cession, and would not exclude the lessees upon that limitation. But there was another, which applied to the persons capable of taking the lease, which would exclude them. The lessor relied upon the proviso to the 2d section, (volume 4, Laws U. S., page 119.) That proviso has relation back to the persons described in the preceding part; and they must be, 1st, persons settled upon a half section of land at the time of the cession; 2d, settled there at the time of the passing of the act, (8d March, 1807;) 3d, and who should apply for the lease before the 1st of January, 1808. To "such applicant," when the half section includes a lead mine, the President may "grant permission to work the same," and cause "such mine" to be leased for a term not exceeding three years.

Mr. B. said, the present lessees were excluded upon all three of these limitations. They were Kentuckians, who never did reside upon the half section, and did not apply for their lease till the winter of 1831-'2. Mr. B. said that Congress had twice shown that they understood the act as he did—in 1816, when they re-enacted this section for one year, and took in the persons then settled, and who should apply before the 1st day of September, 1817; and in 1817, when the same section was continued open for settlers till the 4th day of March, 1818. He said the United States Supreme Court, in the late Territory of Missouri, had decided the same way. He, Mr. B., was counsel for Wilson, and others, sued at the instance of the United States for about $25,000 of rent for leases under the act of 1807. He demurred for want of power in the lessor, and the plaintiff was amerced, pro falso clamore suo. Many leases had been made in Missouri. He never heard of but one who paid, Partenai, a Frenchman, who paid $2,300 on the first lease, as Mr. B. had been informed.

Mr. B. said, there was another consideration connected with this lease—the illegality and disadvantage of it out of the question—the Indians would appear as a party, under circumstances of powerful appeal to the justice of the American Government. They claim these mines. They are weak—we are strong. They have the possession—we have the words of a treaty. Mr. B. would state the case as fairly as he could for both parties. In 1804 the Sacs and Foxes ceded the country between the Ouisconsin and Rock River (including the mines in question) to the United States; the Chippewas, Ottawas, and Potawatamies, disputed their title. In 1816 a treaty was held with the three latter tribes, and the dispute with the United States was compromised by a division of the disputed tract: a line was agreed upon to run west from the south end of Lake Michigan to the left bank of the Mississippi; the United States taking what was to the south, and the three tribes taking that which was to the north, with the exception of one reserve of three leagues square, to include the fort at Prairie du Chien, and with the reserve of "such other tracts at or near the Ouisconsin and Mississippi, as the President may think proper to reserve; such tracts not exceeding five leagues square." (6 vol. Laws United States, page 810.) The question, as it concerns the Indians, said Mr. B., arises out of the last reserve. The tracts are not designated; it is left to the President. The Indians deny that they intended that the mines should be taken, and have often threatened to kill any white people who should attempt to work them. It is clear that an opposition is now apprehended, for the present lessees are accompanied by a triumvirate of pacificators to quiet the Indians, and a military demonstration to overawe them. Mr. B. thought that the lessees ought to be arrested, if not for the enormous injury done the Republic in the lease, at least for its illegality and severity towards the Indians.

Mr. B. apologized for troubling the Senate at the last moment of the session. He could not do it sooner. The report was only received the night before, and he could not resist a sense of duty which compelled him to lay a resolution on the table. Mr. B. then submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the legality of the Lead Mine leases made with James Johnson, and others, of Kentucky, communicated to the Senate in the President's Message of May 7th.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Illinois, spoke as follows:

Mr. President: Since the honorable gentleman from Missouri (Mr. BENTON) has thought proper, at this late period of the session, to bring this subject before the Senate, and to submit a resolution, which it is now impossible to act upon, I must be permitted to say that, if the impatience of gentlemen to adjourn did not preclude all hope of commanding attention to a dry, legal investigation, I think I could most satisfactorily demonstrate that the construction which the gentleman has given to the law of 1807, and from which he infers the illegality of the leases referred to in his resolution, is most palpably erroneous.

That his is opposed to the contemporaneous and practical construction which has been given to the law, by all those whose duty it has been to execute it, is plainly to be inferred, even from the fact stated by himself, "that many leases under it had been made in Missouri."

The same construction, however, has uniformly governed in a variety of other cases of the greatest notoriety. That the nation has sanctioned it, is evident, not only from its acquiescence, for the last fifteen years, in all those cases, but from positive acts of legislation in relation to some of them, and particularly to that of the Wabash Saline, in Illinois.

The clause of the law to which the gentleman refers, embraces "salt springs" as well as "lead mines," and the authority to lease the one, with every limitation prescribed, equally applies to the other. The duty of executing this law, until very recently, appertained to the Treasury Department, the records of which will prove that all the distinguished gentlemen who have presided over that Department, and every President, since the 8d March, 1807, have sanctioned, or exercised the power, now, for the first time, discovered to be a usurpation.

The first lease of the Wabash Saline was executed by Governor Harrison, under the direction of Mr. Gallatin, to Kentuckiana. All the subsequent leases of it were executed by myself, under the direction of the same gentleman, and his successors in office. By his directions, also, I leased a large body of land, including a lead mine, in Illinois, to William Ficklen, of Kentucky. In 1816 or '17, leases were made of a salt spring on Big Muddy River, in Illinois, and of the very mines referred to by the resolution submitted by the honorable gentleman, which were vastly more extensive, and less guarded than those now objected to, and I presume all those leases may be found in the Treasury Department. Other similar instances might be referred to, but, sir, it would be but a useless waste of time to multiply the evidences of the universally received construction and practical exposition that has been uniformly given to this law.

But, Mr. President, said Mr. E., were this a case of the first impression, there is nothing, either in the letter, or intention of the law, to warrant the gentleman's construction. The law is entitled "An act to prevent settlements being made on land ceded to the United States, until authorized by law." Its provisions accord well with its title, some of them containing severe prohibitions against unlawful, and others prescribing the means of obtaining authorized settlements. In the latter it was declared that all persons settled upon public land, at the time of the passage of the act, who should, at any time prior to the first of January following, apply to the Register of the Land Office, &c., for that purpose, should obtain permission to occupy their settlements, as tenants at the will of the Government, upon certain specified conditions, with the exception, however, of all tracts of land, including lead mines, or salt springs. To tracts of this description the power of the Register did not extend. Nor was it intended to secure to the settlers the benefit of any settlements thereon. These tracts were expressly reserved for the disposition of the President of the United States, by a proviso in the following words, viz: "That in all cases where the tract of land applied for includes either a lead mine or salt spring, no permission to work the same shall be granted, without the approbation of the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to cause such mines or springs to be leased for a term not exceeding three years, and on such conditions as he shall think proper."

The gentleman from Missouri says, "this proviso has relation back to the persons described in the preceding part." It has, indeed, such "relation back" to those persons, so far as to negative and exclude the exclusive claim, on their part, for which he contends, and to limit the power of the register. But it has also a relation forward, as a distinct substantive grant of power to the President, to lease all such "mines and salt springs," without any of the limitations imposed upon the register, as to persons, "for the term of three years, on such conditions as he shall think proper."

The provisions in relation to the permission to be granted to the settlers, were to expire, by their own limitation, within a short time. Those settlers could claim no benefit, under the law, after the first day of the next succeeding January. The power to lease the lead mines and salt springs for the term of three years, with the latitude of discretion allowed to the President, contemplated regulations of a permanent character, to be executed as well after as before the first day of January, and must be considered wholly independent of any claims which the intruders upon public land—the violators of a law of the United States—could have upon the Government.

But, though the gentleman admits that those mines are "national property," and complains most bitterly of the immense sacrifice of the public interest, in the two leases of one hundred and sixty acres each, that are the subject of his denunciation; yet, he contends that the President's power of leasing is confined exclusively to the squatters that happen to be on mineral lands. Now, let me ask, would the public interest be better consulted by enforcing such an unreasonable limitation? There is none such annexed to the power granted to the President, and no implication can warrant it; for there is nothing to induce us to believe that those squatters were such favorites that the legislature intended to secure to them the exclusive privilege of leasing, and that, too, without the possibility of competition, the valuable mines which the gentleman has described, and to which every other citizen of the United States had an equal claim.

The gentleman, however, has satisfied himself that Congress has given a legislative construction to the law conformably to his own; for, says he, "Congress had twice shown that they understood the act as he did—in 1816, when they re-enacted this section for one year, and took in the persons then settled, who should apply before the 1st day of September, 1817; and in 1817, when the same section was continued open to the settlers till the 4th day of March, 1818." But here, sir, said Mr. E., the gentleman labors under a great mistake. In neither of these laws is the section referred to re-enacted. They provide temporarily for settlers only, and extend to them all the rights, privileges, or benefits, that had been or were intended to be granted to others in the like situation. The proviso in these laws is in the following words, viz: "That in all cases where the tract of land applied for includes either a lead mine or salt spring, no permission to work the same shall be granted without the approbation of the President of the United States." But that part of the section, in the law of 1807, which confers upon the President the power of leasing lead mines and salt springs, is not re-enacted, doubtless because it was not intended to be temporary, or to apply exclusively to the settlers, as the gentleman supposes. [Here Mr. EDWARDS, at the suggestion of Mr. KING, of New York, gave way for a motion to lay the resolution on the table.]

Adjournment.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution from the House of Representatives, for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he may have further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn, and concurred therein. And Mr. KING, of New York, and Mr. MACON, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KING, of New York, from the joint committee, reported that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress.

A message was then received from the House of Representatives, notifying the Senate, that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

The Secretary was then directed to inform the House, that the Senate, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn. Whereupon, the PRESIDENT adjourned the Senate without day.

EXECUTIVE PROCEEDINGS.

Military Organization.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
April, 30, 1822.

Ordered, That the injunction of secrecy be removed from the following proceedings and documents, and that they be printed.

MONDAY, January 22, 1822.

The following written Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate the persons whose names are stated in the enclosed letter from the Secretary of War, for the appointments therein respectively proposed for them.

The changes in the army, growing out of the act of the 2d of March, 1821, "To reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," are exhibited in the official register for the year 1822, herewith submitted for the information of the Senate.

Under the late organization of the artillery arm, with the exception of the colonel of the regiment of light artillery, there were no grades higher than Lieustant-colonel recognized. Three of the four colonels of artillery provided for by the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1821, were considered, therefore, as original vacancies, to be filled, as the good of the service might dictate, from the army corps.

The pay department being considered as a part of the Military Establishment, and within the meaning of the above-recited act constituting one of the corps of the army, the then Paymaster General was appointed colonel of one of the regiments. A contrary construction, which would have limited the corps specified in the 12th section of the act to the line of the Army, would equally have excluded all the other branches of the staff, as well as that of the pay department, which was expressly comprehended among those to be reduced. Such a construction did not seem to be authorized by the act, since, by its general terms, it was inferred to have been intended to give a power of sufficient extent to make the reduction, by which so many were to be disbanded, operate with as little inconvenience as possible to the parties. Acting on these views, and on the recommendation of the Board of General Officers, who were called in, on account of their knowledge and experience, to aid the Executive in so delicate a service, I thought it proper to appoint Colonel Towson to one of the new regiments of artillery, it being a corps in which he had eminently distinguished himself, and acquired great knowledge and experience in the late war.

In reconciling conflicting claims, provision for four officers of distinction could only be made, in grades inferior to those which they formerly held. Their names are submitted, with the nomination for the brevet rank of the grades from which they were severally reduced.

It is proper, also, to observe that, as it was found difficult, in executing the act, to retain each officer in the corps to which he belonged, the power of transferring officers from one corps to another was reserved in the general orders published in the register, till the 1st day of January last, in order that, upon vacancies occurring, those who had been put out of their proper corps might, as far as possible, be restored to it. Under this reservation, and in conformity to the power vested in the Executive by the 1st section of the 75th article of the general regulations of the Army, approved by Congress at the last session, on the resignation of Lieutenant-Colonel Mitchell, of the corps of artillery, Lieutenant-Colonel Lindsay, who had belonged to this corps before the late reduction, was transferred back to it, in the same grade. As an additional motive to the transfer, it had the effect of preventing Lieutenant-Colonel Taylor and Major Woolley being reduced to lower grades than those which they held before the reduction, and Captain Cobb from being disbanded under the act. These circumstances were considered as constituting an extraordinary case, within the meaning of the section already referred to of the regulations of the Army. It is, however, submitted to the Senate whether this is a case requiring their confirmation—and, in case such should be their opinion, it is submitted to them for their constitutional confirmation.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 17, 1822.

FRIDAY, March 8.

On motion, by Mr. BENTON, Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to make a report to the Senate, showing the number of the Colonels in the Army of the United States on the 2d of March, 1821, their names, dates of commission, and corps. Also, showing the number of Colonels in service under the Peace Establishment of 1821, their names, the highest grade before held by them, the date of that commission, and the corps to which they belonged, if attached to any corps. Also, showing the number of Adjutant and Inspector Generals in service on the said 2d of March, their names, the highest lineal rank previously held by each in the United States Army, and the date of that commission. Also, showing the number of Adjutant and Inspector Generals in service under the Peace Establishment of 1821, their names, the highest lineal rank previously held by them, and the date of commission. Also a list of all transfers and promotions made under or since the said act of March 2, showing the names, grades, dates of commissions, and corps to which each belonged at the time of the transfer or promotion, and the office to which transferred or promoted. Also, showing the highest lineal rank held by Colonel R. Butler in the Army of the United States, at any time before the said 2d of March, the time when, and his rank when he may have quit the line of the Army; and the grade and date of commission of Major William Bradford, at the time aforesaid.

WEDNESDAY, March 18.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the Message of the 21st of January nominating to promotions and appointments in the Army, made the following report, which was read :

That Colonel Towson, on the 2d day of March, 1821, was Paymaster General; that he held neither rank nor command in the Army; and, not belonging to any corps of the Army, the President had no power, under the law reducing and fixing the Military Peace Establishment, to arrange him to the command of one of the regiments retained in service by said act.

The committee further report, that Colonel Gadsden, on the 2d of March, 1821, was one of the two Inspector Generals of the Army, both of whom were retained in service by the act reducing the Army; that there were two Adjutant Generals in service, one of whom was retained in service; and the President was not authorized to dismiss both of them, and retain Colonel Gadsden as Adjutant General.

The committee further report, that Colonel Fenwick, on the 2d of March, 1821, was Lieutenant Colonel of the light artillery; that, by appointing him to the command of one of the regiments of artillery, it will disband, as supernumerary, a full colonel, who, by the terms of the law of the 2d March, 1821, was entitled to be retained. The committee, therefore, recommend that the Senate do not advise and consent to the nomination of Colonel Fenwick.

The committee further report, that Generals Macomb and Atkinson, Majors Bradford and Dalliba, are nominated to grades below the rank they formerly held in the Army; that the principle of raises was recognized by the Senate on the reduction of the Army, in 1815; and, under the authority of that precedent, the committee recommend that the last four mentioned nominations be confirmed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, pursuant to a resolution of the 8th instant, reported the Army Register of May 17, 1821; which was read.

TUESDAY, March 26.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

Having executed the act, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," on great consideration, and according to my best judgment; and, inferring from the rejection of the nomination of Colonel Towson and Colonel Gadsden, officers of very distinguished merit, that the view which I took of that law, has not been well understood, I hereby withdraw all the nominations on which the Senate has not decided, until I can make a more full communication and explanation of that view, and of the principles on which I have acted, in the discharge of that very delicate and important duty.

The House then resumed the business of yesterday, by proceeding to an eighth ballot for the choice of a Speaker, when the following result was declared: Whole number of votes 173. Necessary to a choice 87.

[Four ballotings were had without a choice.]

The twelfth ballot resulted as follows: Whole number of votes 172. Necessary to a choice 87. Of the whole number, there were—

MR. BARBOUR was conducted to the Chair, accordingly, by MR. NELSON, of Virginia, and MR. WARFIELD, of Maryland, and the Oath of Office was administered to him by MR. WRIGHT, of Maryland.

MR. SPEAKER then rose and addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I should do injustice to myself, if I did not express to you the warm feelings of gratitude which have been excited in my bosom by the appointment which you have just conferred upon me. Those feelings are produced, not only by the consideration that this mark of your confidence is a distinguished one, but by the further consideration that it is unexpected as it is distinguished. In accepting the office to which you have thus called me, I speak in the most perfect sincerity of my heart when I assure you that I feel a fearful apprehension in relation to my ability to discharge its duties in a manner equal either to my own wishes or your expectations. I am sensible of the arduousness of the task; I am sensible, too, of my own want of experience. One thing, however, I can with safety promise: it is, that whatever can be done by diligent attention, and by an unceasing application of such capacity as I possess, shall be done. As it respects myself, the only hope which I entertain that I shall, in any tolerable degree, acquit myself of the responsibility which I am about to assume, rests upon a consciousness, that it will be my constant endeavor so to do; but my great reliance is on the support of this House, and its knowledge that the preservation of order is indispensably necessary to give dignity to the proceedings of any deliberative body.

After which, the SPEAKER administered to the members present, severally, the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

Clerk and Doorkeeper.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to dispense with the form of choosing a clerk by ballot, and appoint that officer by motion.—Carried.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, moved that Thomas Dougherty be appointed to the office of Clerk of the House of Representatives; and the motion was thereupon agreed to nem. con., and Mr. Dougherty was sworn into office accordingly.

Mr. WRIGHT moved that the Clerk be directed to communicate the usual message to the Senate.—Carried.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the form of voting by ballot was dispensed with in regard to the office of Sergeant-at-Arms, and Thomas Dunn appointed to that office on nomination.

The same course prevailed in relation to the appointment of Doorkeeper, and Benjamin Burch was thereupon appointed.

WEDNESDAY, December 5.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have assembled, and are ready to proceed to business. They have passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee on their part, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses have assembled, and are ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them; in which resolution they request the concurrence of this House.

The resolution was read and concurred in by the House; and Mr. HILL and Mr. TREMBLE were appointed of the said committee on the part of the House.

THURSDAY, December 6.

JAMES WOODSON BATES appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat, as the delegate from the Territory of Arkansas.

MONDAY, December 10.

Another member, to wit, from North Carolina, WILLIAM S. BLACKLEDGE, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Duty on Books—Petition from Mr. Jefferson as Rector of the Virginia University.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, presented a petition of the Rector and visitors of the University of Virginia, signed by Thomas Jefferson, Rector, praying that the aid and patronage of Congress may be extended to the cause of science and literature generally, throughout the United States, by an exemption from duties of all books and other articles generally used in acquiring information. Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

The petition of the rector and visitors of the University of Virginia, on behalf of those for whom they are in the office of preparing the means of instruction, as well as of others seeking it elsewhere, respectfully representeth:

That the Commonwealth of Virginia has thought proper lately to establish a university for instruction, generally, in all the useful branches of science, of which your petitioners are appointed rector and visitors, and as such, are charged with attention to the interests of those who shall be committed to their care.

That they observe, by the tariff of duties imposed by the laws of Congress on importations into the United States, an article peculiarly inauspicious to the objects of their own, and of all other literary institutions throughout the United States.

That at an early period of the present Government, when our country was burdened with a heavy debt, contracted in the war of Independence, and its resources for revenue were untried and uncertain, the National Legislature thought it as yet inexpedient to indulge in scruples as to the subjects of taxation, and, among others, imposed a duty on books imported from abroad, which has been continued, and now is, of fifteen per cent. on their prime cost, raised by ordinary custom-house charges to eighteen per cent., and by the importer's profits to perhaps twenty-five per cent., and more.

That, after many years' experience, it is certainly found that the reprinting of books in the United States is confined chiefly to those in our native language, and of popular characters, and to cheap editions of a few of the classics for the use of schools; while the valuable editions of the classical authors, even learned works in the English language, and books in all foreign living languages, (vehicles of the important discoveries and improvements in science and the arts, which are daily advancing the interest and happiness of other nations,) are unprinted here, and unobtainable from abroad but under the burden of a heavy duty.

That of many important books, in different branches of science, it is believed that there is not a single copy in the United States; of others, but a few; and these too distant and difficult of access for students and writers generally.

That the difficulty resulting from this mode of procuring books of the first order in the sciences, and in foreign languages, ancient and modern, is an unfair impediment to the American student, who, for want of these aids, already possessed or easily procurable in all countries except our own, enters on his course with very unequal means, with wants unknown to his foreign competitors, and often with that imperfect result which subjects us to reproaches not unfelt by minds alive to the honor and mortified sensibilities of their country.

That, to obstruct the acquisition of books from abroad, as an encouragement of the progress of literature at home, is burying the fountain to increase the flow of its waters.

That books, and especially those of the rare and valuable character, thus burdened, are not articles of consumption, but of permanent preservation and value, lasting often as many centuries as the houses we live in, of which examples are to be found in every library of note.

That books, therefore, are capital, often the only capital of professional men on their outset in life, and of students destined for professions, (as most of our scholars are,) and barely able, too, for the most part, to meet the expenses of tuition, and less to pay an extra tax on the books necessary for their instruction; that they are consequently less instructed than they would be; and that our citizens at large do not derive from their employment all the benefits which higher qualifications would procure them.

That this is the only form of capital on which a tax of from 18 to 25 per cent. is first levied on the gross, and the proprietor then subject to all other taxes in detail, as those holding capitals in other forms, on which no such extra tax has been previously levied.

That it is true that no duty is required on books imported for seminaries of learning; but these, locked up in libraries, can be of no avail to the practical man, when he wishes a recurrence to them for the uses of life.

That more than thirty years' experience of the resources of our country prove them equal to all its debts and wants, and permit its Legislature now to favor such objects as the public interests recommend to favor.

That the value of science to a republican people; the security it gives to liberty, by enlightening the minds of its citizens; the protection it affords against foreign power; the virtues it inculcates; the just emulation of the distinction it confers on nations foremost in it; in short, its identification with power, morals, order, and happiness, (which merits to it premiums of encouragement rather than repressive taxes,) are topics which your petitioners do not permit themselves to urge on the wisdom of Congress, before whose mind these considerations are always present, and bearing with their just weight.

And they conclude, therefore, with praying that Congress will be pleased to bestow on this important subject the attention it merits, and give the proper relief to the candidates of science among ourselves, devoting themselves to the laudable object of qualifying themselves to become the instructors and benefactors of their fellow-citizens.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 10, 1821.

THURSDAY, December 13.

Death of Mr. Trimble.

After prayers had been offered by the Rev. Mr. Ryland, the Journal of yesterday was read, when a message was received from the Senate, announcing the decease of the honorable WILLIAM A. TRIMBLE, late a member of that body from the State of Ohio.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, moved to dispense with the order of business in this House, which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, it was further

Resolved, unanimously, That this House will attend the funeral of the Honorable WILLIAM A. TRIMBLE, late a member of the Senate, from the State of Ohio, to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning, and wear crape for thirty days.

On motion, it was ordered that when this House do adjourn, it adjourn to Saturday next.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, the House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 15.

Two members, to wit: from Virginia, JOHN RANDOLPH, and from Maine, WILLIAM D. WILKINSON, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

MONDAY, December 17.

Another member, to wit, from North Carolina, THOMAS H. HALL, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Publication of the Journal of the Federal Convention of 1787, and of the Secret Journal of the Congress of the Confederation, and its Diplomatic Correspondence.

Another Message was also received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

By a resolution of Congress, approved on the 27th of March, 1818, it was directed that the journal, acts, and proceedings of the Convention which formed the present Constitution of the United States, should be published under the direction of the President of the United States, together with the secret journals of the acts and proceedings, and the foreign correspondence (with a certain exception) of the Congress of the United States, from the first meeting thereof down to the date of the ratification of the definitive Treaty of Peace between Great Britain and the United States, in the year 1783, and that one thousand copies thereof should be printed, of which one copy should be furnished to each member of that (the fifteenth) Congress, and the residue should remain subject to the future disposition of Congress.

And by a resolution of Congress, approved on the 31st April, 1820, it was provided that the secret journal, together with all the papers and documents connected with that journal, and all other papers and documents heretofore considered confidential, of the Old Congress, from the date of the ratification of the definitive treaty of the year 1783, to the formation of the present Government, which were remaining in the office of the Secretary of State, should be published, under the direction of the President of the United States, and that a thousand copies thereof should be printed and deposited in the Library, subject to the disposition of Congress.

In pursuance of these two resolutions, one thousand copies of the journals and acts of the Convention which formed the constitution, have been heretofore printed and placed at the disposal of Congress, and one thousand copies of the secret journals of the Congress of the Confederation, complete, have been printed, two hundred and fifty copies of which have been reserved to comply with the direction of furnishing one copy to each member of the fifteenth Congress, the remaining seven hundred and fifty copies have been deposited in the Library, and are now at the disposal of Congress.

By the general appropriation act of 9th April, 1818, the sum of ten thousand dollars was appropriated for defraying the expenses of printing done pursuant to the resolution of the 27th of March, of that year. No appropriation has yet been made to defray the expenses incident to the execution of the resolution of 21st April, 1820; the whole expense hitherto incurred in carrying both resolutions into effect has exceeded, by five hundred and forty-two dollars fifty-six cents, the appropriation of April, 1818. This balance remains due to the printers, and is included in the estimates of appropriation for the year 1822. That part of the resolution of the 27th March, 1818, which directs the publication of the foreign correspondence of the Congress of the Confederation, remains yet to be executed, and a further appropriation will be necessary for carrying it into effect.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 16, 1821.

The Message was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Fugitives from Labor.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted a resolution, which, after being modified at the suggestion of Mr. LATHEAP, was read in the following words:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, more effectually to protect the rights of those entitled to the service or labor of persons in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, and for their delivery to their rightful owners, agreeably to the provisions of the constitution.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, moved to amend the same, so as to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary, instead of a select committee.

A discussion ensued on the question of reference, in which Messrs. WRIGHT and S. SMITH opposed, and Messrs. TOMLINSON and MOORE supported the amendment, which was put and carried—ayes 70, noes 60. [In the course of the discussion, Mr. WRIGHT warmly deprecated the interference of Quakers and others to prevent the reclamation of slaves in some of the States, and hinted that, if effectual means were not taken to secure the rights of the Southern States in this particular, he did not know but they might be driven to take up arms to protect them. Mr. CAMPBELL and Mr. TOMLINSON did not oppose the reference of the subject, but argued that references to standing committees were preferable, when the subjects naturally belonged to a committee of that description.]

The resolution was thereupon adopted.

Affairs in Florida—Gov. Jackson and Judge Fromentin.

Mr. WHITMAN called for the consideration of the resolution by him submitted on the 11th instant, requesting information from the Secretary of State relating to the late transactions at Pensacola, &c.

The House agreed to consider the same; when

Mr. POINSETT moved to amend it, by limiting the information called for to such as the President may think proper to communicate.

Mr. WHITMAN assented to the amendment.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to insert the word "information" in lieu of the word "correspondence," which was assented to.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, moved that the resolution be laid on the table. He thought it more respectful to the President of the United States to wait for the information on the subject, which it was doubtless the intention of the Executive to communicate. The message that had been delivered at the commencement of the session referred to the matter in question in very clear and explicit terms. Mr. E. referred to that document to show that it had been announced as the intention of the Executive to communicate further information on the subject to Congress. Mr. E. thought it, therefore, a matter of proper courtesy and decorum for this House to wait until the President should think proper to make it a subject of special communication.

Mr. WHITMAN opposed the motion. At the first reading of the President's Message, he had entertained the same opinion which his honorable friend from North Carolina (Mr. EDWARDS) had expressed. But, on further examination, he had found it impossible to determine whether the matters of an unpleasant nature, to which the President referred, were of the same character with those contemplated by the resolution. The facts alluded to in the message were general and undefined. Those included in the resolution were particular and specific. It could not, therefore, be disrespectful to ask for information on a subject that it was impossible to say had been even alluded to in the President's Message. But the resolution called for information not only in regard to the controversy between General Jackson and Judge Fromentin, but it was contemplated to extend it to an inquiry into the causes that led to the issuing of an order by the Governor of the Floridas for the removal of certain persons from that territory, which, to say the least of it, is in its character novel. Mr. W. knew of no law that justified a sentence of banishment, even by the Executives of sovereign States; still less could he comprehend the justifiable exercise of such a power by the created head of a dependent Territory. Such a sentence might perhaps be allowed as a punishment, when resulting from a conviction by the verdict of peers, or a trial before a court on the charge of a crime, but he knew of no authority that could justify such a sentence, as a matter of political expediency, depending on the Executive will. When, therefore, the subject was fairly discussed, Mr. W. was satisfied it would be found that the resolutions he had submitted were of a character altogether respectful to the President of the United States; that they were confined to distinct and definite objects; that the Message had been for some time before the House, and that no special communication on the specific subjects alluded to have been made, and that it was fairly inferable that the message and the resolutions had different objects in view. He therefore thought the subject to be of sufficient importance to entitle it to the immediate attention of the House.

Mr. BALDWIN suggested that it was evident, from the tenor of the message, that this was a subject to which the President of the United States had not been inattentive. It might be, that it had become a subject of negotiation with the Spanish Government—and this was perhaps the reason why it had not been presented to the consideration of the House subsequent to the message. The Spanish Minister had not yet arrived at the seat of Government—and possibly it was owing to this circumstance that the President had not communicated the papers in this case to the House. Upon the whole, he thought it advisable for the House not yet to act on the subject.

Mr. EDWARDS then renewed his motion that the resolution lie on the table, for the reasons he had before stated.

This motion was supported by Mr. CANNON, and opposed by Mr. FLOYD, when, the question being taken, the motion of Mr. EDWARDS prevailed; and the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 18.

Another member, to wit, from Maryland, THOMAS BATLY, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Missouri—Three Per Cent. Fund.

The engrossed bill providing for paying to the State of Missouri three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of public lands within the State, was read a third time.

[The bill directs that "three per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the lands of the United States, lying within the State of Missouri, which, since the first day of January, 1821, have been, or hereafter may be, sold by the United States, after deducting all expenses incidental to the same, shall be paid, from time to time, to such person or persons as may or shall be authorized by the Legislature of the said State of Missouri to receive the same; which sum or sums thus paid, shall be applied to the making public roads and canals, within the said State of Missouri, under the direction of the Legislature thereof," &c.]

Mr. EVGRIS suggested a doubt, derived from the language of the report, whether the Congress had a right to prescribe to a State, the manner in which any part of her funds shall be expended.

Mr. S. SMITH submitted, that an alteration might be perhaps advantageously made in the phraseology of the bill, making it read "roads or canals," instead of "roads and canals."

Mr. SCOTT explained to the House, that the bill had been drawn up in conformity to the provisions of the third clause of the sixth section of the act authorizing the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, which provides that five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of lands within the State shall be reserved for making public roads and canals; of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the State by its Legislature, and the remaining two-fifths shall be applied, under the direction of Congress, to the construction of roads and canals leading to the State. In pursuance of those provisions, accepted by Missouri, and thus become a compact between her and the United States, this bill had been framed, &c., and required no amendment.

JANUARY, 1822.]

Bankrupt Law of 1800.

Mr. RANKIN further suggested that, to make the amendment proposed by Mr. SMITH, would be to change the terms of the compact, which it was not in the power of Congress, being one of the parties to it, to do.

Without further observation, the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

FRIDAY, December 21.

Another member, to wit, from South Carolina, WILLIAM LOWMYER, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

WEDNESDAY, December 26.

Two other members, to wit: from Connecticut, JOHN RICE, and from North Carolina, FELIX WALKER, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Public Lots in Washington.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, in obedience to the resolution of the 21st instant, calling upon him to state the amount of unimproved property in the city of Washington, belonging to the United States, and to give an estimate of its probable cash value at this time; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

OFFICE OF COM. OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS,
Washington, Dec. 26, 1821.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed the 21st instant, requiring a report of the amount of unimproved property in the city of Washington belonging to the United States, with an estimate of its probable cash value at this time, I have the honor to state:

That the public ground in this city consists of two descriptions: 1st. Building lots assigned to the United States upon a division with the original proprietors, agreeably to the terms and conditions of the deeds of trust for the ground within the limits of the city, by which the proprietors ceded to the United States one-half of the building lots, without any pecuniary equivalent. 2dly. "Reservations" of entire squares, or larger sections of ground, purchased from the original proprietors, on account of, and for the use of, the United States.

Of the building lots there remain unsold about the number of 5,150. The reservations contain, together, 541 acres, 1 rood, and 29 perches, or 23,584,745 square feet, equal to 4,479½ standard lots.

Any estimate of the cash value of this property must, under present circumstances, be extremely arbitrary. Owing to the general stagnation of business, and scarcity of a circulating medium, few sales have been effected, either on public or private account, within the last year or two; and it is only from actual sales in the vicinity that the value of any given lot can be ascertained. The average price of the public lots heretofore sold is $180 per lot, or about 8 419-1000 cents per square foot. Taking this as the rule of valuation, the whole of the ground belonging to the United States, in the city of Washington, would amount to one million seven hundred and thirty-three thousand, three hundred and ten dollars.

I have the honor to be, &c.

SAMUEL LANE,

Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Hon. PHILIP P. BARBOUR,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WEDNESDAY, January 2, 1822.

Another member, to wit, from Kentucky, JAMES D. BRECKENRIDGE, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

TUESDAY, January 8.

Bankrupt Law of 1800.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, the House agreed to take into consideration a resolution heretofore offered by him, calling upon the President of the United States for information relative to the operation of the Bankrupt Law of 1800, in the States of Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York.

Mr. B. stated his object to be, to obtain such information relative to the operations of the old bankrupt law as might be useful, if not as a guide, at least as a reference, to those who were about to be called upon to vote for a system which he conceived to be similar in all its essential features and properties to the law of 1800. He thought no guide was so safe as the footsteps of experience. In anticipation of an objection that might possibly be urged, he would observe, that it was by no means his intention to retard the progress of the bill that had been reported on that subject—nor should he, at any time, solicit a postponement of that bill, for the purpose of gaining time to obtain the information which he now sought. He had confined the call for information to the States of Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and New York—not for the purpose of giving a partial view of the subject, but because those States were most deeply interested in, and affected by, its operation; and also because the information from those States could be obtained more expeditiously than from others that were more remote. They afforded, in his opinion, the fairest sample of its operation, and with those views, and those only, he had proposed to limit the inquiry. The reason why he addressed the call for information to the President was this: that the information desired was with the clerks of the several District Courts of the United States, and that there was no connection between them and any of the Executive Departments; and that the course which he now proposed had been recommended to him by a gentleman of experience in the business of Congress.

Mr. COCKE proposed to amend the resolution by including the District of Columbia; which suggestion was assented to by the mover.

Mr. WHITMAN thought the proposition was of a novel character. It contemplated a call upon the President of the United States for information on a subject over which he had no more control than any member of that House. It did not refer to any subject that could be supposed to be within the personal knowledge of the Executive. He therefore thought the call upon that officer was incorrect and improper. If the information was worth the seeking, he thought it should be obtained through the medium of a special committee, who might be instructed to inquire into the subject, and vested with the power to call for persons and papers. At all events, the President of the United States was not the proper person of whom the inquiry should be made—it would be more correct to call on the clerks of the courts, to which the proceedings were, by that law, made returnable, than to ask it of the Executive, who had no agency whatever in its execution. Mr. W. also adverted to the limited operation of the inquiry, and thought, if any importance was attached to it, it should extend to other districts than those that had been named.

Mr. LOWNDES replied to the suggestion, that the call for information was too limited, and remarked, that it was surely an unsafe position, because all the information that was desirable could not be obtained, that it was, therefore, better to have none at all. He thought it was safe and proper to rely upon the discretion of the House, in respect to the possible result of a delay; for the House had the subject always within its control, and could regulate and direct it by such principles as should appear to be equitable and just. In respect to the source of information contemplated by the resolution, he would remark, that the President of the United States had a controlling authority over all the subordinate officers in the various departments of Government. His requisitions would be received with attention, and answered with respect, and it was not so much a transcript from the records of the district courts which the clerks were to furnish, as it was a digest of the information on that subject which the Executive was supposed to possess.

Mr. SERGEANT was apprehensive that the resolution, if adopted, would hereafter press seriously upon the House. Frivolous and unmeaning resolutions would never voluntarily receive the sanction of this body; and, if this should be adopted, it would be so on the ground that the information that it proposed to obtain was necessary and proper. If, then, it should not be obtained, when we arrive at the period of discussion in which it may be supposed to be appropriate, it may be difficult to resist the call for a further postponement, until it can be obtained.

Mr. S. then inquired, and examined somewhat in detail the nature and situation of the records, whose repose it was in contemplation to disturb. Under the law of 1800, there were commissioners and a secretary in each district, with whom these papers were originally placed. When their decision had been consummated, these papers were directed to be deposited in the offices of the several clerks of the respective district courts. No digest or record of them was made. Of course it will be necessary, should the resolution be adopted, that the clerks or their successors should look back among the files, reproduce them to the light, open each and every file, examine them, however voluminous, from their inception to their end; and, after all, what light would they shed upon the expediency of the bill that was now upon the table? What if it should appear that the dividends had been small? That must lead to the inquiry, wherefore they had been small? for the fact, without the reason, would be a most fallacious and inconclusive guide in illuminating the path of inquiry. He would not enter, however, on that branch of the subject, and would merely observe that, although he was desirous that every sort of information should be given, yet he should be reluctantly compelled to vote against the resolution, because it would evidently occasion not only a great expense, but a consumption of time that might extremely harass, if not finally defeat a bill to which the mercantile part of the community looked with anxious solicitude.

The resolution was further supported by Messrs. WRIGHT and WARFIELD, when the question was taken thereon, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 71.

WEDNESDAY, January 9.

Another member, to wit, from Georgia, ALFRED OUTHBERT, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

THURSDAY, January 10.

Surveyors General.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill requiring surveyors general to give bond and security for the faithful disbursement of public money, and to limit their term of office; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Bank of the United States.

Mr. ARTHUR SMITH submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the United States Bank, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making it the condition on which any alteration of the charter for the benefit of the said bank shall be made, that the eighth clause of the fundamental articles of the constitution of said bank be so amended, as to limit the said bank in the contraction of debts, and the issue of its notes, to some multiple of the gold and silver coin of the lawful currency of the United States actually in its vaults or possession, and held to answer the demands against it; that the said committee also inquire into the expediency of providing, that the plea of the act of limitations shall not bar a recovery in an action brought on a note or notes issued by the Bank of the United States, and payable to bearer.

The resolution being read, the question was taken, "Will the House agree thereto?" and determined in the negative.

Indian Department—Its Expenditures.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, called for the consideration of the resolution by him submitted on Wednesday last, calling for information from the War Department relative to the expenditures of the Indian Department for the year 1821.

After some prefatory remarks by the mover, the House agreed to consider the same.

Mr. McDUFFIE hoped the resolution would pass. Had it been moved in its proper season, several days ago, it might have prevented the long discussion that had taken place.

Mr. TRACY wished to extend the inquiry more specifically than the motion seemed to embrace. He therefore proposed an amendment to that effect.

Mr. RANDOLPH did not rise for the purpose of objecting to the original motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, nor to the amendment of the gentleman from New York; but to state to the House what, in his opinion, was an obvious principle of legislation. There could be no objection on the part of the House, certainly there was none on his, to receiving any information which its subordinate departments might think proper to impart. Such information, however, was not requisite for him, in sustaining the part which he had deemed it his duty to take on the subject. It was incumbent on those who ask for an issue of money from the public purse, to show their reasons for the call. The onus was on them. Those who asked for the appropriation were to show cause why it should be done. It was enough for this House to remain passive until those who wanted their money had at least proven the exigence that gave birth to the solicitation. He was not disposed to cavil on the ninth part of a hair. He was no Hotspur. But when my constituents are asked for money—for 'tis their money, said Mr. R., not mine—it is not for me to be lavish with it; nor was it their province to go in quest of the reasons that induce others to seek it.

Mr. RHEA moved a postponement; which was opposed by Mr. REID, and negatived.

VOL. VII.—15

The question was then taken on Mr. TRACY'S amendment, and carried.

Mr. WARFIELD was satisfied with the information already obtained, although he was willing that other gentlemen should be gratified who wished for further light. By reference, however, to what was already in our power, he thought it would appear that the information contemplated by the resolution could not be obtained in time for the partial appropriation bill to which it seemed to refer, unless the debate on that bill should be protracted until late in the Spring.

The subject was further discussed by Messrs. PLUMER, WALWORTH, and ARTHUR SMITH; when

Mr. RHEA remarked that he wished the inquiry to go further back. He did not wish for a partial examination of the subject, but for a full elucidation. This he thought was due to the Secretary of War; and he would therefore move to amend the resolution so as to extend the inquiry not only to 1821, but also to 1820.

Mr. GILMER hoped the amendment would succeed, though he was not himself desirous of the information called for by the resolution. Mr. G. proceeded to remark on the course which this subject had taken, and incidentally on the merits of the question which had been for several days under debate, at considerable length—of which it is practicable to give the substance only. It seemed to him that some gentlemen were too eager to identify the personal character of the Secretary with questions before the House, and taking up their defence before any one thought of making an attack. In the particular cases before the House, Mr. G. confessed that the Secretary of War did not possess his confidence; though he believed him to be, in the general discharge of his duty, an able and enlightened officer; and he believed that officer drew much too largely on the confidence of this House, if he presumed it would justify him in the course he had adopted in regard to the excess of expenditure above the appropriation. It had indeed been argued that an appropriation law is not the authority for expending money; he admitted that if an army is authorized, you give power to enlist so many soldiers; that if contracts cannot be made on terms as cheap as were anticipated when the law passed, it was competent for the Secretary to make up the deficiency, but this was not an analogous case, as those expenses were not authorized by any law. If any Secretary expended more money than he was authorized to do, it should be at his peril, and on his own responsibility. This was the great question; and he for one would not admit that any Secretary should dare—he would use this strong language—should dare to place his construction above the construction of this House, and substitute his discretion for law. Mr. G. contended further that it was in the power of the Secretary of War to have prevented a large portion of this unauthorized expenditure. It was well known that not only immense numbers of the Indians attended at the agencies to receive their annuities, but that they came attended by their women and children, who all assembled and remained for many days for the purpose of being fed at the expense of the United States. This expense, at least, the Secretary could have controlled—timely orders to his sub-agents would have prevented it, by directing that rations should not be issued to those swarms of savages at the public expense, as had been the practice heretofore. Such an order would have sent the Indians home, and the expense would have been avoided. Another curtailment of expenditure, Mr. G. presumed, might have been made in the article of presents. There was an existing statute which expressly forbid that the cost of presents to the Indian tribes should exceed fifteen thousand dollars—there was no discretion left in the case to the Executive; Mr. G. would always protest against the exercise of any discretion which should transcend the disbursement authorized. Suppose it should be discovered that the Secretary of War, in the great discretionary power contended for by some gentlemen, should have thought proper to expend for presents the sum of $50,000, instead of $15,000—and Mr. G. thought it highly probable that it would turn out so; for it had been stated by one gentleman, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) that $40,000 was expended in transporting annuities, but this must certainly be an error, and he presumed it was for presents. Mr. G. was of opinion, also, that the expenditure for the Indian department might have been reduced in the supply of agricultural implements, ploughs, &c., which was furnished, and which he went on to show might have been reduced without producing any hardship or inconvenience to the tribes to whom they were sent; for, he observed, these implements benefited only that class amongst the Indians which were wealthy, and were calculated only to encourage an aristocracy amongst them; while the great body of the tribes, poor and miserable, and suffering, derived no good whatever from the donation. But these things were not known perhaps to the Secretary of War, to this man of towering genius, to which so much homage was paid. Genius he might have, and had, Mr. G. said, but for his part, he would much prefer a little practical common sense to all the powers of imagination which had been ascribed to the Secretary of War. It was not his object, however, Mr. G. said, to assail or defend any Secretary—he spoke only of facts and principles. As to the resolution before the House, he had no idea that the information it called for would change his opinion on this subject. He was satisfied that money had been expended which was not authorized, and no confidence would induce him to justify such dereliction in a public officer—he would give no such confidence. The people, Mr. G. said, placed a special confidence in their representatives in matters of appropriation—it was unlike matters of ordinary legislation—and he had to learn that confidence was transferable.

Mr. RANDOLPH wished to know of the Chair whether, on this resolution, the merits of the question which had been under consideration for some days were debatable?

The SPEAKER thought not; but it was extremely difficult to determine the precise line of separation between the two subjects.

Mr. PLUMER had no objection to the amendment if the House desired additional information; though he himself did not.

Mr. REXA's amendment was agreed to—ayes 89; and the resolution, as amended, passed without a count.

Military Appropriations—Indian Department.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making partial appropriations for the military service of the year 1822—the question on filling the blank for the Indian department being yet under consideration—

Mr. RANDOLPH remarked that, in opposing the appropriation now before the House, himself, and those who acted with him, had, perhaps, shown more gallantry than discretion. It was, perhaps, proper for him to vindicate the Administration with which he had the honor—for an honor it was, not indeed in the sense in which that term is bandied about in this House—to act. He regretted that so much personality had been introduced, not only in relation to the officers of the Government, but to the members of this House. There were two questions which the committee had to decide, that, in his opinion, had not been met, probably because they had been misconceived. The first and most important question was, Where does the supreme authority of this Government rest? Does it reside in agents or in sub-agents? or shall we find it in the subordinates of subordinates? He (Mr. R.) would not consent to admit that the War Department was a co-ordinate or correlative branch of this House. Should it be said that the Executive was such a branch, he would not deny it; but when we approach the Executive or Senate for information, it is in the respectful terms of request; when we speak to the subalterns of the Executive, we order and direct—in language, civil if you please, but mandatory. The doctrine of these departments being co-ordinate branches of the Government, was therefore unsound—it would not hold water a moment. And who is to be the judge, and what the measure of judgment? What is their power? It is derivative; they are the breath of the Executive nostrils. Mr. R. here adverted to the situation and limitation of the powers of former Secretaries, and was disposed to do more justice to the present Secretary of War, than his friends seemed to have done. The old Spanish proverb, "Save me from my friends," &c., recurred to his mind; and he would not take the Secretary where he had been placed, and for the reason that he had not placed himself there. The Committee of Ways and Means had hard measure dealt out to them on both sides. They had tried to husband the public resources, and for this they were entitled to credit. They had taken the only course that could effect that object; and he could defy the ingenuity of gentlemen to limit the expenditure of the Indian department in any other manner than by limiting the appropriations. The same course was required as when you would teach frugality to a child at school. As you could not define every item of expense, the only and proper way would be, to limit by a precise sum the amount of his expenditures, beyond which he should not go. There was no other mode of retrenchment where the expenditure was contingent. This deficit, said Mr. R., comes before us in a most questionable shape. Last year, the Secretary made his estimate of $170,000. Only $100,000 were appropriated, and now he comes in for the exact balance. Instead, therefore, of an appropriation, the application should rather be for the passage of a bill of indemnity to protect him from the consequences of having transcended the powers confided to him by the Representatives of the people. Such an act was resorted to by Lord Chatham, in relation to his usurpations on the subject of the exportation of corn. Even that great man, who fills so large a space in the page of history, and whose name will be revered when those who now figure upon the scene of action shall be sunk deeper than the plummet ever sounded, in the unfathomable abyss of oblivion, was obliged to seek shelter under a protecting act, for having been guilty of what he confessed to be a thirty days' tyranny.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) had referred to the day, even the day, when he (Mr. R.) was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, to show from the history of that period that then, even then, there was a necessity to supply the deficits of past appropriations. But that gentleman would remember, it is one thing to know for what appropriations are made, and another thing to grant them without knowledge—in the dark. There was but one unaccounted deficit supplied, within his recollection, at the period alluded to, and that was for the naval expenditure, which, from the nature of the service, was most uncertain. But another prodigious discovery had been made by his colleague, (Mr. SMYTH,) that $100,000 had been granted for the civil list. But, though the appropriation was not specific on the face of the act, yet it was necessarily so in the progress of the disbursement. The salaries of the President, of the judges, and of the various officers of the Government, were limited and defined. There was no reason to fear that they would draw for larger amounts than they were entitled to. It was not like the Indian department, where the disbursement was contingent, and undefined by law. Did any one ever hear of a nation being ruined by the expenses of the civil list? This was really saving at the spigot and letting out at the two great vortices—the Army and the Navy. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH) had said hard things of the former Secretary of War, (General Dearborn,) and that his only memorable act was his sending the army to perish and die among the marshes of New Orleans. Now he would say, and he would say it without fear, that the Secretary of War was no more responsible for that act of the commanding General, than the head of the Department in the late war was for any of the blunders of the commanding Generals on the Niagara frontier. [Mr. S. here called Mr. R. to order.] The Chairman having requested Mr. R. to proceed, he rose, and observed that neither his health, nor his fondness for debate, or rather his aversion to it, would permit him to extend his remarks to all the subjects that the question presented. But, so long as his constituents looked to him with so much partiality as to send him here to espouse their rights, he should raise his voice without fear, against any principle that compromised those rights. The law, he said, had not authorized the expenditure, and he here read and commented upon the statute that authorizes the distribution of rations to the Indians. It was a guarded and qualified permission, not a peremptory requirement. The law of the land, therefore, stood violated, and its supreme authority was disregarded by an officer of the Government.

You may be Viceroy, it is true,
But we'll be Viceroy over you—was now virtually the language held to this House. It could not excite surprise that he (Mr. R.) should enlist under the banner of the people. Although he had once a connection with the court, it was not long enough to estrange his feelings from their interest. His bias leaned to the payers of taxes, not to the consumers. Much had been said of dignity, but dignity had its seat in the mind. It might be found as often under a patched coat as under a flaunting robe, that might be borrowed or stolen. True dignity consists in acting well in that situation in which it has pleased God to place us; and in a Secretary of War it consists in not exceeding his appropriations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) had said that he did not believe a single cent was unnecessarily expended during the administration of Mr. Jefferson. He (Mr. R.) could not go so far. There were too many hungry mouths to be filled under all administrations; too many dogs that were ready to eat dirty bread and dirty pudding. But, in order to retain the confidence of the nation, a watchful guard should be placed over the people's money. Keep your money, and your money will keep you; but go to bed with confidence in your mouths, and you will awake with chains on your hands. We should not shun the law which requires scrutiny in the disbursement of public moneys; nor, when we do guard the Treasury, should we be put on our deliverance. If we are to be thus put, said Mr. R., I will say with the gentleman over the way, (Mr. FLOYD,) I am ready to go to Spain! The honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) under whose displeasure I have had the misfortune to fall, has spoken favorably of the employment of the troops in the pursuits of agriculture—that their swords, or the use of them, were converted into ploughshares. But I can remember, said Mr. R., when that very proposition was hooted out of the House. The soldiers were likened to the barrow-men of Philadelphia. Their stations and dignity were too high to be brought down to the business of making roads, as were the Roman legions. But they were not confined to making roads—they were sent up the Missouri as the bait to the trap for an Indian war. He had not seen an account of the missing in that war, nor the death-roll of the army sent to St. Augustine. Mr. R. expressed a hope that the dignity of the debate had not been interrupted by him. His life was in that state of obscurity—he would not say of proscription—in which it began. He could now see only two members of the House, (Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and NEW,) who belonged to it at the time he entered that body. In alluding to the events, quarum pars fui, he could not but be astonished that in so short a space of time, principles were received as matters of course, which transcended, beyond measure, those for which an administration of that day was put down, and, as he then thought, put down forever. He feared, from the past, that whoever succeeds, will find the constitution, like the horizon from the traveller, fly from before him; that he would find it flying before expediency and confidence. However the Republican party should be divided or subdivided, it would settle down into the parties of the Court and Country. For his part, the side of the people was his side. He was identified with them, and God forbid, said he, that we should causelessly throw away that money which they are perhaps, at this moment, laboring to earn.

Mr. BALDWIN was sorry the range of debate had been so wide and excursive; nor could he see the necessity that the transactions twenty years ago should be drawn into discussion with more propriety than the wise doubts of Wouter Van Twiller, or the inflexible edicts of Peter the Headstrong. Mr. B. would fully concur with gentlemen in the propriety of making appropriations specific; but it seemed to have been forgotten that the specification must be made in this House. The departments were not entitled to make it; and no information until yesterday had been asked of the Secretary of War. In 1820, there was laid upon our tables a detailed statement of the whole system of policy and expenditure in the Indian Department for a long series of years. That information was to be considered as before the House, and at the last Congress no objection was made to the system. The appropriation of the last year did not apply to the policy of the Indian department. The bill came in blank, and he did not remember to have heard even an intimation that it was intended to cut down any part of the Indian expenditure. [Mr. SMITH explained, and said the estimate was $170,000, and he had moved to fill the blank with $100,000 only.] This appropriation, said Mr. B., was passed in silence; not so that which related to the fortifications. The extent and policy of that expenditure was tested by discussion and by vote. Mr. B. was as little disposed as others to grant away the public money. But what was more common than that committees should be mistaken in their estimates? It happened almost every year—but an error of that kind had never before, as he believed, been construed into an indication that the source of expenditure was to be destroyed. Mr. B. thought the Secretary of War could not be said to have disobeyed the direction of the House. He had never been called upon to apportion the $100,000. That would be an act which he had no right or power to assume. If Congress directs that presents shall cease, rations be discontinued, or the agents, interpreters, &c., remain unpaid, it would be the duty of the War Department to obey the mandate; but to limit and apportion to each, or to continue one and discontinue another, when the laws were in force that required them all, would certainly be a departure from his duty. By voting the sum now proposed, the Department would not be exonerated from responsibility of subsequently accounting for it. The public would, therefore, be safe, and he thought it unwise to depart at this time from a practice which had uniformly obtained for forty years, without setting up a buoy, to warn the Department of the course which was prescribed for it to take.

Mr. TOL rose to explain his reasons for voting in favor of the sum that had been named by the Committee of Ways and Means. He was induced to do this from the circumstance that other gentlemen on that committee had thought proper to explain the reasons that would influence them to vote against it. Mr. T. passed in review the general topics that had arisen in the course of the debate; but the difficulty of hearing precludes a full and extended report of his observations. He thought it somewhat singular that, with one solitary exception, every gentleman who had resisted the report had expressed an entire confidence in the gentleman who directs the War Department. They are convinced that he has done his duty, and are solicitous to make him an appropriation of thirty thousand dollars, and that, too, founded on the same data and principles with the appropriation which they oppose. In other words, they are dissatisfied with his past conduct, and therefore insist upon trusting him in future; they would trust in his promises and estimates, but not in his facts! A great anxiety seemed to exist for accounts current—for proofs and papers. He doubted, however, whether this House was a very proper place to audit the Secretary's accounts. The Third Auditor's apartment was most appropriate for that business, where papers were measured by the cord. If those papers were even brought forward, he doubted whether they would lead to a very beneficial result. For his part, he did not wish to overhaul papers, and hunt up receipts, for half a pound of tobacco, a yard of wampum, or a pair of nippers, furnished to an Indian. There were officers who were more competent to perform this drudgery, and who would probably do more justice to the subject than this House in their representative capacity. Mr. T. adverted, also, to the consequences that might arise from withholding the Indian supplies, and contended that, to make the appropriation, was called for as much by the dictates of policy as of justice and honor.

Military Appropriations—Indian Department.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to rise and report, and intimated his intention to make some remarks on the subject.

Mr. SMITH begged the indulgence of the House to make a few observations in relation to some points of the debate. If any thing of a personal character, or derogatory to the dignity of the House had occurred, the House would bear him witness that it had not fallen from him. Mr. S. read a part of the rules of the House, that related to personal allusions, and remarked that it was always unpleasant to speak of one's self, and more especially, under any degree of irritation; but he could not forbear to give a short answer to the law which had been referred to by his colleague, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) as limiting the rations, such as could be spared. The extent of the rations to be dealt out, was, indeed, in some degree, a matter of discretion—unless usage had given it a measure—but the obligation to furnish them was still in force and unrepealed. The Secretary of War had no right to refuse them. The gentleman says the act of sending the Army to perish among the marshes that surround New Orleans, is to be ascribed to President Jefferson. If so, why should not the expenditure of the Indian department, in like manner, be ascribed to the present Executive? The fact is, that the President of the United States commits these things to the heads of the Departments, and they are responsible for their own acts. Mr. S. could not believe that his colleague intended to apply that to him, in relation to the proceedings on the Niagara frontier, which he repelled as a calumny. By this he would assure both that gentleman and the House, that no reflection, however personal, should prevent him from the performance of his duty. It had been undertaken, and should be performed, whatever might be the consequence. Mr. S. referred to two appropriations that were made to cover deficits at the time when his colleague contended that they were made upon account rendered. One was made in December, and the other in the January following—and both for the same object, which showed that the accounts or estimates could not have been rendered when the first was made—otherwise it would have been made sufficiently large to have prevented the necessity of the second. His colleague had said that he was of the party of the people. So, also, am I, said Mr. S., I belong not to the court; and when will it be found that I was ever wanting in my duty to the cause of the people? I have an interest in the people, and in posterity. There are those to whom my existence is important—but even that existence shall never stand in the way of my duty.

The question was then taken on Mr. STEVENSON's motion to rise and report, and carried; and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 11.

Military Appropriations—Indian Department.

The order of the day being announced—

Mr. BUTLER moved to postpone to Tuesday the further consideration of the bill for making partial appropriations for the support of the army, &c., for the year 1822. The reasons he assigned for this motion were, that resolutions had been passed calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information, the want of which had given rise to a great deal of debate, and occasioned an unnecessary consumption of time. It was no offence to the officer in question to have asked of him for further information. Let it be received, said he; doubtless the Secretary can fully justify his course. It is very probable that he made every effort within his power to bring the expenditure within the appropriation, and would prove it by the facts which are to be reported to the House. The debate, Mr. B. said, had involved the genius and character of that officer rather than the merits of the question before the House; and all difficulty respecting it might have been prevented by having the information first, and debating the subject afterwards. He could not see any benefit that could arise from pressing a further discussion at this moment, and therefore wished postponement, &c.

Mr. COLDEN supported the motion for postponement, because the further discussion of it at present could tend to no beneficial purpose. With regard to the debate which had already taken place, Mr. C. said if any one had heard it without knowing the subject, he might have supposed the House was sitting in caucus on the subject of the Presidential election, discussing the merits of the candidates. The whole and sole point of controversy for several days had been, whether the Secretary of War had given to the House such information as will authorize it, in the exercise of a sound discretion, in voting the appropriation which has been asked. If this were the true point, what need for travelling over our history, &c., and taking so wide a range in this debate? No member had questioned during these ten days' debate, whether it was in the power of Congress to make an appropriation of this nature; the only question had been as to the proof of its necessity. Such being the case, and the information being now called for, why discuss it further until that information was received? If in all this business there was any fault—he used the word in no invidious or unfriendly sense—it was in the organ of this House. If there was a defect of information, the Committee of Finance, he apprehended, rather than the Secretary of War, had committed it. The committees of the House, Mr. C. said, are supposed to hold direct communication with the heads of departments, and to be the medium of communication between them and this House. It was for this purpose he understood that the Committee of Ways and Means had been constituted. If that committee had not been satisfied of the propriety of passing the bill now before the Committee of the Whole, it was to be presumed they would not have reported it. But that committee had not given such information on the subject as appeared to satisfy the House. The Secretary of War, however, had shown every disposition to afford the House all the information in his power, and if this bill were postponed, he presumed the House would by Tuesday receive the information for which it had asked.

Mr. BUCHANAN was opposed to this postponement. For what purpose, he asked, was the subject to be postponed? It was said to acquire additional information. What information, said he, have you already? You have precise information from the Secretary of War as to all the objects of the expenditure, and he has told you that it is impossible to give you vouchers showing the special manner in which every sum of expenditure is applied. This, it would occur to every one, would be utterly impossible, because, unless the Secretary was more fortunate than anybody else, he could not have vouchers and receipts for the expenditure before the expenditure was made. In a general view, then, the House had all the information which could be expected; and it could not have it in detail until the information was obtained by the Secretary. Mr. B. said he was opposed to the postponement for the further reason—that as the gentlemen on his side of the House had occupied the floor more than those who were opposed to them, and an honorable member from Virginia had been expected to address the House this morning, he (Mr. B.) was for extending to him the same liberality which had been accorded to others. He wanted for himself no further information; and he thought, also, that courtesy ought to induce the House now to go on with the discussion of the bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG was not so entirely satisfied with the information before the House as the gentleman from Pennsylvania appeared to be. He was persuaded that the Secretary of War was able and perfectly disposed to give other information which might be acceptable. It would, he thought, be decorous in this House to itself, as well as to the Secretary of War, to postpone this question, until he should lay before the House the information called for by its resolutions.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, reviewed the course which the bill now before the Committee of the Whole had taken in the Committee of Ways and Means. No mention had been made, he said, to the Committee of Ways and Means by the Secretary of War, of any deficit in the Indian department for the last year. They, therefore, could not be prepared to give information respecting it.

[Here Mr. SPEAKER called the attention of the House to the question, which was no more than a question of postponement, and admitted, according to the practice of the House, of no discussion on the merits of the subject proposed to be postponed. During the whole of to-day's proceeding, the Speaker endeavored to keep gentlemen within the rule, but apparently in vain.]

Mr. SMITH, however, submitted to the decision of the Chair, saying as he sat down, that he had supposed the gentleman from New York (Mr. GOLDEN) would have been obliged to him to set him right as to facts.

Mr. LITTLE thought there was sufficient information on the subject already before the House, and he was opposed to the postponement, because time would be saved, as he thought, by going on with the discussion. If he thought, indeed, that it would shorten the discussion, he would agree to a postponement for any reasonable time. But, he said, the House was bound to proceed; the faith of the nation was pledged for these expenditures, and the persons having claims on the Government on account of them were suffering by this delay.

Mr. BURROWS hoped the motion for postponement would not prevail, and one reason why he was opposed to it was, that he had no doubt the postponement, if it prevailed, would be a means, peradventure, of protracting the argument to a greater length of time than what had been already occupied. For himself, he was as well prepared to vote on this question three or four days ago, before all the able arguments which they had heard, as he was now. Gentlemen were bound, he said, to pay attention to the questions before the House, and bring them to as speedy a conclusion as was consistent with existing circumstances. This subject had already occupied several days, and he could see no reason why there should be a further postponement, with a view either to give a chance for, or to prevent, further debate.

Mr. WALWORTH was opposed to further delay of a decision on this question. He recapitulated the several Indian agencies, and described their locations. These agencies, he said, were established by law, the compensation of the agents was fixed in the same manner, and the Executive had no discretion to appoint them or not, or in regard to their compensation. Neither had it any authority to reduce their number or reduce their compensation, without authority of law. To refuse this appropriation, he argued, would be to subject the frontier to all the horrors of Indian warfare; and he made a glowing appeal to our Western brethren, whose blood had freely flowed in conflict with the Indians—to those whose countrymen's scalps had been displayed as trophies in the States of a neighboring (he had almost said of a savage) power, whether it would not be better to preserve peace with the Indians than to fight them. Many of the posts among the Indians, he said, were in a savage country, where there were no roads, and it would take some time to send supplies there; the consequence of which was, that much of the expenditure for the year must be incurred before the general appropriation bill could pass. Partial appropriations were therefore unavoidable, &c.

Mr. NELSON, of Maryland, opposed the motion. In his view the information was not only insufficient, but there was really none before the House on which they could understandingly act. He could not consent to make a grant of the public money without more knowledge than had hitherto been afforded. He wished it to be clearly shown in what way the Secretary of War could vindicate himself for having transcended the appropriation of the last year. He was not disposed to require impossibilities of that officer, but, if he had substituted his own discretion for the constitutional measure of supply, he was altogether indisposed to sustain the proceeding.

Mr. McDUFFIE arose with the view of expressing to the House his desire that no information might be withheld, which any respectable portion of the House should desire to receive. In the remarks which he had made the other day he had said, that if gentlemen wished for information, and would ask for it, they would unquestionably receive it. Had that course been then adopted, as it ought to have been, the necessity for this debate would have been superseded; and he had only to express his surprise how gentlemen could justify a debate so long, on the ground of a want of information which they could have got, but did not ask for it. For himself he was satisfied, and he believed a great majority of the House was, but he was desirous that no information should be withheld. When the House should have received the information, he said, he believed that no man, viewing the subject as it would then be seen, would open his mouth against the appropriation. We have all of us already, said he, incurred a heavy responsibility, by the time which we have consumed in this discussion.

Mr. FLOYD was always willing to encounter responsibility; but he was glad to hear that the Secretary of War was willing to condescend so far as to impart the information which this House should require from him. He could not say, however, that it would be valuable to the House after it was obtained; for, if he had understood the gentleman (Mr. McDUFFIE) the other day, he told us that we should not be able to understand it if it were obtained. [Here Mr. McD. rose to explain, but the floor was not yielded.] Perhaps his (Mr. F.'s) mind was so angular, that it could not comprehend the complexity of the communications from the Departments. He was ready to vote for the appropriation when the accounts were shown that could support it. He had heard no imputation upon the Secretary of War, except from those who seem to consider themselves as his advocates. Yet it was singular that when Indians and agents had come from a vast distance, and visited our galleries—when a delegate from Michigan, on our extreme border, had come here in sixteen days from Detroit, that the accounts of expenditure should require such a vast length of time in their transmission. The vouchers of the disbursements ought to travel with an expedition equal to that of the drafts for the money. He would not doubt that the expenditure had been fair, but he had a right to demand the evidence of it. He was glad to hear from the friends of the Secretary that the information might be had if asked for, but he felt some degradation, that it was deemed necessary by gentlemen to give that assurance where the House had a right to demand it. He had too much confidence in the Secretary of War to suppose he desired to withhold it; and Mr. F. said he had no doubt the money was expended according to the Secretary's best ideas of propriety; but, he repeated, he wished to know how it was expended, and he would not be satisfied without this information.

Mr. STEVENSON observed that, although the committee had yesterday agreed to rise and report on his suggestion, yet he was disposed to waive the right which the politeness of the House had given him, in favor of the motion now before that body. The reasons assigned by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NELSON) were sufficient, in his mind, to evince the expediency of postponement. He wished for information on the subject, not partially, but to its full extent. While, on the one hand, we hear that the conduct of the distinguished gentleman who fills the office of Secretary of War with so much honor, has been arraigned, and that his reputation is involved in the issue of this question; when, on the other, we are told that it is a matter of etiquette; and again, when it is said that the system of policy in the Indian department is in question; among this discordance of opinion it must surely be important to pause and reflect, and to obtain all that information on the subject which it is in our power to collect. Admitting that it was not important in its beginning, yet it has certainly become so by the course which the discussion has taken, and he fully agreed with his colleague that it was a question, not as between co-ordinate powers, but between a subordinate department and the people who created it. Yet he would not say, nor would he be understood to insinuate, that the Secretary of War had not acted with integrity and justice. I am not disposed, said

Mr. S., to cloud the lustre of his reputation, nor pluck a leaf from the wreath with which intelligence and genius have adorned his brow. I would as soon demolish the altar where I worship. I admire and appreciate the qualities of a young man who gives us the fairest promise of filling at some time the highest councils of his country. His reputation I regard as the common property of his country, and I wish not to thicken, but to disperse the obscurities that surround him, and which now hang like the petty mists which fret themselves at the base of a mighty mountain. Mr. S. would trouble the House with but one further remark. You have, by a resolution, called upon the Secretary of the War Department for information on this very subject. The resolution has gone forth. It is probably under consideration, and perhaps an answer is preparing to this formal requisition of the House. He would submit it, then, whether it would be proper or decorous to call for information, and in the mean time to decide the question to which the information refers, before time has been given the Department to furnish it.

Mr. GILMER was understood to believe that, by referring to the abstracts of expenditure in the Department of War for the years 1818 and 1819, the House would probably see the necessity of exploring further into this subject. The amount limited by law for presents to Indians, was $15,000; but it would be found that, in 1818, there were distributed in presents to them the sum of $180,000 in money, and $165,000 in goods, making an aggregate of $345,000. If there was such a palpable excess beyond the provisions of the law in that year, he thought it highly proper to obtain information how great was the excess for the last year.

Mr. SMITH would withdraw his opposition to the motion for so much time had been already consumed in discussing it, (it being nearly three o'clock,) that there was no time left to enter into a discussion of the main subject, if they took it up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, made a few remarks in opposition to the postponement, when the question was taken and carried—ayes, 89.

Monument to General Wooster.

Mr. TOMLINSON submitted the following:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the sum of five hundred dollars, to carry into effect a resolution of Congress, passed June 17, 1777, providing for the erection of a monument to the memory of General David Wooster, who fell in bravely repelling an inroad of the British forces to Danbury, in Connecticut.

Mr. T. asked for the reading of the following resolution of Congress:

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of General Wooster, with the following inscription:

"In honor of David Wooster, Brigadier-General in the Army of the United States. In defending the liberties of America, and bravely repelling an inroad of the British forces to Danbury, in Connecticut, he received a mortal wound on the 27th day of April, 1777, and died on the 2d day of May following. The Congress of the United States, as an acknowledgment of his merit and services, have caused this monument to be erected."

Resolved, That the Executive power of the State of Connecticut be requested to carry the foregoing resolution into execution, and that five hundred dollars be allowed for that purpose.

Mr. T. remarked that, as the resolution under consideration proposed an inquiry merely, he deemed it unnecessary for him, on this occasion, to do more than briefly state the facts which had induced him to offer the resolution before the House. He said, it appeared by a certificate from the Treasury Department, that the sum allowed to carry into effect the resolution of Congress which had been read, had not been paid to the Executive of the State of Connecticut. Mr. T. stated that he had received information from a highly respectable source, that no monument had been erected in pursuance of the resolution to which he had adverted, to the memory of the distinguished hero named in that resolution, but that his remains now rested with nothing except a rude stone to mark the spot where they were deposited.

The resolution was thereupon adopted.

TUESDAY, January 22.

Bankrupt Bill.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the unfinished business of yesterday—the Bankrupt bill.

Mr. SERGEANT resumed his remarks; and begged the indulgence of the House for a few further observations on the subject. The discussion of yesterday, in his view, had led to this result—that the whole of the civilized world, so far as it was commercial, had adopted, with some modification or other, a bankrupt law; and that, whatever modification those nations had provided, the two principal points to which he had alluded were regarded, viz: security to the creditor and relief to the debtor. He did not mean to be understood that there were not specific differences among those laws between the several nations. In respect to the administration of those laws, the differences were considerable; but, after all, the conclusion seemed to be fixed, and that by the common consent of nations, that, where there was commerce, there a bankrupt law must be—not only as a necessity, but as a salutary measure. This consideration was fortified by the fact, that the framers one of these stand-points, in which a lesson may be found on that cardinal virtue, both in public and private life; to wit: economy. The Government had then been in operation thirty-four years—about one-half of its existence to the present time—its territory had been doubled by the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida, and yet its annual expense was less than nine millions of dollars. Compare that with what has taken place since 1822; with what has taken place in the thirty-four years which have elapsed since that time. Certainly, the word “economy” had an existence in fact, as well as in name, at that time. It was my first year in Congress; and, while “economy” was claimed as a distinctive republican virtue, (for the name of democrat had not then been taken,) I owe it to candor, and to justice, to say, that I saw the same regard for economy in the federal members (for neither had they changed their name at that time) that I did in the republican. Less than nine millions a year for working the Government at that time! including all the heads of public expenditure, except the interest and part of the principal of the public debt, which, being a debt, was a separate object to be provided for, and payments on account of it constituted no part of the expense of working the Government.

of the Constitution of the United States, foreseeing the destinies of our country, made this special provision—believing, as they doubtless did, that such a provision would be found essential as the commercial resources of the nation should be developed and expand. In the nations of Europe to which he had referred, other things had changed. Their external relations and their internal government had varied with successive sovereigns; but the principles of this law had remained unshaken. The English bankrupt law was first established under the reign of Henry VIII., at a time when commerce was just springing into life. During the various political commotions—the struggles of party and the ascendancy of faction—this law, instead of being destroyed, had gathered strength and improvement with the progress of time. It had survived the stormy period of the Commonwealth—the usurpation of Cromwell—the restoration of Charles II.—and the revolution of 1688, that placed the House of Orange on the throne of England. In France, it was enacted prior to the revolution. It subsisted during the period of that tempest—was unrepealed by the fluctuating councils of the republic—by the Emperor Napoleon—and is at this time, and ever has been, the law of France, since the restoration of the Bourbons. Before the revolution in France, it is well known that commerce was in a degraded state. It was considered a disreputable employment; and it is rather a matter of surprise that it was carried on at all, than that it should have received any sanction from the Government. It is probably owing to the degradation of trade that we find in the first stages of the bankrupt law such severe enactments, and such a uniform confounding of criminality with misfortune. The Code Napoleon mitigated this severity, and restored to commerce, in a measure at least, that consideration to which it was entitled. The Dutch law on bankruptcy was enacted before Napoleon had placed his brother on the throne of Holland. The Code Napoleon and the bankrupt law had since been adopted in that country, and were now in operation. All these nations, in the different periods, had concurred in the sentiment, that the failing merchant should be arrested in his career, and his property placed in proper hands for the benefit of his creditors. There were specific differences among the various nations, as to the proportions and numbers of the creditors, whose opinion, in regard to the effects of the debtor, should control and bind the rest. In England, it was three-fifths; in Scotland, three-fourths; in Ireland, the same as in England; in France, a majority in number, being three-fourths in amount; and in Spain and Holland, two-thirds of the creditors in number, and one-half in amount, or one-half in number, and two-thirds in amount. Mr. S. also adverted to the different operations of the bankrupt law in the respective nations, and the effect which the acts of the major part of the creditors had in binding the minority and releasing the debtor.

It seems, said he, that the common sense and common justice of mankind had conferred on this subject, and that their united wisdom had produced a uniform result. It might be said that the example of England, and France, and Spain, were entitled to little weight in testing the principles by which a republic should be governed. So far as it applied to principles of government, he would cheerfully admit that those nations were to be regarded rather as beacons to avoid, than as examples to follow. But in pecuniary concerns, that had no connection with politics, he thought their example, uniform as it had been, carried with it great weight and consideration.

But it was time to turn from the Governments of other nations to that of our own. When far off, it was discoverable only as a unit. It gathered magnitude and importance the nearer we approached it; but it was not until we came in view of the domestic and social relations, that its deep and lasting interests were felt and regarded. It was there that the want of such a system was peculiarly and distinctly seen. When the unfortunate and unhappy merchant was left without resource and cut off from hope. When he was surrounded by a family that Providence had made dependent upon him, and at the same time found himself not only unable to supply their wants, but, perhaps, shut up in a prison, with the power of society acting upon him. To relieve calamities like these, the States had sometimes interposed. Mr. S. alluded particularly to the bankrupt law of Pennsylvania, which was made in 1785, before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. It was then the most commercial State in the Union, and the law continued until 1793, when it expired by its own limitation. The power over the subject-matter was supposed to be transferred to the Government of the United States. Mr. S. referred particularly to the preamble of that law, which he read in his place, as containing the reasons which led to its adoption, and which must be admitted to be cogent in all commercial communities. There was probably as strong a moral sense, and as much intelligence in the State of Pennsylvania in 1785, as there is at present, and yet the law continued in force eight years, and its operation had been regarded as salutary to the people of the State. Unlike the severity of the British law, the law of Pennsylvania did not consider the debtor as necessarily criminal because he had been unfortunate. It was adapted to the circumstances of the State, and to the opinions of the age. The enactment of a bankrupt law in the individual States was not peculiar to Pennsylvania. It had been resorted to, also, in the State of New York—now the largest and most commercial State in the Union. They long kept what was called the three-fourth act, a sort of bankrupt law, but which the Supreme Court of the United States declared they were not competent to make. In Rhode Island and Maryland, laws of the same description had been long since enacted; and in the State of Louisiana—a new commercial State—a bankrupt law was enacted in 1808, but was condemned as unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of McMillan vs. Minn. It yet remains upon the statute book of that State. Its principal features were taken from the Spanish law, but it is now a dead letter. How many other States had endeavored to provide such a remedy, he (Mr. S.) could not pretend to say; but it was evident there were the same feelings and sentiments in the United States, as in the other parts of the world. In this country there seemed to be a peculiar necessity and propriety in adopting such a law. Commerce, so far from being disreputable, was considered as an honorable employment. It was useful, and favored by the Government. But the profession was exposed to hazards. There were accidents and disasters which human sagacity could not foresee, and against which human prudence could not guard. If there was no redemption, therefore, by public law, the merchant might be deemed perpetually liable to ruin, in its most extended sense. Nor are himself and family only involved in it. It may extend to all those to whom he is indebted. Whoever has often seen mercantile failures, knows that there is a sort of blindness or infatuation that seems to affect them. The insolvent is unwilling to penetrate his situation, or to believe it as hopeless as it really is; and hence he lingers with some chimerical, undefined hope, till his affairs have become more deeply involved, and his embarrassments utterly irretrievable. He is perhaps the very worst person that could be selected to judge of his own affairs. He is led by the delusion to keep up his credit as long as he possibly can; and yet to him is confided the uncontrolled power of disposing of his estate. He may waste it, destroy it, or put it beyond the reach of his creditors, and when he comes to the final step of an assignment, he has then the power to make his preferences, and to provide for the circle of his friends, while his distant creditor, perhaps equally meritorious, is left without redress or hope of payment. What is the consequence? It is now become a usage, so common as almost to have acquired the force of law, that endorsers and lenders of money are first to be paid. What but this has created the fictitious capital so deeply felt and deplored throughout this country? What but the loan of names, by which a credit is obtained, and money drawn from a bank? And yet, in case of insolvency, these persons, who, by lending their names, create the evil, and enable the fictitious capitalist to borrow money, and thereby hold out false colors to decoy the unwary, are first to be paid; and perhaps the very goods that were sold to him on a credit, bottomed upon the loan, are sold at auction after the insolvency, to repay the loan, that lured the vender to sell. That these are evils will not be denied; but would a bankrupt system correct them? Mr. S. believed it would. It would distribute the effects of the debtor equally among his creditors. It would cut off undue preferences, pay to all their proper proportions, and stop the bankrupt from appointing his own assignees, and from prescribing terms to his creditor.

Mr. S. then adverted to the operation of the certificate of discharge, which would doubtless be in the minds of all. Its operation, he admitted, would be to cut off the creditor from all future claim. But he would try this, as a practical objection, and test it by experience. He would ask the question, what is the value of a claim against a failing creditor now, after an agreement has been made and acted on? Precisely what it would be after a certificate of discharge was given. After an assignment the debt subsists—so it does after a certificate of discharge. The moral obligation remains unextinguished; and it has been held in the courts of law, that, upon a new promise to pay a debt, after a certificate has been obtained, is a sufficient consideration to support the action. The certificate doubtless bars the legal claim, but if the sense of honor will induce a man to pay after an assignment, it will be equally operative after a discharge. It is notorious that society draws a line of distinction between debts created before and after a failure; and the payment of debts after assignment creates as much surprise, and is marked with as much emphasis, as if it had been done after a discharge. This consideration had, in his opinion, been greatly overrated, and more importance was attached to it, than experience would warrant. It was not only private creditors, however, but the Government also, which was interested in the adoption of the law. He alluded to the collection of the revenue. In case of death or public bankruptcy, where the property is subject to a dividend pursuant to law, the Government is entitled to a preference. But the case is otherwise where the failing debtor takes the law into his own hands, becomes his own commissioner, and makes such preferences as his own will and pleasure may dictate. In this way the Government may lose, and has already lost, very great sums of money. Mr. S. would not undertake, at this time, to anticipate the various objections that might be raised to the bill. Some had thought that, because it contained within itself severe enactments against fraud, that it presupposed it productive of fraud. If he (Mr. S.) thought it was calculated to generate fraud, he would by no means support it. But it was not obvious that a bankrupt law was more liable to frauds than other modes of coercing payment. Was it an objection to an execution, obtained by ordinary process of law, that the debtor may be guilty of fraud to evade it? It was so liable, Mr. S. contended, as the practice that now prevailed, where the bankrupt was left to make the law for himself. In the way in which the examinations were taken in England, great and frequent fraud were unquestionably practised.

This was owing not so much to the bankrupt law, as to the growth of crime in that kingdom. The root of the evil was in the state of society. The Lord Chancellor has the sole cognizance and direction of the law throughout the realm. The examination is ex parte and in secret, and the merchant is ignorant of the proceeding until he finds his name in the gazette, published as a bankrupt. If he then wishes to contest the legality of the commission, he must petition the Lord Chancellor to avoid it. No such provision was to be found in the bill before the House; and it was strange indeed that it had ever obtained among the enlightened jurists of England. Another mischief arose in the administration of the bankrupt law in that kingdom, in relation to what were called country commissions; or such as arose out of the city of London. In those cases the commissioner was appointed by the solicitor; here he is appointed by the President of the United States. There the business was transacted without regularity, in the midst of noise; and the commissioner at one table would perhaps turn round and be a solicitor at the next; but no such mischief could exist under this bill. Another appalling objection had been, the cost and expenses of an English commission. It was indeed enormous—but so were all their modes of justice, and particularly all their chancery proceedings. It had been also said, that bankruptcies occasioned delay; but it was difficult to conceive that there should be more delay on this case than under a voluntary assignment. The weightiest argument, however, and that which seemed to have sunk deepest into the minds of the people against the bill, was the operation of the law of 1800.

Mr. S. here took occasion to advert to what he believed had proved, in its effect, the strongest argument, with many persons, against the passage of a bankrupt law, viz: The unpopularity of the former bankrupt law, which, he argued, ought to be attributed to circumstances not really affecting the merits of that system. The law establishing it passed in the year 1800, and was limited, in its duration, to the year 1806, but was repealed in December, 1803; so that time was not allowed for a fair experiment under it. The law was passed, too, at a time of as great party excitement as ever existed in the United States; it made its appearance in the midst of the ferment occasioned by other measures; and the bankrupt law of 1800 is never thought of by many without associating it in idea with other measures of that day, which had no necessary connection with it. It came into existence amidst the storm of angry passions rushing over the land; and from the moment it made its appearance, as the two parties brought every thing to a party test, it had one of these parties for its friends and another for its enemies. From this circumstance, a prejudice had arisen against a system of bankruptcy, which ought not now to have any weight, it not having now any party aspect. The objections, in general, which were made to this bill, Mr. S. went on to argue, applied with equal force to the existing systems in the United States, which were as fertile in frauds and in litigation as this system could be supposed to be. What, he asked, was the attachment law of some of the States? What was that of Pennsylvania, which had been on the statute book for many years? It was an imperfect mode of attempting the same thing which a bankrupt law would more perfectly accomplish. The necessity was felt, in that State and elsewhere, of some mode of laying hold of the property of those who show, by secreting their property, or by absconding, that they are in the act of failing. In Massachusetts, also, there is an attachment law, the import of which he did not precisely know. There was one in New York, too, which he understood authorized the creditor to seize on all the effects of the absent or absconding debtor. Mr. S. here quoted the provisions of the law of Pennsylvania, authorizing, among other things, that, on the debtor's concealing himself, a general warrant may issue, &c. This, Mr. S. said, was the very act which was supposed to be so alarming in the bankrupt law, but which in that law, as well as in the State laws, was intended to prevent fraud and litigation, &c. He anticipated the argument that, if the States could pass such laws, it was not necessary for Congress to act upon the subject, by saying, that the State laws would neither be uniform nor general in their operation, being confined to the limits of the respective States, &c., and therefore could not be an efficient substitute for a system of bankruptcy. The fact, however, that means precisely the same were employed by the States, to the extent of their power, as those now proposed to be made general and uniform, by an act of Congress, went far to answer that objection to this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON said that he would proceed briefly to the consideration of the principles and leading provisions of the bill.

This was, in effect, the English system of bankruptcy, differing only in some of its details, and in the nature of its punishments and prohibitions. He objected to it in toto. 1st. Because it had wholly failed in its operation in England, (where it could be more easily enforced than in this country,) and would consequently fail here. 2dly. That it was a system filled with mischief and fraud, not suitable to our notions of civil liberty or the principles of our jurisprudence, nor the morals, manners, or habits of the people.

Let us see, in the first place, how the system has operated in England. And here, Mr. S. said, before he proceeded further, he would beg leave to say one word in answer to that part of the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) as to the effect of the bankrupt laws of France, Holland, and Spain. Those countries were not like ours. Their Governments are despotic, ours limited and con-finer. There they had no security for rights of persons and property, (but discretion of ruling power,) here constitution—in protections and safeguards. Their principles of civil liberty and jurisprudence wholly different from ours, as well as the morals and habits of the people. The effect of their laws ought to have no influence here; and we should look, if anywhere, alone to that country, from whom it is said we borrow the system, and whose Government, laws, and people, are nearest our own. That the bankrupt system has not been beneficial in England, Mr. S. said, could be easily shown. And as it was matter of fact, rather than argument, he had lately examined with some labor and care the minutes of evidence taken before the select committee of the House of Commons appointed to consider the bankrupt laws and their operation, in the year 1818; from which he had taken some extracts, which he should ask leave to read to the committee. As to the character of this evidence, and the weight it should have, Mr. S. said he could not do better than give the words of the committee in their report to the House of Commons:

"Your committee did not consider themselves at liberty to contemplate merely the case of particular and insulated defects, but felt themselves under an obligation to take a general and comprehensive view of the whole system of proceeding under the present constitution of the bankrupt code. In the prosecution of their inquiry, your committee have sought that information which was to direct their judgment from professional men of extensive experience; and while your committee confess their unfeigned admiration of the truly upright and disinterested manner in which these gentlemen have delivered their evidence with respect to a system for the continuance of which they might naturally be expected to feel some predilection, your committee cannot too earnestly recommend that evidence to the attentive consideration of the House."

Mr. S. then read various parts of the evidence referred to. He began with Basil Montague, the first witness, who said:

"That he believed it was common for the most undeserving bankrupts to obtain their certificates by fraudulent and improper means, to the great injury of the good creditor, and to the great injury of public justice; and he thought that it frequently happened that dishonest bankrupts, from having recourse to means from which honesty would recoil, had greater facility in obtaining their certificates than honest men possess."

J. F. Vandercorn was of opinion that the majority of "commissions were issued with the concurrence, and at the request of the bankrupt. He said that it often happened that the affairs of a bankrupt were in such a state as that, however unwilling he might be to fall under the odium of a bankrupt, he saw it to the advantage of his creditors and himself to acquiesce in the measure, and therefore he managed as he was directed to do, and an act of bankruptcy was committed."

Geo. Lavie.—"He said that, as the bankrupt laws are at present administered, they afforded advantage to no one except to bankrupts. Being asked whether his prepossession against the bankrupt laws did not sies from a strong opinion of their general insufficiency, he answered, most certainly; and he said he saw a great deal of it in the early part of his life, which had led him to the opinions he now entertained of the total inadequacy of the bankrupt laws, as now administered."

A. Waithman.—The following interrogatory put by the committee: "Are you of opinion that the bankrupt law, as it now exists in this country, is a scandal and disgrace to it?" "I have long considered it so; that it has held out a great inducement to dishonesty. Mr. Townsend, the Bow Street officer, once told me he had a conversation with Major Sample, who said: 'Why, sir, I have been a fool all my life; I have not known how to go to work; I have been running the risk of my life for trifling things; but if I were to begin my life again, I would open a shop as a trader or merchant, and become a bankrupt, and make my fortune at once.'"

J. Ingram Lockhart, a member of Parliament, and one of the committee.—"The observations which I have to offer to the committee were written three years since, have been but little varied, and are the result, partly of an experience in country commissions, and partly, but chiefly, of frequent thinking on the subject. I have, in almost every commission in which I have been named, found that the bankrupt had acted with great injustice towards his creditors, generally with dishonesty and fraud, and always with imprudence and carelessness, of the wreck of his substance, which in fact was not his own, but theirs; and this conduct I can only trace to one cause, and that is, the facility with which almost every bankrupt goes through the operation of his commission, and the situation he is generally found in after his last examination, and the appearance he is enabled by some means to make, and the connections he renews after his bankruptcy. The want of due investigation into his conduct, of a discrimination between the dishonest and unfortunate, appear to me to be a radical fault in this system of the bankrupt law, pervading the whole of it, and producing the most pernicious effects on the morals of the subjects of this realm."

Archibald Cullen.—The committee will be happy to hear your ideas on the subject of the bankrupt law. He answers: "The bankrupt law was introduced with a view to prevent and punish the frauds of debtors, and to distribute their property equally among all their creditors. But it has not succeeded. However wise the original plan may have been thought, yet it does not now, even with all its subsequent alterations and accessions, appear to effect either of the objects which it professed; the property is not forthcoming, or is wasted; the same frauds still exist, neither diminished nor punished; and a new class has sprung up, engendered by the very proceedings which have been instituted to prevent them; so that the prominent and growing evil of the present day, with respect to debtor and creditor, appears to be the bankrupt law itself."

This said Mr. STEVENSON, is the evidence of some of the most distinguished solicitors, counsellors, and commissioners of England, upon the effect of their system of bankruptcy; to which I beg leave to add one additional authority, that of Lord Chancellor Eldon, (reported in Vesey.)

"The Lord Chancellor took the first occasion of expressing strong indignation at the frauds committed under cases of the bankrupt law, and his determination to repress such practices. On this subject his Lordship observed, with warmth, that the abuse of the bankrupt laws is a disgrace to the country, and it would be better at once to repeal all the statutes than to suffer them to be applied to such purposes. As they are frequently conducted in the country, they are little more than stock in trade for the commissioners, the assignees, and solicitor."

Mr. S. said he would also refer, whilst he was on this part of the subject, to the report of the committee upon the subject of the bankrupt law in Ireland, to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania on yesterday had allusion; from which it would appear that the system had failed, not only in England, but Ireland:

"It will be seen (says the report) that, although much and very material evidence has been collected upon the operation of the bankrupt law in Ireland—establishing grievances of the most serious description, and, indeed, the total failure of the plan for any beneficial consequence, your committee have not proposed any measures to meet the evils which are the subject of complaint; they therefore feel it due to the House to state, that they regard the statute by which the bankrupt system was established in Ireland, as of so modern a date, compared with the English statutes, that it occurs to your committee that it might be proper to establish an entirely new system instead of the one which has proved so unsatisfactory; but, as it is essential that such a system should be formed with reference to local circumstances, and to principles of jurisprudence in a great degree peculiar to that part of the empire, and not familiar to your committee, it has appeared to them most respectful to the House merely to submit the evidence, and to leave ulterior measures to those who may be better qualified to form a judgment with respect to the alterations which it would be most for the public interest to adopt."

Have we not already had one proof that this system, which is now urged upon this House as an experiment, has totally failed after a full and fair trial? The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) felt the force of his objection, and ingeniously endeavored to avoid it, by impressing the House with the opinion that the old bankrupt law of 1800 was the offspring of party, and was ushered into being amidst the storms and excesses of party spirit, and therefore unpopular, &c. Of this fact, Mr. S. said he could with certainty say nothing, being too young to know any thing personally of the occurrences of those times, but he might venture to say that, from the course of events which succeeded the coming in of the Republican party, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) was mistaken in the fact. We all know, Mr. S. said, there were certain laws which passed under what was termed the Federal Administration, and believed to be of a party character, which were consequently unpopular to the new administration, and continued to be so until repealed; the judiciary and bank laws Mr. S. particularly alluded to—the one was directly repealed, and the other expired. But if this bankrupt law had been considered, in those days of heat and contest, as a party measure, and intended as such, to be saddled on the nation by a party going out of power, rely on it, among the first acts done by the new administration, would have been the repeal of this law—it would have been expunged from the statute book which it stained, and not suffered to linger out an existence of so many years. Mr. S. said he therefore felt justified in saying that the fact was not as the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) had supposed; the law of 1800 was passed, (and he said it too in honor of the Congress that passed it,) from other and better motives—as an experiment called for at that time by the commercial part of the country, and which expired under the weight of its own sins. It ought then to be considered as a fair experiment, which the enemies of this bill had a right to claim, and which should have weight with the House.

Militia Fines.

Mr. BUCHANAN submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire and report to this House the causes why no part of the sum of $248,609 41, the amount imposed as fines by courts-martial, held under the authority of the United States on militiamen within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, for delinquencies which occurred during the late war with Great Britain, has yet been received into the Treasury; how much of the said sum has been collected from the delinquents by the late marshal and the present marshals of Pennsylvania, and their deputies respectively, and what are the names and places of residence of such deputies; how much of the money collected remains in the hands of the deputies, and how much has been paid over by them to their respective principals; who are the sureties of the late marshal, John Smith, and of his deputies, respectively; what is the amount of each of their bonds, and what is the prospect of recovering the whole or any part of the money remaining in their hands; what causes have heretofore prevented the institution of suits against the said John Smith, his deputies, and their sureties, to recover the militia fines retained by them, respectively; and under what authority, by whom and to whom, the sum of $41,581 77 has been paid out of the said fines to defray the expenses of the courts-martial by which they were assessed.

In offering this resolution, Mr. BUCHANAN said, that a sense of duty, and not a desire to give trouble and cast reflections upon any officer of this Government, compelled him to bring before this House the subject of the collection of militia fines from delinquent militiamen in Pennsylvania. He would, he said, state the facts connected with it, and which were so many reasons why the resolution should pass, without doing more at the present time. The State of Pennsylvania during the late war furnished her full proportion of men and of money to the General Government, to enable them to carry on the contest. She furnished more than her quota of volunteers and militia. It however happened, that, owing to the pious and peaceful habits of the people of that State, conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms, there occurred, in obtaining the number of men required by draught, a great number of delinquencies; which were more than made up by volunteers. It followed, therefore, that while Pennsylvania, as a State, can with pride and with pleasure declare that she fulfilled, in the most ample manner, all her federal obligations, yet there was a very large proportion of her citizens fined as delinquent militiamen. From the letter of the Secretary of War, of February 14, 1821, it appeared that out of nine States, on the citizens of which militia fines were assessed, and from eight of which returns have been received, the fines assessed on citizens of Pennsylvania amount to a larger sum than all the fines assessed on the citizens of seven of the States:

The assessment on Pennsylvania amounted to - - - -	$248,609 41
On New Hampshire, New York, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, East Tennessee, West
Tennessee, to - - - -	240,076

These fines were assessed, chiefly, if not altogether, within the years 1813, 1814, and 1815; and, strange and wonderful as it may appear, not one cent of that large amount assessed on citizens of Pennsylvania has yet reached the Treasury of the United States. It is within my own knowledge, said Mr. B., that very large sums of this money have been collected by the deputy marshals, and much distress has been spread over the country in levying these fines from the poorer classes of the citizens within our State. It is very natural that every State in the Union, particularly Pennsylvania, should be anxious to have the darkness which hangs over this subject dispelled, and the guilty agents exposed to the light of day. It is possible that by an investigation something may be obtained; if not, the authors of the shameful frauds which have been perpetrated will be dragged from the concealment in which they now lurk. On the 4th of December, 1820, at the instance of a gentleman from Pennsylvania, a resolution was passed by this House, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information on the subject, which for some cause or other remained unanswered, but on the 2d of January, 1821, was renewed. And, said Mr. B., what answer has been given to it? It consists of six clauses, answers to which would embrace all the information we desire. The answer to the first is a letter from the present marshal, which Mr. B. read; from which, he said, it appeared that almost three years had been suffered to expire since this communication, and it does not appear that any measures have been taken to secure the books and papers.

The department could therefore communicate no information on the subject. The second query, how much money had been received into the Treasury, on account of these fines, was easily answered; not a cent had been received. The third query the department is unable to answer, except that $3,671 80 is in the hands of the present marshal, and $2,546 60 in the hands of Lewis Deffenbach, one of his deputies in Bucks county. The fourth query, as to the names of the deputies and the sureties of the late marshal, was not answered. Indeed, it appeared that the department never either inquired or knew who were the sureties of the marshal, or who were his deputies or sureties. It appeared, further, that no action had ever yet been instituted against the late marshal or his deputies on these bonds, except against one of the deputies. The object, therefore, Mr. B. said, of his resolution, was to obtain the information which the former vote of the House had failed to procure, &c.

The motion of Mr. B. was agreed to, and Messrs. BUCHANAN, MOORE of Pennsylvania, NELSON of Maryland, DUFFEE, and RICH, were appointed the committee.

FRIDAY, January 25.

The Bankrupt Bill.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on this bill.

Mr. A. SMITH, of Virginia, rose, and moved to strike out the first section of the bill; and the question thereon having been stated—

Mr. A. SMITH, of Virginia, rose to address the Chair. He commenced his observations by remarking that he regarded this bill as containing a proposition that was calculated to sacrifice the liberties of the people, to destroy personal security, and the security of property; to abolish the mild and equitable systems of jurisprudence which the wisdom and policy of the States had ordained; to take the administration of justice out of the hands of independent judges, and to transfer it to obscure and irresponsible commissioners paid by the day. It changes, said he, the civil code of the country as to the collection of debts, conflicts with the administration of justice under State authority; with the acts against fraudulent conveyances; with the remedies in chancery for setting such conveyances aside, and transfers those to the federal courts. He considered it as a foundation on which nothing good could be erected; and the details of the bill, having received the deliberate approbation of its friends, having had their sanction in England and in this country in 1800, in 1818, and 1820, will be considered as necessary parts of the whole system, and if it can be shown that they are productive of mischief, it will prove that the whole system is radically wrong.

Under the British system, and the bill on the table, the first inquiry presented was—who may become a bankrupt? The term merchant was well understood. It was susceptible of precise definition. But this law had received such a construction that, although it purported to be confined to them, it was in reality extended to others. If a man deals at all, he is subject to the liabilities of the English bankrupt law; nor does that liability depend upon the extent of his dealings. By the British system, a buying and selling brings a man within its provisions. If a piece of cloth is severed, and one part of it is taken to the bleacher's to be whitened, and the other to the dyer's to be colored, the latter is held to be liable to the enactments of the bankrupt law, and the former is not—and the reason given is, that the bleacher bestows only his labor, and the dyer incorporates with it his colors, which brings him within the purview of the act. The bill on the table, it is admitted, contains various exceptions, and is so framed as to avoid this distinction. But every one who buys and sells, however small his profits, compared to his other income, and however few the instances of his buying and selling, is liable to be a bankrupt, unless he comes within some one of the particular exceptions. But, although none but merchants are entitled to partake of what are called the benefits of this law, yet it is far from the fact that no other class of the community is affected by it. By the English system, buying and selling horses will subject the farmer to bankruptcy; and a brick-maker who rents a piece of land and makes and sells bricks, will also be liable. The reason of these cases will subject persons to the operation of this bill who little apprehend such a consequence.

There was another objection to the bill of no small importance. It was an objection of a negative character, for the bill contained no provision that a corporation, for instance a bank, should be a bankrupt—and this provision, whenever such a bill was about to be passed, ought to stand at the head of it. If there existed any case in which such a law would be justifiable and expedient, it would be in the case of a banking corporation. It was a duty imposed on Congress by the constitution, to regulate the currency of the country, and they ought as far as in them lay, to restore soundness to the currency of the United States. But instead of extending the provisions of the bill to banking corporations, it was restricted to merchants, traders, and such others as were specifically enumerated.

Mr. S. contended that the principles of the bill were an invasion upon the rights of man—and he would first pay attention to the weaker sex. It was an unquestionable error of the common law that it did not sufficiently guard the just rights of the fairer part of the creation. By marriage the husband acquires the whole personal estate of the wife, and, if he becomes entitled to take as tenant by the courtesy, he has the whole of his real estate during his life; whereas, if she survives him, she takes only one-third part of his lands for life, as dower, and a part of his personal estate, which is fixed by law.

In Virginia, a man without a cent marries a lady having one hundred slaves; if she dies tomorrow, the slaves are all his; but should he die to-morrow, and she survive, she gets back one-third of her own slaves for her life only. This, Mr. S. contended, was monstrous injustice, and it would be still more monstrous to extend the evil instead of applying a remedy. Yet, such would be the natural and inevitable tendency of the bill. Instead of softening the rigor of the common law, it gave new severity, and impaired those few privileges of women which the common law and laws of the States had left. By the common law, choses in action, such as debts, stocks, and the like, survived to the wife in case the husband did not reduce them to possession during his life. But, by this bill, the assignees may come in, and sweep away from her all that the delicacy, or honor, or sense of justice of her husband had spared. It takes for the payment of the husband's debts what does not yet belong to the husband—what would survive to the wife if she should outlive the husband; and thus adds to the injustice of the common law. By the Spanish law, when the husband was made a bankrupt, the wife was entitled to dower. It was a provision characteristic of the chivalry of a gallant nation, and deserving of example. If the law, said Mr. SMYTH, is to be made for the merchants and for their benefit alone—then, on them only should it operate. But how does it stand? I represent, said he, a large district, which contains fifty-five persons engaged in mercantile pursuits—merchants, pedlars, and merchants' clerks, and near ten thousand persons employed in agriculture. The fifty-five are, to those engaged in agriculture, as one to one hundred and fifty. If, indeed, that small proportion wished for the passage of the law, and they only were to be affected by it, it would not be so objectionable. But the difficulty is, that all the rest of the community must severely feel its effects. A merchant becomes bankrupt at Richmond, and has a debtor four hundred miles in the interior, who is dragged that whole distance to answer to such interrogatories as the commissioners may, in their wisdom, see fit to propound. Again—if he disputes the claim made against him, he is liable to a heavy punishment by forfeiture of double the value of the debt claimed, on the ground of concealment. Nor is this all. The doors of any man in the community may be broken open on suspicion, either real or pretended, that the bankrupt is within. The sanctuary of private repose is liable to invasion, and so far from his house being his castle, according to the maxim of the English law, it is subject to be violated by every minion of authority. In England no one can, at any time, break and enter but the sheriff. He is a known public officer. But here the person who is to exercise this great power is not even sworn. He is the creature of the commissioners, and he derives from them his authority. Sworn officers cannot be had. It would require one thousand in the United States duly to execute this system; yet to these unsworn and irresponsible persons is confided this tremendous power. Again—a trustee undertakes, with the most benevolent motives, to manage an estate. Within ten days he must disclose it, and if he fails to do so, although through ignorance, not knowing it to be his duty to disclose the trust, yet he is liable to a heavy forfeiture of twice the value. The farmers, also, are subjected to another great inconvenience. When they contract a debt with a merchant in the same State, they are liable to be sued only before the State courts—but, by an act of bankruptcy on the part of the merchant, they will become liable to be sued before the federal court, and subjected to all the increase of cost, trouble, and expense, that must necessarily attend it. This bill violates the rules of evidence. It gives a remedy for a single contract debt, barred by the statute of limitations, on the mere affidavit of the creditor, and on such an affidavit of such a debt, the person against whom it is claimed may be declared a bankrupt. A certified copy of the commission and assignment is made conclusive evidence that the party is a bankrupt, although declared so without a hearing, and in his absence.

But it had been urged as a strong argument in favor of the law, that it provides a relief for the unfortunate debtor. If this suggestion were founded in fact, he should look to the bill with a more favorable eye. But he had examined it with attention, and he could find nothing in it decidedly favorable to the debtor. It was altogether in favor of the wealthy merchants. This would be found in every section. So far from being favorable to the debtors, it was hard and cruel and severe upon them, especially those of the middling class. Mr. S. would agree that those who were now insolvent were anxious for its passage; but if they thought it could afford them relief, they deluded themselves. They were not included in its provisions. The law did not apply to those who were already insolvent. To take the benefit of it they must be "actually using" the trade of merchandise. But those who have already failed, cannot be said to use, in the present tense, the trade of merchandise. That time has passed by—or should they undertake it again, yet they would be cut off by another provision—for those who may have become traders, for the purpose of taking the benefit of the law, are, by the 84th section, specially excluded from it. All present insolvents, who are not now traders, are forbidden to expect protection from a certificate obtained hereafter. Their hopes are blasted. A certificate will yield them no protection; and, what is worse, this question may be raised in every case. Nor is the certificate available, if there has been fraud or concealment, which of course is liable to endless question. Again: The bankrupt is not entitled to a certificate, unless the commissioners will certify that he has made a full discovery. This admits of great latitude of construction. They must certify positively in a case in which positive knowledge is difficult to obtain, and the want of which nothing else can supply.

There was no constitutional power, Mr. S. contended, to discharge a man from his debts. This was a Government of delegated powers. It was not like original sovereign States who had all powers; but such powers as were not expressly given, were reserved. The question then here is, where is the constitutional authority to take the property of A and to give it to B? Is such a power expressly given? No; it will not be pretended. Is it given by implication? No; it is forbidden by strong implication. The States were prohibited from impairing the obligation of contracts; and can the General Government prescribe to others moral obligations to which it is not bound itself to yield obedience? Can Congress say that, from and after the passage of a law, a horse belonging to A shall belong to B? Such an act would be a violation of those social and fundamental principles on which the Government is based, and by which it is held together. Such an act would be not only beyond the power of a Legislature, but even a constitution; or the people themselves could never sanction it. The obligations of justice and right are paramount to all others. Even the people, in their primary and collective capacity, have no power to divest individuals of their rights or property. A debt is property, and is subject to the same rules, and entitled to the same privileges and protection. It is provided that this Government cannot take private property for public use, without giving to the owner a fair and adequate compensation. It is also true, as I contend, that Government cannot take private property for private use, even with compensation, much less without it. No Government has the moral right to do injustice of this kind. It may have the power to effect it, but to exert that power would be an act of tyranny.

The insolvent laws of the States Mr. S. believed, were preferable to a general system. They were adapted to the situation and circumstances of those on whom they were to operate; whereas, this law was of an arbitrary character—it was cruel, and abhorrent to the feelings of a free and generous people. We ought not to familiarize ourselves to laws of this kind. It was a part of our constitution that excessive fines should not be imposed, nor cruel punishments inflicted. And yet, turn to the nineteenth section of the act, and you find four several offences which a bankrupt may commit, punished with ten years' imprisonment. Is this in the spirit of our humane institutions? The ordinary punishment for perjury is three years' imprisonment; but, in the case of a bankrupt committing perjury, the punishment is ten years' imprisonment; and, such are the singular provisions of the bill, that, wherever the debtor or his friends swear false, the false oath is declared perjury; but wherever the creditor or his friends swear false, it is no offence at all, as, on examining the second, fifth, seventh, twenty-first, and thirty-sixth sections, you will perceive. At least, it is made no offence by this bill. Is this equal and exact justice? Mr. S. also adverted to other harsh features and excessive forfeitures that the bill provided, among which was $1,000 for concealing, or even receiving the bankrupt. Suppose a kind and indulgent father is reduced from affluence, and seeks protection from pursuit under the roof of an affectionate son—a son who had been supported by his tenderness and nurtured by his care. He appears at the gate, and asks for admittance. Shall the son refuse him? If he receive him, he is ruined. The fine that hangs over him beggars him and his children. If he denies him he agonizes his own heart, and stains his reputation with black ingratitude. And shall a law be passed making filial piety a crime—a law which cannot be obeyed without incurring dishonor? It was a cruel and iniquitous system. But, by these remarks, he would not be understood to implicate, in the remotest degree, the gentleman (Mr. SERGEANT) by whom the bill was reported. It was taken from the British law, and remodelled after the act of 1800. Not a clause of it was from the pen of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. A difficulty lay in the system, it being the English system, which it was not in the power of human capacity to render beneficial to society. It was a system calculated only to fill the pocket of the merchant creditor; and, by referring to the details of the bill, it would be seen that many of the enormous forfeitures and penalties which it prescribed, went to the use of the creditors, so that they might even grow rich upon the violations of the law. Every thing was brought within the creditor's grasp. Not even the habeas corpus was spared; that constitutional safeguard of our rights was liable, by the fortieth section, to be suspended, and the security it yields destroyed. The course of the administration of justice was to be changed; the courts of the United States are to take the place of the State tribunals, and a new and productive source of litigation to be opened. It would, indeed, be speedy, so far as it regarded the man, for he would be speedily destroyed; but not so the cause. The old law was in operation but eighteen months, and yet eighteen years did not terminate all the cases that arose under it. It had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) that that act was a party measure. He (Mr. SMYTH) would agree that it was so in its enactment, but not so in its repeal; and he adverted to the ayes and noes on the question, to prove that it was repealed by a large majority of both parties.

But there was another constitutional objection that, to his mind, was insuperable. The constitution provides that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in the Supreme Court, and such courts as Congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish; and that the Judges shall be independent in the tenure of their office, and shall receive a fixed compensation. Under this bill, a large number (probably not less than 8,000) of judges are to be appointed, by the name of commissioners. These persons will be in fact judges. Judicial powers are confided to them, and they have been recognized in England as courts of justice, exercising equitable powers. Their courts are not indeed courts of record in that country, but they would be so here, for copies of their proceedings are made evidence. By the express terms of the bill they are recognized as exercising judicial power. They are said to "adjudge," and their acts are spoken of as "judgments." A judge is he who applies the law to the facts of a particular case, and declares the result. Can there be a doubt that that declaration which divests a man of property and liberty in pursuance of a law, is a judgment? Then, if these commissioners exercise judicial power, they cannot be appointed by the President alone; the concurrence of the Senate is also necessary. Their tenure of office should also be during good behavior, and, instead of receiving hiring wages, at five dollars per day, as the bill provides, they should have a compensation pursuant to the constitution, which should be neither increased nor diminished during their continuance in office.

In addition to all these objections, there was another, which to his mind was of still greater importance. It was an objection that lay at the foundation of our free and equal institutions. This bill proposed to incorporate the mercantile community with a system of laws peculiar to themselves—to embody them together, and to separate them from the rest of the community. It was calculated to subject the middling class of traders to the power of the wealthy merchants, and to give to the latter distinctive and corporate powers. They would be as completely a corporation as the Bank of the United States. And what would be the effect? The merchants have already, as one of them formerly told us on this floor, nineteen-twentieths of the movable property in the country, and all the banks. The result would be that the banks would govern the city merchants, the city merchants would control the merchants of the country, and the latter, in their turn, would give law to the rest of the community. Of all aristocracies, a moneyed aristocracy was most to be avoided—and never could it be wise in this Government to amalgamate the force of this powerful order, and give to it an interest and sympathy diverse from the rest of the people. If, unfortunately, such a body should be so organized, it was not difficult to discern that they would, ere long, fix the Government of the United States, and control its destinies.

TUESDAY, January 29.

Carver's Grant.

The House then agreed to take into consideration the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. WALWORTH, calling for information respecting the pretended titles of the heirs of Jonathan Carver, of certain lands near the falls of St. Anthony, on the Mississippi River.

Mr. W. stated that frauds were committed, and innocent purchasers drawn in by persons pretending to a title to these lands. His object was, that such information might be given, through the medium of this House, as might forewarn purchasers of the falsity of the title.

Mr. COLDEN thought it improper for this House to undertake to decide upon questions of title. He would not even take a course that might prepossess public opinion one way or the other on such a question. It was a matter not within the province of Congress. He, therefore, moved to strike out the word "pretended," and to insert, after the word "claim," the words "made by," before the words "the heirs."

The amendment prevailed, and after a few remarks by Mr. TRACY, who doubted the propriety of even making an inquiry into this title more than into titles to other lands claimed by individuals, the question was taken, and the resolution adopted.

General Jackson and Judge Fromentin.

A Message received yesterday, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the 2d instant, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State, with all the documents relating to the misunderstanding between General Jackson, while acting as Governor of the Florida, and Eiegius Fromentin, judge of a court therein; and also of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty, on certain proceedings in that Territory, in execution of the powers vested in the Governor by the Executive, under the law of the last session, for carrying into effect the late treaty between the United States and Spain. Being always desirous to communicate to Congress, or to either House, all the information in the possession of the Executive respecting any important interest of our Union, which may be communicated without real injury to our constituents, and which can rarely happen, except in negotiations pending with foreign powers; and deeming it more consistent with the principles of our Government, in cases submitted to my discretion, as in the present instance, to hazard error by the freedom of the communication rather than by withholding any portion of information belonging to the subject, I have thought proper to communicate every document comprised within this call.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 28, 1822.

Mr. WHITMAN moved to refer the Message, with the documents accompanying the same, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to designate in their report such parts thereof as, in their opinion, it might be proper to publish.

Mr. BALDWIN thought the part which related to any controversy between General Jackson and Judge Fromentin should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the residue only to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WRIGHT wished to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and Mr. BUCHANAN to the Committee on the Judiciary. Messrs. WARFIELD and SERGEANT thought, if one part of the communication was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, because Judge Fromentin was concerned in it, the correspondent part of it should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, because it related to General Jackson; so between both committees, the one laying hold of the Judge, and the other of the General, they might perhaps be kept apart.

Mr. WOOD was in favor of referring the subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but the question was at length taken, and the motion prevailed to lay the whole on the table.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, then moved that the communication and documents be printed; which, after remarks thereon by the mover, and Messrs. CANNON, F. JONES, MAILLARD, and ALLEN, of Tennessee, was carried, as to each branch of the documents communicated.*

* The collision with the Judge, Fromentin, grew out of the affair of Governor Callava, and of the Judge's attempt to release him from the calaboose by writ of habeas corpus. On hearing of that attempt the Judge was required to appear before Governor Jackson, forthwith, "to show cause why he has attempted to interfere with my authority as Governor of the Floridas, exercising the powers of the Captain General and Intendant of the Island of Cuba, or said provinces respectively, in my judicial capacity as supreme judge over the same, and as chancellor thereof." The Judge appeared accordingly, and Governor Jackson having understood the Judge to confess to error in issuing the writ, and promising not to do so again, he accepted the declaration as an apology, and released the Judge; but Judge Fromentin having denied the apology, a most violent contest took place between them, in which the legality of the Governor's conduct, both with respect to Callava, was vehemently disputed, and carried the Judge, Fromentin, before the President. The Judge justified his issue of the writ upon the common law, the Constitution of the United States, his own commission as a United States Territorial Judge, and the act of Congress of 1789, authorizing all the courts of the United States to issue this remedial writ. Governor Jackson answered him, that the constitution and none of these laws extended to the Territory—that only two acts of Congress had been extended to it, one for the collection of the revenue, and the other to prevent the importation of slaves from abroad; and that he (Judge Fromentin) must confine himself to the execution of these two acts. It was the fashion during General Jackson's public life to decry him as ignorant and rash; yet no officer, called upon so often to decide on questions of national, municipal, or constitutional law, and all upon the instant, and in camps, or on the frontier, could have decided so correctly. And so in this case of Fromentin. The Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, answered his complaint, and in the very words which Governor Jackson had used, saying: "I am directed by the President to inform you that the laws of the United States relative to the revenue and its collection, and those relating to the slave trade, having been the only ones extended by act of Congress to the Territories of Florida, it was to the Vaccination, &c.

Mr. BURTON, of North Carolina, rose, and said it was with great reluctance that he claimed the indulgence of the House to introduce a resolution on any subject, when he remembered the manner in which the table had been crowded for several weeks past; but he assured the House that it was not his intention to add to the present herculean task of the Heads of Departments. For all those gentlemen, said he, I have the highest respect; and believing that they have full employment already, I shall endeavor to show my respect in some other way than by adding to their labors. Thus far in the present session I have remained silent; from which course I should not have departed, in the present instance, but from an imperious sense of duty. The substance of the resolution which I propose to offer is, that a select committee should be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law for the encouragement of vaccination, passed in the year 1818. I have no doubt but that this law originated from the purest principle of benevolence, since it has for its object to guard the human family against one of the most fatal diseases to which we are incident—I mean the small-pox. But, notwithstanding I have before stated that I believe that this law sprang from the best feelings of the human heart, yet it is likely to prove one of the greatest calamities which has for several years befallen that part of the country in which I reside. I have no execution of these only that your commission as a United States judge was intended to apply. In the execution of these laws, in your judicial capacity, the Governor (Jackson) has been informed that you are considered only amenable to the Government of the United States." And thus, the constitution, and all the habeas corpus laws of the United States with which the Judge had fortified himself, were taken from around him; and in every thing except administering the revenue and the slave trade laws, he was left to the authority of the Captain General and Intendant of Cuba, in his supreme executive, legislative, judicial, civil, and military powers. By way of easing the Judge down, a compliment was extended on the integrity of his motives, while regretting the collision which had resulted from his mistaken invocation of the constitution and the habeas corpus statutes. Thus: "In the different view which you have taken of the subject, the President is persuaded that your motives and intentions were entirely pure, though he deeply regrets the collision of authority, and the misunderstanding which has arisen between the Governor of the Territory and yourself."—Letter of October 26th, 1831.

I deem these transactions in Florida, and the act for its temporary government, the strongest illustrations of the difference between States and Territories which can be devised. The temporary government was itself a continuation of the Spanish government, and intended to be independent of our constitution. That was decided by a direct vote, as well as shown by the act. When the bill was under discussion, Mr. Allen, of Massachusetts, moved a proviso, that the government established by it, should "not be incompatible with the Constitution of the United States;" which was rejected without a division.

wish to make an attack upon Dr. Smith, of Baltimore, (the vaccine agent, under that law,) or any other gentleman, without giving him a fair opportunity of defending himself. But this much will I say, that by some strange accident that disease has been introduced into North Carolina, and has in the course of a few weeks been scattered for several miles around. How this happened, no satisfactory account has been rendered. Some deaths have taken place, and the inhabitants in that part of the country are in a state of alarm and consternation, more easily imagined than described. I am very certain that any feeble effort, on my part, would fall very far short of reality. I wish a select committee to be appointed, who are capable to make a thorough examination of the subject. And if there has been any fault on the part of the agent, that he should not have it in his power again to do further injury under the sanction of the law. And if, on the other hand, there has been no fault on his part, he should be reinstated to public confidence, which has been much shaken by the late transaction.

Mr. B.'s resolution was in the following words:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law passed in the year A. D. 1813, entitled "An act to encourage vaccination."

Mr. LITTLE made a few observations expressive of his high confidence in the integrity and professional talents and experience of Dr. Smith, whose conduct had been impeached; and believing that an investigation would prove that confidence to have been well founded, he expressed his hope that the resolution would be adopted.

Mr. FLOYD thought the object of the proposed inquiry could not be easily arrived at by a committee of this House. Thinking, as he did, of Dr. Smith, and entertaining the ideas which he did of the benefits he had rendered to his country, Mr. F. said, he believed such an investigation would be beneficial to Dr. Smith. It was as likely, he suggested, that the small-pox had been introduced into North Carolina by some North Carolinian, as by any mistake of the vaccine agent. The latter had no motive to destroy his own occupation, but every possible inducement to conduct the agency with integrity, care, and skill. He had at first thought it best that the resolution should lie on the table a few days, until the subject which was now undergoing discussion and consideration was more attentively examined; but, on the whole, as the question had been moved, he would make no objection to its immediate adoption.

Letter from the Vaccine Agent.

The SPEAKER presented a letter from Doctor James Smith, Vaccine Agent, which, on motion of Mr. LITTLE, was referred to the select committee appointed on that subject, and ordered to be printed.

BALTIMORE, February 4, 1832.

SIR: From letters which I received from Dr. Hunter, of Tarboro', in North Carolina, I am fully persuaded I have discovered the cause of the deplorable events which have happened there; and I am now satisfied, that they have originated from an accident such as never occurred before, and there is no danger that the like will ever occur again.

I had a paper which contained some small-pox scabs, taken by myself from a person named Whitfield, about 4th October, 1821; and on this paper I had written carefully, to avoid accidents, that it contained the variolous or small-pox matter. But this paper was afterwards mislaid, and, after searching for it in vain, I had concluded it was lost, and supposed it might have been swept out of my office with other waste papers.

From the information, however, which I have received from Dr. Hunter, quoting the words I had written on it, I have no doubt but that the same identical paper I had lost, containing the small-pox scabs, and marked as such, was put up in Dr. Ward's letter by some mistake or inadvertence, instead of the glasses of vaccine matter which I intended to send to him; and which, from his letter to me, I supposed he had received and used.

We may now, therefore safely conclude, that the injury done is of more limited extent than I feared; and every citizen of North Carolina has it in his power to be secured from it, if they will use the vaccine matter I have sent them.

Dr. Hunter assures me that the vaccine matter obtained by him from this institution, and which he was using "in a general and extensive vaccination," when he wrote me, 19th ultimo, was such as he knew to be genuine.

I hope you will be so good as to make the contents of this letter known in the House of Representatives; and I will be happy to furnish you or any committee of Congress who may be appointed to make inquiry on this subject, with every fact relating to it which has or may hereafter come to my knowledge.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JAMES SMITH.

Hon. SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Naval Bill—Suppression of Piracy in the West Indies.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making partial appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, during the year.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, that reported the bill, briefly stated that the object of it was to suppress the piratical depredations that were committed upon our commerce in the Gulf of Mexico, and he moved to fill the blank in the first section of the bill, for the pay and subsistence of the officers and pay of the seamen, with the sum of one hundred thousand dollars. The motion prevailed, and the blanks for provisions and repairs were also severally filled with the sums of twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. SMITH also moved to fill the blank for contingent expenses, with the sum of twenty thousand dollars.

FEBRUARY, 1822.]

The Bankrupt Bill.

[H OF R.]

Mr. TRACY inquired, whether the whole sum was required for this particular service, or whether it was intended to apply to the general expenses of the Naval Department? If it was merely for this particular service, it was a large appropriation, especially after the liberal appropriations for provisions and repairs. On a requisition for contingent expenses by a department, he thought the House ought at least to be possessed of some of the principal and prominent items of expenditure. He was aware that there were expenses to be incurred, that could not be specifically named, or even foreseen; but he thought it the right of the House to understand something of the outlines of the expense.

Mr. SMITH said, the object of the appropriation was well understood. The sum of $230,000 was reported for the whole contingent expenses of the Naval Department, and the sum of twenty thousand dollars proposed in the bill was a part of that expense, and to be deducted from it. This bill only contemplated an advancement for the purpose of suppressing piracies. Mr. S. agreed, that when an expenditure can be specified, it ought not to be included under the head of a contingent expense.

Mr. LOWENDES thought that the House should not consider the present appropriation as limited to a specific object, but as an advancement of the general navy service. It was part of the annual appropriation, but advanced at an early period to meet the exigencies of the occasion that required it.

Mr. RANDOLPH would not throw any obstacle in the way of the present appropriation, but he thought it proper to apprise the committee of the great doubt that existed, whether, by ingrafting on our naval system the solecism of imperium in imperio, the Naval Department had not greatly suffered by the establishment of the Board of Naval Commissioners. Mr. R. disclaimed all personal considerations, and expressed, for those who constituted it, not only a confidence in their ability and integrity, but a personal regard. But the difficulty lay in the system, and he believed the Commissioners themselves and the Secretary of the Navy were convinced of its inutility, and would concur in abolishing this patchwork in our national system. He hoped that others, who were better acquainted with the subject, would take it into consideration, and apply the remedy, which, in his opinion, the evil called for.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, stated that he was exceedingly anxious for the passage of the bill on account of the object of it. The bill is for a partial appropriation for the year 1822. It is founded on a letter of the Secretary of the Navy of the 25th January, in reply to a note of that day, requesting information upon the subject of a partial appropriation for the year 1822, for the naval service. It is stated that the appropriations of the last year are nearly exhausted, and that it is necessary to equip a force for the protection of our commerce. This appropriation is for the naval service generally. The letter, with regard to the naval force, is dated 28th January, in reply to inquiries of the 26th, with regard to the piracies. In this it is proposed to send out a frigate. This object is the inducement for the partial appropriation.

Mr. TREMBLE had no objection to the passage of the bill, and rose only to reply, in a single remark, to the observations that had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) In the four years he had occupied a seat on the floor, he had had occasion to examine into the office alluded to, and he was fully convinced, from the examination, which was scrupulous and attentive, that the establishment of that board had saved millions to the nation. It was constituted of men who were possessed not only of ability, but of experience and practical acquaintance with the subject on which they were employed. So fully satisfied was he of the importance of that board, that, were he driven to the necessity of voting to abolish either that board, or the head of the department, he should feel himself bound to vote for the continuance of the former.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped he was not understood to pronounce any opinion upon the wisdom of any branch of the Navy Department. But he had turned not an unobservant eye to the subject, and he believed that the bureau, he might call it—the office, wanted new modelling.

Mr. TREMBLE made a few further observations, and expressed his such entire satisfaction with the management of that board, that he was led to wish there could be an army board in like manner established.

The question was then taken, the blank filled as proposed, when the committee rose and reported the same to the House.

In the House the bill was read and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time this day, and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The Bankrupt Bill.

The House, on motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, observed, that he was in favor of the motion made by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) to strike out the first section of the bill now before the committee. He was opposed to its leading principles, and could not give his support to any measure which contained them. By these principles, he meant such as are found in the provisions of the bill, which compel the debtor to surrender his property for the pretended benefit of the creditor, and exonerate the debtor from the obligation of his contracts. He considered, that all who were opposed to any laws containing such principles, would concur in the motion, and at once bring the subject to a speedy conclusion. If a majority of the committee approved of this course, much time would be saved. It would be entirely useless to legislate upon the details, when the bill itself, in the conclusion, was to be wholly rejected.

Mr. M. remarked that the effects of the proposed system must be great. The relations of creditor and debtor would be changed. The effects would not be confined to the mercantile class of our citizens, but must be universal, and felt by the whole community. It was then the duty of every one to weigh well the subject, and ascertain, as far as he had the power, whether the effects would be disastrous or beneficial to the nation. Not to merchants and traders alone, but to the whole American people. The probability that some good might result, was not sufficient to induce Congress to hazard the experiment. We ought to be sure, as far as human foresight can determine, that the proposed measure will prevent the frequency of bankruptcies, discourage the perpetration of flagrant frauds, and elevate the value of national and individual credit. Its beneficial effects ought to be most clearly shown by its supporters. A reference has been made to the laws of other nations, relating to the subject of bankruptcies. They have been urged with great zeal by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) and in a manner calculated to produce the deepest impressions. He has told the committee that we should consult the experience of foreign nations in relation to those subjects which are interesting to ourselves. He has told us that commerce is essentially the same in England, Holland, France, and Spain, as in the United States. Laws, by those nations, had been adopted of a similar character to the one now under consideration. Experience abroad had given conclusive evidence of their utility. Mr. M. admitted that, although we might often gain the greatest advantages by consulting the laws and institutions of other nations, yet their adoption in this country should be allowed with the greatest caution. It was certainly very dangerous doctrine to admit, as a matter of course, that measures which had received the sanction of foreign Governments, and had stood confirmed by their experience, should be sanctioned here. The preservation of good morals is an object of equal importance to the people of the United States, as of England, yet those laws, which have for centuries received the approbation of Englishmen, may be illy calculated for this country. Pure religion may be the same in France as in the United States, yet those laws which, in France, have been deemed necessary for its promotion, the honorable member from Pennsylvania will not contend are adapted to our condition. The people of the United States have a deep interest in the character and merits of our clergy, but the English laws, granting tithes for their support, would receive no very cordial welcome here. Yet the experience of England and France might be referred to as evidence of their utility.

Mr. M. observed he had alluded to these subjects to prove that the experience of other nations would often prove a fatal guide to ourselves. That, although there might be a variety of interests of equal importance to this country, and foreign nations, the nature of the respective Governments, and the character and feelings of the people, required, or admitted, of very different regulations. That, although the United States were as deeply concerned in commerce as England, Holland, France, or Spain, it could not with safety be inferred that their laws on the subject of bankruptcies should be adopted by the American Government.

MONDAY, February 11.

Mail Thefts.

On motion of Mr. FARRELLY, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the practicability of facilitating the means of discovering thefts, destruction of, or opening and mutilating letters, committed by deputy postmasters, their agents, and mail carriers; and also into the propriety of enacting severer and other penalties against those who may be convicted of such offences.

Mr. FARRELLY observed, that the insecurity of conveyance by the mail was so general as to destroy its utility. Complaints came loudly from all quarters. He said he was certain the Postmaster General had used all the care and vigilance in his power to detect and prevent thefts in the post offices; but he has found them to be ineffectual. Something surely can be done, if not to remedy, at least to mitigate, the evils so loudly complained of. We all know with what ease the recommendations for offices can be procured; these we cannot prevent. Perhaps by enabling the county courts in which the respective officers are, to issue a commission of inspection, or giving them a visitatorial power, the fraud might be prevented. I have been led more particularly to this subject, by information received from my district. Not long since, a sum of nearly a thousand dollars was sent in a letter from Erie, in Pennsylvania, to Salina, in New York. This letter never arrived; it was traced to Buffalo, but beyond that all scrutiny was useless. I have also learned that a letter containing two hundred and seventy dollars, sent from Philadelphia to Warren, in my district, has never been received. I have been informed that another letter, sent from Meadville to Pittsburg, has also been lost. Since I came here, I received a small sum of money for a public institution at Meadville, which I transmitted by mail; it has never been received. We have not heard of any robbery of the mails; these thefts must have been committed by the postmasters. Indeed, the injury done the public by them, in this way, far outweighs that done by robbery of the mails. Something, I am persuaded, can be done to render these crimes less frequent. I do not recollect to have read of any trials in England of postmasters for stealing letters on the way. The trials are for robberies of the mails, and thefts after the letters arrive at their destination. The latter part of the resolution I deem necessary. The common law maxim is, that the punishment ought to be severe, in proportion to the facility of committing offence. In this case, the postmaster is secluded in his office, and he commits a double crime—one against the law, the other against the confidence reposed in him by the nature of his office.

A modification was proposed by Mr. WALTHORTH, and a further modification by Mr. LATHEOP, which were severally assented to by the mover and agreed to by the House, which brought it into the shape in which it is above stated.

Civilization of the Indians.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House any information which he may have of the condition of the several Indian tribes within the United States, and the measures hitherto devised and pursued for their civilization," I now transmit a report from the Secretary of War.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10, 1822.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 8, 1822.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, "requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House any information which he may have of the condition of the several Indian tribes within the United States, and the progress of the measures hitherto devised and pursued for their civilization," has the honor to transmit the enclosed table, marked A, containing the number of schools established under the patronage of the Government, within the Indian country; the number of scholars at each; the time of their commencement, where fixed, and by whom established; with remarks on their progress, present condition, &c. By reference to the table, it will appear that there are eleven principal schools, with three subordinate ones, in actual operation; and that there are several in a state of preparation; and that the number of scholars, at the last return, at the principal and subordinate schools, amounted to five hundred and eight. On these schools there has been expended $15,827 56, of which $7,447 56 have been on account of buildings, and the balance, $8,380, on account of the expense of tuition. It is made a condition of the subscription on the part of the Government, that the schools should be established within the Indian country, and that the system of education, in addition to reading, writing, and arithmetic, should, for the boys, embrace instruction in agriculture, and the ordinary mechanic arts, and for the girls the common domestic industry of that sex.

It was thought advisable, at the commencement of the system, to proceed with caution, and to enlarge the sphere of operation as experience should indicate the proper measures to be adopted, by which a useless expenditure of public money would be avoided, and the system adopted for the civilization of the Indians have the fairest trial. Experience has thus far justified those which have been adopted; and it is accordingly intended to give, this year, a greater activity to the funds, of which a much larger portion may be applied to tuition, the necessary buildings at so many points having already been erected.

Whether the system which has been adopted by the Government, if persevered in, will ultimately bring the Indians within the pale of civilization, can only be determined by time. It has been in operation too short a period to pronounce with certainty on the result. The present generation, which cannot be greatly affected by it, must pass away, and those who have been reared under the present system of education must succeed them, before its effects can be fully tested. As far, however, as civilization may depend on education only, without taking into consideration the force of circumstances, it would seem that there is no insuperable difficulty in effecting the benevolent intention of the Government. It may be affirmed, almost without qualification, that all of the tribes within our settlements, and near our borders, are even solicitous for the education of their children. With the exception of the Creeks, they have every where freely and cheerfully assented to the establishment of schools, to which, in some instances, they have contributed. The Choctaws, in this respect, have evinced the most liberal spirit, having set aside six thousand dollars of their annuity in aid of schools established among them. The reports of the teachers are almost uniformly favorable, both as to the capacity and docility of their youths. Their progress appears to be quite equal to that of white children of the same age; and they appear to be equally susceptible of acquiring habits of industry. At some of the establishments a considerable portion of the supplies are raised by the labor of the scholars and teachers.

With these indications, it would seem that there is little hazard in pronouncing, that, with proper and vigorous efforts, they may receive an education equal to that of the laboring portion of our community. Still, however, the interesting inquiry remains to be solved, whether such an education would lead them to that state of morality, civilization, and happiness, to which it is the desire of the Government to bring them, or whether there is not something in their situation, which presents insuperable obstacles to such a state? To answer this inquiry, we have but little experience. There is certainly much encouragement to hope for the best, from the fact that the Cherokee nation, which has made the greatest progress in education, has also made the greatest towards this desirable state, but the experience which it affords is yet imperfect. They have adopted some written provisions for their government, to a copy of which, with an extract of a letter from the Rev. Mr. Steiner, a respectable Moravian, who has visited the nation at the interval of twenty years, and states the progress which they have made in that time, and which accompany this report, marked B, I would respectfully refer the House, as furnishing the best testimony of the actual progress which that nation has made towards civilization. The zeal of the Cherokees for improvement, and the progress which they have made, are further evinced from the liberal provision for a school fund, for which the last treaty with them, ratified on the 10th of March, 1819, stipulates, and the fact that there are now established in the nation six schools, (two of which are upon the Lancasterian system,) containing in the aggregate about two hundred and thirty scholars. Notwithstanding these favorable appearances, many obstacles, difficult to be surmounted, will impede the progress of the Indians to a state of complete civilization.

Without adverting to others, the political relation which they bear to us is of itself of sufficient magnitude, if not removed, to prevent so desirable a state from being attained. We have always treated them as an independent people; and, however insignificant a tribe may become, and however surrounded by a dense white population, so long as there are any remains, it continues independent of our laws and authority. To tribes thus surrounded, nothing can be conceived more opposed to their happiness and civilization than this state of nominal independence. It has not one of the advantages of real independence, while it has nearly all the disadvantages of a state of complete subjugation. The consequence is inevitable. They lose the lofty spirit and heroic courage of the savage state, without acquiring the virtues which belong to the civilized. Depressed in spirits and debauched in morals, they dwindle away through a wretched existence, a nuisance to the surrounding country. Unless some system can be devised gradually to change this relation, and with the progress of education, to extend over them our laws and authority, it is feared that all efforts to civilize them, whatever flattering appearances they may for a time exhibit, must ultimately fail. Tribe after tribe will sink, with the progress of our settlements and the pressure of our population, into wretchedness and oblivion. Such has been their past history, and such, without this change of political relation, it must probably continue to be. To effect it many difficulties present themselves. It will require the co-operation of the General Government and the States within which the Indians may reside. With a zealous and enlightened co-operation, it is, however, believed that all difficulties may be surmounted, and this wretched, but in many respects, noble race, be ultimately brought within the pale of civilization. Preparatory to so radical a change in our relations towards them, the system of education which has been adopted, ought to be put into extensive and active operation. This is the foundation of all other improvements. It ought gradually to be followed with a plain and simple system of laws and government, such as has been adopted by the Cherokees, a proper compression of their settlements, and a division of landed property. By introducing gradually and judiciously these improvements, they will ultimately attain such a state of intelligence, industry, and civilization, as to prepare the way for a complete extension of our laws and authority over them.

Before I conclude, I would respectfully refer the House of Representatives, for more full and detailed information in relation to the progress made by the Indians in civilization, to the report of the Rev. Doctor Morse, which was laid before the House in pursuance of a resolution of the 22d January last.

All which is respectfully submitted.

TUESDAY, February 12.

Reorganization of the Navy—False Construction of the Furlough Privilege—Multiplication of Shore Employments.

Mr. COOKE rose to submit a resolution directing an inquiry into certain matters concerning the Naval Establishment. The resolution would point out the object which he had in view; but he thought it important that the House should be advised of the reason which induced him to offer the resolution for consideration. The act of Congress, Mr. C. said, directed that the officers of the Navy should receive but half their monthly pay, when not under orders for actual service. By a regulation of the Secretary of the Navy, each officer attached to the Naval Establishment receives (notwithstanding the law) full pay, except when on furlough. He made this statement from an inspection of the order itself. He viewed it as a departure from the law—an evasion of the law more reprehensible than a direct violation of it—an attempt to get round the law, such as should never receive his sanction whilst he held a seat on this floor. There was another thing to which he was desirous especially to call the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs, viz: the number of separate stations at which officers are placed, having the effect to increase their compensations, without any correspondent service being rendered. At Norfolk, for example, he understood there were two officers in independent commands, one at the Navy Yard, and one at the town. At Baltimore there was, he understood, another commander; and, from what information he had received, there was not a single armed vessel at that port—though there is a commander for the station, who receives three thousand dollars a year whilst living on his farm, and not attending to any duty at all. He wished also some information respecting the vessels on the Lakes. He understood that most of them were sunk, and none of them fit for service; notwithstanding which a number of men were kept in employ to take care of these sunken vessels; and, if he was not mistaken, the superior officer on that station was dubbed Commodore, as if he were commanding a squadron of armed ships cruising against an enemy, and received pay accordingly. This, Mr. C. said, could not have been the intention of the law. He wished also an inquiry to be made with regard to reorganizing the Naval Establishment, so as not to have a Secretary of the Navy and Commissioner of the Navy too. His friend from Kentucky had told the House, the other day, that millions had been saved to the Government by those commissioners. Mr. COOKE said, he did not pretend to understand much about the subject; but he wished to explain what he did know. He knew that the annual expense of that Board and its clerks, &c., had been twenty odd thousand dollars per year since its establishment. If the Secretary of the Navy wanted counsellors, Mr. C. said he thought they might be obtained at a less expense than this to the Government, &c.

Mr. C. then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire, and report, how many naval stations are occupied by the United States; the number and grade of the officers at each; what each officer has received as pay and subsistence, and what for emoluments or extra compensation for supposed services; how many have received their full monthly pay who were not in actual service at the time, and by what authority they were so paid; and also, that they inquire into the expediency of reorganizing the Naval Establishment of the United States.

Mr. McLANE, Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, said he did not mean to make any objection to the scope of the present inquiry. But, he said that the mode which the gentleman had adopted was not the proper mode of obtaining the information he was in quest of. It did not fall within the sphere of the Committee on Naval Affairs to furnish such details as the resolution asked for. He would also suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, although he was sure the gentleman's motives were of the purest kind, as a general remark, that there appeared to be a rather unfair, if not an ungenerous, proceeding creeping into the practice of this House; which is, that, when gentlemen want information from any Department of the Government, they should preface it with an argument, calculated to affect, and even to criminate public officers, founded on an assumption of facts proposed to be inquired into, and followed by consequences almost as serious in the public mind, as if the facts assumed were known to be true—when, it very often happened, that the facts, being obtained from the proper authority, were not as had been supposed. He did not say that the facts were not, in this case, such as they had been represented to be. But there was one fact with which he was acquainted, and would state; that, from the commencement of the Government, the construction of the law had been, that every officer of the Navy received pay until furloughed; because he is in actual service, liable every minute to be called to duty, until he is furloughed. This was the construction which the law had universally received, and he presumed it was the proper construction. On the other point, adverted to, he was not as fully informed, and had, in no view of the subject, any objection to the inquiry, but to the shape of it—because it devolved on the Committee on Naval Affairs a duty which did not belong to them, and because the resolution, in its present shape, evaded the rule of the House, which requires all calls for information to lie one day for consideration. Mr. McLANE, not intending to shrink from such part of the proposed inquiry as was within the proper duty of the Naval Committee, moved to amend the resolution, leaving part of it for a separate inquiry directed to the head of the Navy Department, so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reorganizing the Naval Establishment of the United States.

The amendment was opposed by Mr. COOKE, as proposing an unnecessary division of his motion into two distinct resolves, and supported by Mr. McLANE in reply—and was agreed to by the House.

Thus modified, the resolution was adopted, without opposition.

Russian Claims on the Northwest Coast of America.

Mr. FLOYD remarked that in consequence of unofficial reports of the promulgation of an imperial ukase of the Autocrat of all the Russias, in relation to the western limits of the United States, he begged leave to lay on the table the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House whether any foreign Government has made claim to any part of the territory of the United States upon the coast of the Pacific Ocean, north of the 42° of latitude, and to what extent; whether any regulations have been made by foreign powers affecting the trade on that coast; and how far it affects the interests of this Republic; and whether any communications have been made to this Government, by foreign powers, touching the contemplated occupation of the Columbia River.

Preservation of Live Oak Timber.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the preservation of the timber of the United States in Florida; which bill was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-day.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the preservation of the timber of the United States in Florida," was read the third time, and passed.

Banks of Deposit, &c.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to the resolution directing him to report the banks in which the moneys received from the sale of public lands have been deposited since 1st January, 1818; the contracts under which the deposits have been made; the correspondence relative thereto; the amount of deposits left in each, &c.; which report was ordered to lie on the table.

A motion was made that the same, together with the documents, be printed. A division of the question on this motion being called for, the same was put on so much as proposes to cause the said report to be printed, and passed in the affirmative.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved that the question on the residue of said motion, which proposes to cause the documents to be printed, be postponed until Monday next; which passed in the affirmative. The report is as follows :

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 14, 1822.

SIR : In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, directing that the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the House "a statement showing in what banks the money received from the sale of the public lands has been deposited since the 1st of January, 1818; the contracts under which said deposits have been made; the correspondence between them and the Treasury Department relative thereto; the amount of deposits that were to be left in each, in consideration of taking charge of the balance of the money deposited; whether, in any instance, the deposits allowed for that purpose have been increased, and why such increase was allowed; together with copies of their situation furnished to said Department for the last twelve months preceding such increase; whether any of those banks have failed to comply with their engagements, and to what amount; the statements made by each for the last twelve months preceding its failure; what measures have been taken, in consequence thereof, to secure the Government against any losses resulting from such failure; what those measures have been, and at what expense; whether, in any instance, uncurrent or depreciated paper has been received from them or any of them, which the Government was not bound to receive by any agreement between such banks and the said Secretary; and whether any further measures are necessary to be adopted by Congress to provide for the transmission of the public money from the different receivers to a more safe place of deposit, and, if so, what plan is most desirable"—I have the honor to submit the several statements and contracts, together with the correspondence, required by the resolution.

From an examination of the provisions contained in these contracts, it will be perceived that the principal inducements on the part of the Treasury to make them were—first, to increase the facilities of making payment for lands previously purchased; and, secondly, to secure the transmission of the public money from the places of deposit to those where the public engagements required it to be expended, with the least derangement of the ordinary moneyed transactions of those States from whence the funds were to be withdrawn.

By statement X it will be seen that the debt due by individuals for the purchase of public lands had, between the last days of January, 1815 and 1819, been augmented from three millions forty-two thousand six hundred and thirteen dollars and eighty-nine cents, to sixteen millions seven hundred and ninety-four thousand seven hundred and sixty-five dollars and fourteen cents.

In the year 1817, most of the banks in the States where the land offices were established, and in those parts of other States immediately adjoining them, had resumed specie payments. In the following year a great proportion of them stopped payment; and, in the early part of 1819, the price of all articles produced in the Western States fell so low as scarcely to defray the expense of transportation to the ports from whence they were usually exported to foreign markets. This condition of things, which had not been anticipated when the debt for the public lands was contracted, produced the most serious distress at the moment, and excited alarming apprehensions for the future. The forfeiture of the lands purchased between the two periods already described, and of the great amount of money paid at the time of purchase, appeared to be a result almost inevitable, unless some facility in making payment could be afforded. The resumption of specie payments by the banks whose notes formed, almost exclusively, the circulation of the States where the debt had been contracted, and the receipt of those notes at the land offices, seemed to be the only facility which it was practicable to afford. To effect this object, the contracts in question were tendered to the local banks as a modification of the various propositions which had been made by them to the Department. The extent of the facility which would be afforded by the receipt at the land offices of the notes of such local banks as should resume specie payments, would necessarily depend upon the amount of the public expenditure at the banks of deposit, and the capacity of those banks to transfer what could not be thus expended to the places where the public interests required. At that time an inconsiderable portion of the sum received at the land offices was expended in the States in which they were established. An inducement to transfer the remainder was to be presented to the banks which were to become the depositories of the public revenue arising from the sale of the public lands. In making the proposition to the local banks to transfer such portion of the public money deposited in their vaults as could not be expended by them on Treasury drafts, with the exception of the sum agreed to be left in deposit, the obligation of the Bank of the United States to transfer the public money to such places as the public exigencies shall require was duly considered. This obligation extends to money, and not to bank notes. The bank was under no obligation to effect the transfer of the public funds by disposing of the notes of the local banks which had been received at the land offices in the purchase of bills of exchange, rather than by a direct transportation of specie to the places designated. To have proposed the resumption of specie payments to the local banks, on the condition that they were to become the depositories of the public money received at the land offices, whilst the obligation of the Bank of the United States to transfer the public revenue was to be enforced, was to insure another failure on the part of those banks; as they would have been required, at short intervals, to discharge in specie the whole amount of their notes which had been received at the land offices. If the specie which would thus have been drawn from their vaults could have been restored to the local circulation, by the operations of the Government, it would have been practicable for the local banks to have continued specie payments. But the whole of the sums which would have been drawn from them by the Bank of the United States would have been transferred to the commercial cities in the Atlantic States, whence its return would necessarily have been slow and precarious. It was, therefore, indispensable to any proposition for inducing the local banks to resume and continue specie payments, that the obligation to transfer such part of the public money deposited with them as was to be expended at other places, should be imposed upon those banks. Although it was manifestly their interest that this operation should be effected without suddenly withdrawing from circulation the amount to be transferred, yet it was equally manifest that it could not at all times be performed without inconvenience and expense. It became, therefore, necessary to present to them some other inducement to assume this obligation, than the mere possession of the public funds during the time that was requisite for making the transfer. The idea of a deposit which they were not bound immediately to transfer was adopted by the Treasury, and accepted by the banks. This deposit, however, with the exceptions which will be hereafter explained, was liable to be reduced at all times by the payment of drafts of the Treasurer whenever it was practicable to expend money at those banks. The whole amount deposited in them was, at all times, at the disposition of the Government, whenever the public service should require it, and the opportunity of expenditure at the banks of deposit shall occur.

During the existence of the former Bank of the United States, a number of State banks were, by the Secretary of the Treasury, made banks of deposit, upon conditions which secured to them a considerable amount always on deposit, without, however, specifying any particular sum. It was stipulated that the moneys deposited in them should not be drawn for en masse; and that whenever drafts should be drawn upon them with a view to transfer any portion of the public money in their possession, they should be drawn payable at sixty days. As these drafts were always issued for smaller sums than were at the time on deposit, the banks generally retained in their possession a sum exceeding the amount of the deposits in sixty days. An arrangement or contract of this kind still exists with a number of local banks in the States of Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, and Virginia.

With the Bank of the United States an arrangement for the transfer of the public funds has been found requisite, which necessarily leaves a considerable balance on deposit in those offices from which transfers are to be made. For the transfer of the public funds from New Orleans, and from the Western States, to the principal cities on the Atlantic coast, the bank is allowed four months; from places north of the seat of Government to those south of it, two months; and from and to places north of it, and from and to places south of it, one month.

In the States of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, and Alabama, the Bank of the United States has established no office. In several of those States it was found impracticable for the receivers to make their deposits in that bank or its offices, without incurring an expense nearly equal to the amount of their salary and emoluments. In such cases, the only alternatives left to the Department were, to suffer the public money to remain in the hands of the receivers until it could be expended, or to direct it to be deposited in some of the local banks. Experience had shown that it was not prudent to adopt the first of these alternatives. Indeed, Congress, influenced probably by this conviction, had, in the year 1800, directed that the revenue bonds in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston, should be deposited for collection in the Bank of the United States and its offices, established in those cities; and, in 1809, it was further directed, by law, that the principal disbursing officers of the Government should, whenever practicable, keep the public moneys in their hands, in some incorporated bank, to be designated for the purpose by the President of the United States. Acting in the spirit of these legislative injunctions, founded upon the idea that banks furnished an additional security, not only in the collection but in the disbursement of the public revenue, my predecessors in office had directed that the public money, whenever collected, should be deposited in banks in the vicinity of the officers who collected it. When the Department was placed under my direction, in October, 1816, there were eighty-nine banks of deposit in the different States of the Union.

If recent experience has furnished evidence in any degree conflicting with that which produced the legislative injunctions to which I have referred, it has also shown that the official integrity of the public agents has not been augmented.

By referring to the contracts, it will be seen that deposits have been made in the Bank of Mississippi at Natchez, in the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Indiana, and in the Franklin Bank of Columbus, Ohio, upon conditions somewhat different from those of the other banks. In the first, there is no stipulated deposits, as it was presumed that the whole amount which would be received could be disbursed at the bank, or transferred without hazard or inconvenience to New Orleans. The banks, too, whose notes circulated in that State, were generally of established credit; so that but little, if any, risk was incurred in receiving and crediting them in the account of the Treasurer as specie. The frequent and safe intercourse between Natchez and New Orleans made it easy for the receiver west of Pearl River to make his payments in the office of the Bank of the United States. The failure of that officer, however, to make his deposits with regularity, and his misapplication of a large amount of the public money, about two years ago, suggested the propriety of effecting an arrangement with the Bank of Mississippi.

The second is entitled to a deposit, which is not to be diminished by Treasury drafts. It is bound to transfer to the Bank of the United States, or its offices, any excess above that deposit which it may receive from the land offices, and which cannot be disbursed at the bank. As nearly the whole amount that should be received by the bank would have to be transferred, it was deemed just that the stipulated deposit should not be diminished by the payment of Treasury drafts; and it was believed that any profit which the bank could derive from it would not be more than equal to the expense which would necessarily be incurred in making the stipulated transfers.

The third is entitled to a small deposit, not liable to be diminished, and is not bound to transfer any part of the public funds deposited with it. From the geographical situation of the bank, it was intended to be the depository of the public moneys disbursed upon the northwestern frontier, as far as Lake Superior, with the exception of what was received at Detroit and Michilimackinac. In this case, as the bank was not bound to transfer, the deposit was intended simply to indemnify it against losses which it might incur from the failure of any bank whose notes might be received at the land offices and deposited with it.

The deposits stipulated in the contracts have, in no instance, been increased; but sums to a much greater amount have, at different times, been in the possession of these banks. In some cases, this has been the result of a want of punctuality in making the transfers according to the conditions of the contracts, and in others, of an expectation that the amount in deposit of a particular bank might be expended without transfer.

In addition to the amount deposited in these banks, there has been deposited in the Bank of the United States and its offices the sum of $2,959,523.

It results from this statement, that there has been deposited in those banks the sum of $4,958,997, and that there remains in their possession, yet to be accounted for, the sum of $972,286. Of this amount the sum of $526,950 is due by banks which have stopped payment, and are no longer banks of deposit, viz: the Planters and Merchants' Bank at Huntsville, the Branch Bank of Kentucky at Louisville, the Bank of Missouri, the Bank of Vincennes, the Bank of Edwardsville, and the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank at Cincinnati. It is but just, however, to state, that the bank at Huntsville has made large payments into the offices of the Bank of the United States at New Orleans and New York since its failure, and that no doubt is entertained that it will discharge the remainder in the present year. These are the only banks which have failed to comply with their contracts.

The statements made by these banks for the twelve months preceding their respective failures, as far as they have been received, are marked Cc, Ee, Gg, Jj, Ll. The statements of the Bank of Missouri will be found in the correspondence.

From the Bank of Tombigbee there have been received $15,311, in the notes of the State Bank of North Carolina; from the Bank of Missouri there have been received the following sums, viz: in notes of the State Bank of North Carolina, $42,000; of the Bank of Nashville, $29,844; of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati, $11,845; of the Miami Exporting Company, $8,661; of the Bank of Cincinnati, $3,846; of the Bank of Muskingum, $291; and of the Farmers, Mechanics, and Manufacturers' Bank of Chillicothe, $360; and from the Bank of Edwardsville there have been received $18,562 in notes of the Bank of Kentucky and its branches. In the first two cases, the notes were received in the month of March, 1820; and in the third, in October, 1821. All the notes above described were uncurrent at the time they were received from the banks. They were current when they were received at the land offices, and when deposited in those banks for safe keeping. These deposits were made before the date of the contracts by which the banks engaged, not only to account to the Treasury in specie for bank notes deposited in them, which might become uncurrent while in their possession, but in like manner to account for such as might become uncurrent in the hands of the receivers of public money, which had been received before notice of the failure of any of the banks whose notes the banks of deposit had authorized them to receive. As the banks of deposit before the date of these contracts exercised no discretion or judgment in determining what local bank notes should be received, it was not understood that they assumed the responsibility of accounting to the Treasury in specie for notes deposited with them for safe keeping, which should become uncurrent while on deposit. Such is now the relation of the Bank of the United States to the Treasury, in all cases where the notes of the State banks received at the land offices are deposited in it, except the notes of the banks in the commercial cities of the Atlantic States. In no other case have uncurrent bank notes been received from any bank in which the public money has been deposited; nor have any such notes been received in contravention of any agreement between the Department and those banks. It is proper to state, that the whole of the notes of the State Bank of North Carolina have since been discharged; and that of the Nashville Bank notes there remains only $4,208 89 unpaid.

When the Bank of the United States went into operation, there was a very large amount of uncurrent bank notes in the Treasury, which were designated by the term special deposit. It consisted of bank notes which had been received on account of the Treasury, and which were refused to be entered to the general credit of the Treasurer by the eighty-nine banks in which the public money was then deposited; notwithstanding all those banks, with the exception of a few in the Eastern States, did not at the time discharge their own notes in specie. This amount was greatly increased by the balances in those of the Western banks, which, when the public deposits were turned over to the Bank of the United States, were unable to make any arrangement for their payment. To convert this special deposit into current money, the Bank of the United States tendered its best efforts, which were accepted by the Department. A considerable portion of the sum was, by the agency of the bank, converted into available funds; but, towards the close of the year 1818, the bank declined all further agency, under a conviction that its efforts were rather injurious than beneficial to the public interest. In the early part of 1819, the amount of special deposit then in the Bank of the United States was transferred to the Bank of Columbia, which had offered its services in collecting it. In the course of that year, its cashier visited the banks whose notes constituted the special deposit, and which were established in the interior of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, and in various parts of the State of Ohio. During his tour he succeeded in converting a portion of the notes into current money; in most other cases he obtained written acknowledgments of the amount due, and generally an engagement to pay interest until the debt was discharged; and in several instances collateral security was proposed, which has since been accepted. Whilst in the execution of this service, he was charged to call upon the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Cincinnati for the amount which had been deposited with it during the three months that it had resumed specie payments in 1819. He was not able, however, to make any arrangement either for the payment or security of the debt.

Since that time, the claims of the Treasury upon the banks in Ohio, and in the interior of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, have been placed in the hands of the attorneys of the United States, with instructions to endeavor in every case to obtain collateral security, where it is practicable. Their efforts, in conformity with these instructions, have been attended with some success; but it is now manifest that a resort to legal coercion will, in some cases, be necessary.

In terminating this report, it is respectfully submitted whether it is not expedient that some special authority be given for the disposition of the special deposit now in the Treasury. A considerable amount of this deposit consists of bank notes, which, though uncurrent, and therefore not applicable to the public service, may yet be disposed of on loan, upon such security as to insure its conversion into current money at the expiration of one, two, and three years. Another part consists of engagements by banks whose notes are uncurrent, which, it is presumed, those banks would willingly discharge by the issue of their notes, and which might be disposed of in the same manner. There is, however, a small portion which probably cannot, without considerable loss, be converted into current money by any measure whatever. An authority to dispose of so much of the deposit as is of this description, upon the best terms that can be obtained for it, will probably save something to the Treasury, as delay in relation to it can have no beneficial effect. I have the honor to be, &c.

Russian Claims on the Northwest Coast of America.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. FLOYD, requesting of the President of the United States information whether any foreign Government has made claim to any part of the territory of the United States on the coast of the Pacific Ocean, &c., was read for consideration.

Mr. FLOYD observed that he had made this motion in consequence of understanding that a copy of the Russian ukase on the subject of her dominions on the Pacific was in possession of our Government. The Russian Government laid claim, it appeared, to a considerable part of the territory on that coast, which belonged to the United States, in addition to what she held without dispute. From a claim so enormous, it would seem that the Emperor of Russia had forgotten the cautious policy which had characterized him heretofore; and the claim was such a one as would be resisted by any country. He hoped the resolution would be agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to without objection.

Military Academy.

Mr. WOODCOCK submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a statement of the number of cadets educated at the Military Academy, who have remained in the service of the United States five years, and the number who have received commissions and resigned, or been discharged from service before the expiration of five years; also, the number that have left the Military Academy without commissions, and the amount of money that has been paid each; also, the amount paid to cadets between the time of their appointment and that of their being mustered at the academy, and the time of leaving the academy, and the time of receiving commissions and entering the service of the United States; also, the number educated at the academy who were in the service during the late war; also, the expense of maintaining the officers and instructors of the academy each year, since 1802; and the expense of ammunition which has been furnished for the use of the academy, and the soldiers who have been stationed at the academy for the assistance of the officers and cadets since its establishment; and also, the number of cadets educated at the academy since its establishment, distinguishing those who are the sons of officers and soldiers who have fallen in the defence of their country, or died in its service.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table one day.

WEDNESDAY, February 20.

Military Appropriations—Pay and Subsistence of the Army.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took into consideration the bill making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year eighteen hundred and twenty-two.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, (Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who reported the bill,) moved to fill the blank "for the pay of the army and subsistence of the officers" with the sum of $982,917.

Mr. BALDWIN wished, before an appropriation of this sort was made, to see a plain statement of the revenue of the country. He was unwilling to go on until he knew the footing on which our financial concerns really stood. He was willing to cut the expenses down—he cared not how high nor how deep it cut—but so far as to meet the revenue. The House was now called upon to pass a bill for the appropriation of a large sum. Before he could accede to it he wished to see a plain, tangible, matter-of-fact statement of the revenue, and then the House could shape its measures accordingly. He was not prepared to vote for borrowing money, nor was he inclined to appropriate large sums in the dark, without knowing from what quarter they were to be met. He therefore moved that the committee rise and report progress on this bill, with a view to postponing the final decision on it to a later period of the session.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the appropriations of the last year for the support of the Military Establishment were exhausted. We are now two months on the new year, and there is nothing wherewith to pay the demands on that department. Is this, then, he asked, the proper time to delay? Was it expected that the officers of the Government should make personal advances? Certainly not. And neither the army nor the Revolutionary pensioners could be paid. The payment of the latter had been deferred last September, and now an instalment became due early in March. They were suffering for the want of it. The passage of this bill would not at all interfere with any propositions for economical reform which gentlemen might think proper to make. It was only intended to meet the demands that arise from laws now in existence, and which the faith of the Government is pledged to fulfil. Mr. S.

was disposed to enter fully into the views of gentlemen with regard to any proper retrenchment, where it did not involve a denial of justice and legal right. He also expressed his confidence in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He was satisfied that there was such a revival of commerce that the revenue would be adequate to the expenditure, and he saw no necessity that the committee should rise.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, was not disposed to throw any embarrassments in the way of the committee that had reported the bill. Yet he thought it the dictate of wisdom and prudence to halt at this step, and reflect upon the situation of the revenue, before these appropriations were made. From his acquaintance with the proceedings of the House, he had been led to observe that they were too often driven to make appropriations by the pressure of circumstances. At those sessions that are terminated by law on the 4th of March, the appropriation bills have been usually presented a few days before its close, and we are compelled to pass them without much examination of the details, for fear it should not become a law within the constitutional term, and a violation of the faith of the nation result as a consequence. At those sessions, on the other hand, where the term is unlimited, we are met with a bill for partial appropriations to supply the exigencies of the first part of the year, and which we are always told is to be deducted from the general appropriation bill, and then this general appropriation bill is introduced at a period too late, or under circumstances too urgent to allow of that strict scrutiny which it was both the right and the duty of this House to make. Mr. W. thought the first and most obvious inquiry was, whether we have the money? This was a question to be put at the threshold, and he thought the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) had not been answered. If the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would give an assurance that no bill shall be reported to authorize the borrowing of money, or laying a tax, and that there would be money enough in the Treasury to meet all the demands upon it for the expenditures of the current year, he should be disposed to acquiesce in the passage of the bill, which that committee had reported.

Mr. BALDWIN did not wish to examine the merits of the act of 1816, (to which the gentleman from Maryland had alluded;) and he was sorry the case of the Revolutionary pensioners could not be attended to, and their wants supplied, without drawing after them other appropriations, on which he thought sufficient information had not yet been obtained. The bill was reported yesterday. It was laid on our tables this morning, and is not yet dry; and if he felt himself faulty in relation to this subject, it was in forbearing too long, rather than in coming forward too soon, to express his unwillingness to commit the nation to such an expenditure without knowing on what foundation the public credit was placed. He respected the opinions of the gentleman from Maryland as much as any other gentleman, but the individual opinions of a member were not a ground on which it was safe for a legislative body to act. They involved no responsibility. By a former report from the Committee of Ways and Means, the revenue of 1822 was to exceed the expenditure by $5,200,000, and where is this surplus? He would consent to this appropriation, if it was to be limited to that surplus fund; but it was not; and the prophecies of four years having turned out to be incorrect, he was justified in judging of the future by the past. He felt unsafe to adjust the appropriations upon any calculations of average; nor was he disposed to score down the treasury reports like the forecasts of an almanac, that predicts that, about these days you may expect to meet fair weather at the bottom. He would proceed with any gentleman and cut down expenditure, strike where it would, until it met the revenue. He wished to see where the revenue really was. It had been the practice, year after year, to talk of balances. But where were they? In the air—and if balances in the air would meet the solid appropriations of the House, there would be less objection to the passage of the bill. Mr. B. then adverted to the statistical account of the Treasury to show that, by the real situation of available funds, the Treasury was actually in arrear by much more than a million of dollars. The time had come when in his opinion it was necessary to make a serious and earnest call for the true condition of that department. Year after year reports had been made, and the only difference between them seemed to be in the magnitude of the errors they contained. There was one thing, at all hazards, which it was the duty of this House to sustain—and that was the credit of the nation. Let this bill then be postponed until proper inquiry be made into that subject.

Mr. CANNON supported the motion, and, inter alia, inquired whether this appropriation was not founded on the idea of a continuation of the army establishment upon its present basis, without any reduction whatever?

Mr. RANDOLPH wished to carry the inquiry one step further than the gentleman from Pennsylvania—for he wanted to find, not only where the money comes from, but where it goes to! The Committee of Ways and Means did not seem to be a committee of supply, to get money, but only to get rid of it. It seemed, however, that we had grown wiser than our fathers, and that it was now an object, as expressed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) of total indifference whether the sinking fund system was retained or not. Mr. R. then directed his remarks principally to the importance of retaining and supporting that fund. He presented, with his usual eloquence, a history of its origin and progress—traced it from the patriots who originated and sustained it—explained the difference that existed between it and the sinking fund of England—paid an elegant tribute of respect to the integrity of Hamilton and the wisdom of Sherman, who had not thought it a matter of indifference, and concluded by expressing his concurrence with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that further light should be thrown upon the actual state of our finances before appropriations of so large an amount should be made.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied to the remarks of Mr. BALDWIN and Mr. RANDOLPH.

Mr. ROSS renewed an inquiry, suggested by Mr. CANNON, whether this bill embraced the objects of the partial appropriation bill, that had been discussed some weeks since in this House?

Mr. SMITH, in reply, observed that it embraced only such disbursements as were of immediate and indispensable necessity. The partial appropriation bill was out of the question, and had no connection whatever with the present. The bill was entirely predicated upon issues contained in the statute book, &c.

Mr. TREMBLE rose to ask the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means a question. This seventy thousand dollars is required to purchase clothing for the army. He wanted to know whether it was intended, in making the purchase, to give any preference to the woollens of American fabrication; and why the clothing of the army is not entirely of American manufacture? His information justified him in saying, that this desirable object could be easily accomplished if the proper departments would continue their efforts from year to year in good earnest. He said he had an amendment in his hand, which, if adopted, would limit the purchases to articles of American manufacture; and he should consider it his duty to offer it, unless some satisfactory answer could be given to his inquiry. He took that occasion to say, generally, that each of the purchasing departments ought to give notice in all the States that supplies are wanted, and designate the articles; allowing full time for persons living at the most distant points of the Union to send in their offers to supply. This, he had been told, was done in most instances, and it had given great satisfaction. But still there were many complaints made on this subject, and, in some instances, not without good reason. It was his opinion that any other mode of granting contracts for supplies would, in many instances, operate as a monopoly in favor of particular sections of the Union; that it was fair and just to give the manufacturers in every portion of the country an equal chance; that the Government ought to invite competition by putting all upon a footing of the most perfect equality; that the Treasury itself would profit by the competition; that he had heard of cases in which the Government was made to pay a higher price for articles on the seaboard, to supply the frontier, than similar articles of equal quality could have been had for at or near the places of consumption. He would give two or three instances from the department of Indian trade, which, if true, were manifest abuses. Lead was made in great quantities in Missouri, and sent to the large cities on the seaboard; and that about thirty miles below St. Louis there was a shot factory, where any quantity of that article could be had, of a very superior quality, such as might come fairly in competition with the Philadelphia shot, and drive it out of the market; and yet, it was stated to him as a fact, that lead and shot had been purchased on this side of the mountains, and sent to the West to supply the Indian trading houses. The same had been said, and he believed truly, of tobacco, tomahawks, and other articles. The furs received at the trading establishments were usually brought to Georgetown to be sold; and it was a remarkable fact, that a portion of the same furs found their way back to the Western waters, to supply the demand among the hat-makers, whereby a loss accrued to the consumer equal to the expense of double transportation. It was said that peltry had been brought from St. Louis to Georgetown, and sold there, or on the coast, for very little more than half the current price at St. Louis. These facts had been proven, he understood, before a committee of the other House; and he was led to believe that there never was a more abominable speculation, in the small way, than had been practised upon the Government in some of these matters. He could give other instances of the same sort, but his main object at present was to call the attention of the committee to the subject of domestic woollens, and to show the folly of purchasing supplies on the seaboard for the Western country. There was one factory in Ohio which, he believed, could furnish all the woollens for the army. And all that he would ask for the Western people was, to let them enjoy their local advantages, and purchase from them such things as are consumed among them, if to be had there on equal terms.

Mr. SMITH said a few words in reply—referring Mr. TREMBLE to a resolution submitted some days ago by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERTS,) respecting the clothing the army in American manufactures.

Mr. EVERTS observed that, since he had offered the resolution referred to, he had communicated with the head of the purchasing department, and, to his great satisfaction, had found that his views had been anticipated in relation to the subject; for that all our soldiers were clothed in American fabrics. He expressed great confidence in that officer, and was satisfied that the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky was superfluous.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with the sum of $75,000, as proposed, and carried.

Mr. SMITH then moved to fill the blank for the Quartermaster-general's department, for regular supplies, transportation, rent, and repairs, postage, courts-martial, fuel, and contingencies, and for extra pay to soldiers employed in the erection and repairs of barracks, and other labor, with the sum of $818,217.

Mr. ROSS observed, that he understood that the business of courts-martial had become a money-making job, and that a gentleman from the North (New York) had made the modest charge of thirteen or fourteen thousand dollars for presiding in them one year. He wished to be further informed on that subject.

Mr. SMITH said the appropriation here proposed was in the usual form; and that, in relation to the claim referred to, it was sub judice, and not decided upon.

The question was then taken on the sum proposed, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH moved to fill the blank for the contingencies of the army with the sum of $20,000.

Mr. COOKE moved to strike out that item; which motion was negatived.

Mr. CANNON moved to insert after the word "Army," the words "and the Military Academy," which was also negatived; and, the question being then taken on Mr. SMITH's motion, it was carried.

Mr. SMITH then moved to fill the blank for the Military Academy with the sum of $13,979.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, moved to amend the proposition by inserting in lieu thereof the words, "for quartermaster's supplies, transportation, mathematical instruments, books and stationery, for the Military Academy, &c.," which was assented to by the mover, and the original motion prevailed.

Mr. SMITH also proposed to fill the blank for the pensions to the invalids, to the commutation pensioners, and the widows and orphans (in addition to an unexpended balance of $27,891 05) with the sum of $317,108, which was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH further moved to fill the blank for pensions to the Revolutionary pensioners of the United States (including a deficiency in the appropriation of the last year of $451,886 57, and in addition to an unexpended balance of $191,845 06 of the year 1820) the sum of $1,642,591; which was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN then moved to strike out all that part of the bill which precedes the appropriation for the pensions to invalid and Revolutionary pensioners—intimating, however, a perfect willingness that, if any gentleman wished to retain any particular appropriation, so as to make it a partial one, he would modify his motion accordingly.

Such a disposition not being manifested—

Mr. B. urged the adoption of his motion, and observed that he was unwilling that the urgency of the Revolutionary claims should drag after them other appropriations, amounting in the aggregate to more than four millions of dollars, on such a premature and inconsiderate deliberation. The question was then taken, and negatived—ayes 40, noes 70.

Mr. SMITH then moved that the committee rise and report the bills amended, which was agreed to; and the House adjourned without taking up the report.

FRIDAY, February 22.

Vaccination.

Mr. FLOYD, from the committee appointed to inquire whether it is necessary to make any modification in the law passed in the year 1813, entitled "An act to encourage vaccination," made a detailed report; which was read, and the resolution therein submitted was concurred in by the House, and two thousand copies ordered to be printed for the use of themselves.

The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred the resolution of the sixth instant, directing them to inquire whether it be necessary to make any modification of the law passed in the year 1813, entitled "An act to encourage vaccination," have had the same under consideration, and report:

That the committee have not deemed it necessary to report the various reflections which have presented themselves upon the subject of vaccination, but feel a confidence in the belief, that the opinion heretofore entertained of its being a preventive of the small-pox is well founded, and believe it one of the greatest benefits bestowed upon the country, and one which ought to be cherished by every citizen of the Republic.

They are aware that a disease, called by medical gentlemen varioloid, has, within a few years past, made its appearance in Europe; that it much resembles the small-pox; and, under similar circumstances, has been as fatal as that disease ever was; none are exempt from its influence, neither those who have had the small-pox, nor yet those who have been exposed to the influence of the vaccine; but it is gratifying to find that the weight of authority seems to favor a belief, that all those exposed to the infection of the latter suffer much less than any others.

The committee have seen, with pain and regret, the occurrences which have lately transpired in the State of North Carolina, where the physicians in that part of the country believed the small-pox to exist. These occurrences were of such a character as to claim their attention, particularly as the United States vaccine agent, appointed pursuant to the provisions of the act referred to in the resolution, seemed to create a doubt as to the efficacy of vaccine in the prevention of small-pox, and left the impression equivocal, whether it was not his belief that it was the varioloid disease in North Carolina, produced by some change in the vaccine matter whilst on its way to a physician in that State, to whom he had sent it, or whether it had not assumed that character from the circumstance of the small-pox epidemic in the neighborhood from whence it was sent. They have forborne to remark upon that transaction, as the vaccine agent has since ascertained, and acknowledged, that it was the genuine small-pox matter he had sent to North Carolina, through his own mistake, which at once relieves the fears of those who doubt the efficacy of the cow-pox, if there are any such, and dissipates the mist which hung over the subject, in the opinion of all who did not doubt.

It is proper to remark, that the disease called varioloid seems to partake more of the character of small-pox than of vaccine, and that there is no fact, within the scope of their inquiry, to induce the committee to believe that vaccine ever has degenerated into varioloid. It is unquestionably true, that instances have occurred where persons have taken the small-pox, after having the vaccine, though such instances are as uncommon as it is for persons to take the small-pox a second time.

Case of Henry Aberdeen.

The tranquillity of settled belief has been disturbed by allusions to the difficulty of securing the continuance of genuine matter, though no doubt is entertained by your committee that proper attention will overcome every obstacle of that kind, eradicate every evil, and, finally, triumph over prejudice itself. Some reproach may have been brought upon vaccination, not, however, the result of any well-founded doubt as to its efficacy; but from the ignorance or carelessness of those who have used it, as it is well known that many benevolent persons throughout the community have taken upon themselves to vaccinate their friends and others, and, doubtless, have done much good; but if, in the progress of time, by want of care, the matter shall have become spurious, there is not adequate experience to detect the change, and consequently, some risk of exposing the person to small-pox, thereby bringing danger to the sufferer, and unjust reproach to the cow-pox. This kind of inoculation done by every individual who feels charitably inclined, if with care, is not disapproved of; though they are decidedly of opinion, that it would be much better to trust it to the judgment and care of the medical gentlemen of the country.

The committee have deemed it not irrelevant to state a few prominent facts in regard to the effects of these diseases in different countries, which will more clearly show the progress of opinion, and the advantages of vaccination. In the first place, it is proper to state, that there is authority for estimating the deaths in the natural small-pox at one in six; and, though a more intimate knowledge of that malady, together with any benefit arising from inoculation, may have put it more in the power of physicians to control it, yet, in Great Britain, where vaccination is less attended to than in some other European countries, fifty thousand persons are annually destroyed by it. But, even there, by vaccination, all agree the waste of human life has been lessened. It not only secures the person from the small-pox, but greatly lessens the danger to be apprehended from the varioloid disease, as may be seen by reference to highly respectable authority, which states that, at Millau, in France, containing about eight thousand inhabitants, two hundred vaccinated persons took the varioloid disease, and every one recovered, whilst two hundred persons who had not been vaccinated were destroyed.

In Denmark, by the care which the Government has taken to cause the people to vaccinate, the small-pox no longer exists. This remedy was introduced into that country about the year 1800, by laws which were vigilantly enforced. By these laws, it was ordered that no person should be received at confirmation, admitted to any school, bound apprentice to any trade, or married, who had not been vaccinated, unless they had undergone the small-pox. A just idea may be formed of the benefits which have resulted to Denmark—a country where the preservation of human life is more the object of governmental care and solicitude than almost any other—when it is known that the city of Copenhagen alone, during the twelve years preceding the introduction of the vaccine, lost by the small-pox five thousand five hundred of its inhabitants. In the year 1805, not one death occurred in the whole Danish dominions from the small-pox. Prussia has made many wise regulations favorable to vaccination, which have produced highly beneficial results. Formerly, the small-pox was believed to destroy about forty thousand persons annually in that kingdom. In 1817, by this mild and entirely safe remedy, the deaths were reduced to two thousand nine hundred and forty, so that the proportion of deaths from small-pox to those from all other causes, had been reduced from one in seven, down to one in one hundred and four.

It is believed that the principality of Anspach, in Bavaria, containing a population of 286,406 individuals, lost five hundred annually in 1797, 1798, and 1799; and, in the year 1800, there perished one thousand six hundred and nine persons of that disease; but, so clear and distinct have been the effects of vaccination, that, from the year 1809 to the year 1819, only five cases have occurred, and not one death.

In France prizes are given to the surgeons who have annually vaccinated the greatest number of persons.

In Lombardy, in the year 1808, in Milan and Geneva, vaccination was believed to have extirpated the small-pox.

If the statements of intelligent travellers ought to be taken as evidence upon a subject of this kind, there can be no doubt that vaccination has operated the same beneficial effects in South America which it has done in Europe; and the journals of our own country bear testimony to its great and increasing good throughout the Republic.

The committee have viewed, with attention and concern, the promulgation of opinions tending to lessen the just confidence of the community in the efficacy of vaccination, from the circumstance of there being present slight affections of the skin, ulceration, or vascular disease. They will not undertake to decide what may be the effect of diseases of this character upon the result of vaccination, when they have affected the constitution of the individual, but think it doing no violence to the opinions of those who have adopted such, to consider them as a class distinct from the mass of the community. They are inclined to believe that the constitution of the individual vaccinated, with other causes, may vary the appearance of the disease in some degree, but not to change its character; to do that, there would be partial causes, easily detected and easily understood.

The committee, from all the reflection which they have been able to bestow upon the subject, are of opinion that no modification of the law is necessary, as its provisions put it amply in the power of those intrusted with the execution of it to punish abuses whenever any exist. They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject referred to them by the resolution of the 6th instant.

SATURDAY, February 23.

Case of Henry Aberdeen, a Free Man of Color, and Owner of a Coasting Schooner—Question of Citizenship.

Mr. NEWTON presented a petition of Henry Aberdeen, a free man of color, master of a schooner employed in the coasting trade of the United States, stating that owing to a recent construction regulating the enrolling and licensing vessels employed in the coasting trade, he, as well as all persons of his description, are debarred the right of owning or commanding a vessel, on the ground that they are not citizens of the United States; and praying such relief in the premises as may be just and proper. Referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Transactions in Florida—Imprisonment of the Spanish Officers, Don Marcos de Villiers, and Captain Arnaldo Guillemard, by Order of the Acting Governor, George Walton, Esq.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, requested to be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of Marcos de Villiers and Arnaldo Guillemard, (who pray the interposition of Congress to release them from prison in Pensacola, where they are confined by the acting Governor of West Florida;) and moved also that the petition, together with the accompanying documents, be referred to the President of the United States.

Mr. COOKE remarked, that, from an examination of the petition and documents referred to, there was reason to apprehend there had been such a usurpation and infringement upon the rights of the petitioners as required the interposition of the House. He therefore moved that the petition be referred to a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LOWMEYER thought the petition afforded an additional reason for giving more promptly a government to Florida, yet he was unwilling that such complaints should reach the Executive ear through the channel of this House. Indeed, he considered it altogether probable that those complaints had already reached the Executive. He therefore thought the reference proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs unnecessary, and the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. COOKE) improper; and, under these impressions, proposed that the same should be laid on the table.

Mr. TREMBLE rose to put a question to the chairman of the Military Committee. He wanted to know whether the petitioners were confined under a military order, or in virtue of some civil judicial process? If the confinement was by military order, he was satisfied the President, as commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, could order their discharge; but if confined in virtue of civil process, then he did not suppose that the President had any power to interfere. The act of last session gave the President power to appoint a Governor in the Floridas, but it did not authorize him to reserve to himself any control over the judicial acts and proceedings of the Governor when appointed. There was no such reservation in the Governor's commission. The President had, it was said, given ample powers to the Governor. They were said to be the same or equal to those vested in the Captain General of Cuba; and Mr. T. could not vote the reference of a petition to the President, as an intimation to him to assume a sort of supreme judicial power over that territory, without being first satisfied that a controlling power of that kind ought to be vested in him, either directly or indirectly.

Mr. COLDEN entered at some length into an examination of the facts connected with the case of the petitioners; and was proceeding to a discussion of the merits of the commitment of the petitioners to prison; when a question of order arose, which resulted in the SPEAKER's pronouncing that the first question, and the only one of course now before the House, was on discharging the Military Committee from the consideration of the petition.

Mr. EUSTIS explained the views of the committee in recommending the course they had thought it expedient to adopt, the main object of which was to procure the liberty of the petitioners, if they were entitled to it, in a manner more expeditiously than they could obtain it from the interposition of this House.

Mr. LOWMEYER further explained his views in making the motion to lay the subject on the table.

Mr. FLOYD could not conceive any powers which the Captain General of Cuba could have, or any Secretary of the Territory of Florida could have, to violate the liberties of those who should fall within their jurisdiction. Here were men lingering in confinement—and we were not now, he said, deliberating at the point of the bayonet, but in peace and safety deciding whether or not to lay the petition on the table. The man who could have the temerity in this House to lie by supinely on such a subject, may well tremble should he happen to be within the power of another Government. He was opposed to any delay, and thought it a subject that required the immediate interference of the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH thought this House could not, without a gross violation of its duty, turn a deaf ear to any man who says he is in bonds against law, and under our authority. It was not for us to sit here with stoic apathy, under circumstances like the present. It was worse than mockery to turn over the subject to the President of the United States, who is known, if not to approve, yet not to disapprove, of the conduct of the Captain General of Florida. The Congress sat here as the guardians of law and liberty. Were we asked whether we could not yield our confidence to the Executive? He answered, No; for that personage was surrounded by a multitude of counsellors, in whom there could not be wisdom—for, like Ishmaelites, the hand of each was raised against his brother. He disclaimed any personal hostility to any of the members of the cabinet—of one of whom he knew nothing, and for others of them he entertained a personal respect; but he repeated that, with such competitions and divisions as existed there, he would vote for no such reference.

Mr. WRIGHT thought it was not proper to refuse a reference of subjects that constitutionally belonged to the Executive Department, on the want of personal confidence. He believed it was inexpedient to travel out of the road, and get into a field not our own, when we had so much business of an ordinary character that required the immediate attention of the House. Mr. W. expressed his decided approbation of the conduct of the late Governor of Florida, whose conduct, he thought, entitled him to the warmest gratitude and admiration of his country. He also adverted to the delays that had been interposed by the Spanish commanders in surrendering that territory pursuant to the treaty, and the various expedients that had been resorted to, to create sedition and insurrection in that country, against the authority of the United States—which therefore rendered the performance of the duty of the Governor of Florida an arduous, critical, and delicate task, and which required promptitude and energy. He thought it was therefore proper that the papers should receive the reference recommended.

Mr. COLDEN addressed the House to free himself from any imputation of being actuated by a feeling of hostility towards General Jackson, for Mr. C. remembered too well what this country owed to the gallantry of that man to feel any such sentiment. Mr. C. proceeded then to argue that the House could not dispense with inquiry in any case in which complaint was made to it; that, by the documents produced, enough was exhibited to establish a probability that a violation of personal rights had taken place, and to justify an exercise of the inquisitorial power of the House. He argued that these men had, by the treaty, become divested of their military character; that, if so, General Jackson had no right under the treaty to banish them from the province. If they choose to remain in the Territory, to select our institutions and soil, and forego their military character, could the treaty receive such a construction as to enable the Governor to say to them, no, you shall not become American citizens—you shall be banished hence? This proclamation was not justified by any law, nor by the treaty; it was an exercise of power without right. But there was another feature in the case, Mr. C. said, so gross that he should forfeit his character of a Representative of the people not to express his dissent from it, both for himself and colleagues. These banished men come back—they are imprisoned, and when they ask to be liberated, the acting Governor says to them, you ought to be liberated—if Governor Jackson was here he would liberate you—but I cannot—there is no remedy for you. Could this be the fact, asked Mr. C., that there was no remedy for a case so oppressive? It seemed that the Governor, in his parting orders to Governor Walton, says to him, you must obey no laws and no orders other than those coming through me and delegated by me. How, asked Mr. C., could this injunction be reconciled with his character as acting Governor, by which all the powers of the principal devolved on him? Mr. C. put the question whether these men were to be left in prison, and the House to say to them, there is no remedy for you—we leave you to your fate? Was it sufficient to say they have their resort against the officer, in the courts, and by the recovery of damages? There was no court there to which they could appeal. The Governor claims supreme judicial power, and would it not be a mockery to refer these men to the sub-Governor under such circumstances? What redress could the President afford? He could dismiss the officer, it was true; but any order sent there by the President, we have the best reason to believe, would not be obeyed by the acting Governor, for Governor Jackson has forbidden him to obey any that comes not through him. Mr. C. thought some expression of the opinion of the House ought to be given. If these acts are violations of our own feelings, our laws, and our principles—we ought to say to the world, this is not our act, but is the unauthorized act of an individual.

Mr. WRIGHT replied to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. COLDEN,) and contended that the return of the military officers of Spain, was a violation of the treaty that had been made. And what security have we now for the tranquillity of that territory if those military officers can be authorized to make a show of departing according to treaty, and then return in opposition to its spirit, and sow the seeds of sedition and revolt among the people? When General Jackson retired from the government of the Territory, the administration of its power reverted to the President of the United States. The reference to the Executive, therefore, was peculiarly proper.

Mr. WALWORTH believed that his respect for the liberty of the people was not less than that of any other member of the House; and when a proper occasion should occur, he trusted such a disposition would be made manifest. But he contended that it was necessary for the benefit of the petitioners that the subject should be taken up by a body more competent to do summary justice than this House. The laws under which those transactions took place would expire during this session, and it would be impossible for this Congress to make the requisite examinations so as to do justice to the laws of the country on the one hand, and the rights of the petitioners on the other. The committee supposed the President was competent to give adequate relief, and that our Executive possessed the same relation to the Governor of Florida as the King of Spain had to the Captain General of Cuba. He had no objection to examine into the conduct of any military character where the duty of the military committee (of which he was a member) called them; but the great objection was, that neither the committee nor the House had powers and facilities adequate to the giving of that prompt relief which the nature of the case seemed to require.

Mr. LOWMEDES would not have risen again, if the question had not assumed a new aspect since he made his motion to lay the report on the table. The petitioners, Mr. L. said, were now in jail, and if it was the wish of the House to give them relief, would it not be better to adopt that course which would afford it most promptly? As relief could be most speedily offered by the Executive, would it not be better, Mr. L. asked, to leave the subject to him? In adopting this course the House would not abandon its inquisitorial character, but best fulfil it by affording the most expeditious redress which the case admitted. If, however, the House disapproved this course, let it at once put a period to a debate which appeared interminable, provide a government for the Territory of Florida, and put an end to this thirty days' tyranny, as it was called. Mr. L. expressed his disapprobation of the practice of going into debate on every trivial occasion—on every resolution or motion proposing no matter what, and dragging into view the conduct of officers, military and civil, when the investigation was not intended to be followed by any act or proceeding. These discussions were injurious, and, he thought, improper, where they were not meant to result in some act or some definite effect. Where this was not the intention, and where no new fact could be expected, what advantage could result from occupying time which was intended for practical and useful legislation?

Mr. STEWART was in favor of discharging not only the committee, but the House, from the further consideration of the subject. He thought the only question was, or should be, whether or not the subject-matter should not be recommitted to the Military Committee, to report the facts, in order that it might be seen whether it was a matter for the legislation of this House, or for the exercise of Executive authority. In this view, it was merely a question of false imprisonment, and it seemed to be a matter to decide whether this House will resolve itself into a court to determine questions of that sort. And if they do determine to try such questions for the benefit of Spaniards, is it not equally proper, he asked, that we should decide similar cases among our own citizens? And if we are to decide cases of false imprisonment, is it not equally proper that we should undertake to try questions of assault and battery? He really thought it was a transposition of authority between the judicial and legislative departments, which was guarded against by the constitution. It led, in his opinion, to a protracted and unprofitable discussion, in which all that had been said of Jackson and Callava, et id genus omne, would be brought into view, and all those angry passions which those matters seemed so fertile in producing would break out anew. He thought every principle therefore of justice and of policy required that it should be referred to the Executive department. It might also interfere with pending negotiations between this Government and Spain.

Mr. McDUFFIE thought the sound sense of the House would indicate the propriety of pursuing the course recommended by the Military Committee; and he feared that if the House were to act otherwise upon this subject, it must act upon it unwisely and injudiciously. What was the inquiry he asked? Not whether our officers had acted incorrectly, but whether the subjects of a foreign power have received from our officers an injury. And to whom is such application for redress to be preferred? To the Executive. It was not to be disguised that there were difficult questions pending between this country and Spain and that there was a disposition on the part of the agents of Spain to throw firebrands into the public councils, to distract the operations of this Government. They had already attempted to excite disaffection and disturbance in that quarter. He would admit there ought to be harmony in the Cabinet, and no man would go further than he would to discountenance a spirit of division and distrust. But he was not disposed to change the ordinary channels in which business should proceed on the ground that the nation had not confidence in the Executive. He asked if the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in speaking of the loss of confidence in the Executive, did not mistake his own for the pulse of the House, and of the nation? What Administration, he would ask, had ever been fortunate enough to entitle itself to that gentleman's confidence? Or was it proper for the House to pay very great deference to the censures of a gentleman who had opposed every Administration? When it is so difficult, continued Mr. D., to preserve harmony among ourselves, it is at least desirable to exclude the effects of foreign disorganization and foreign influence. And what is there before the House as evidence on which to act, but ex parte statements of these petitioners; and this, too, to the exclusion of that testimony which the hold this Government has upon the duty and the honor of its own officers and agents presents to oppose it? And whose fault was it, he would further inquire, that the government of Florida was proconsular and tyrannical? Whose but our own? The government of Florida was an anomaly—a territory of this Government yet, inhabited by Spaniards. But could a free government be adapted to the condition of slaves! A free government is only auxiliary to human happiness when it holds its jurisdiction over a free people. Mr. McDUFFIE extended his observations to considerable length upon the necessity that existed of erecting a form of government adapted to the genius and habits of the people. The Spaniards there could have no just ideas of civil liberty, of trial by jury, &c., and it was the duty of the agent to examine his trust in the spirit of that government with which he was intrusted. If any blame rested anywhere, therefore, it must be on those by whom the government was organized. But, in reviewing the various circumstances, he thought we ought not to countenance a course calculated to produce distrust in our own Executive, and to lead the Spanish Government to believe that we would not sustain our own Administration.

Mr. REID (as well as he could be heard) spoke to show there was an impropriety in referring this petition to the Military Committee, but that its proper course would have been to the Judiciary Committee, as well from respect for the officers implicated, as to show to them that if their conduct had been improper, it would receive no countenance in this House. He knew nothing of the circumstances but from hearing the paper read; but he felt much interest in the transaction, and he would not disguise, that in this he had a feeling growing out of an intimacy with one of the parties concerned in this inquiry, of date as early as boyhood. He advocated a reference of the petition to the committee; and let the censure fall where it was merited. He was far from expressing any distrust of the President of the United States on this occasion, or in his proceedings in relation to Florida, but there was certainly no propriety in referring this matter to him. Where was the clause of the constitution which referred such a case to the Executive, and excluded this House from inquiring into it? If both are coequal, on what pretence will the House answer these Spanish gentlemen that we cannot afford them redress? Was it because it would produce discussion? Whatever investigation of the subject or discussion might take place here, it would not deprive the Executive of the power to act, and afford ultimate redress. How were these people attempting to throw firebrands in the public councils? Had they not been expelled from their firesides, from their homes, and finally thrown into prison? Was this a case of wanton or causeless appeal to the House? Mr. R. defended the act of last session, which, though passed in haste, was not intended to give the tyrannical powers imputed to it—not to confer the powers of a Spanish Captain General of Cuba; and the first idea he had of such a thing was when he heard the exercise of those powers; and heard of them, he said, with amazement. The people who had just emerged from a government of tyranny, were, by this construction of the act, thrown back into it. This was an effect never intended by Congress.

Mr. RANDOLPH made some remarks in explanation of his reasons for calling Mr. McDUFFIE to order, (which he had done from a misapprehension of that gentleman's meaning,) and his satisfaction with the explanation given. He had not the least disposition to carp at words used in the heat of debate, but the words used justified his construction of them. He ridiculed the idea of these poor Spaniards, kept under lock and key in Pensacola, throwing the brand of discord in the Cabinet—it needed no Guy Faux to execute such a gunpowder plot as that. In reply to the remark of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) that he had not supported any Administration, he would merely say—though not to know that gentleman might argue himself unknown—yet he could say that, for more years than he had heard that gentleman's name, he was Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, and gave his best support to the then Administration. In reference to the proceedings on the Florida bill of last session, he, acting at the head of the Committee of Foreign Relations in consequence of the indisposition of the Chairman, waited on the President, and asked to know the views of the Executive—the bill corresponded with those views.* He had

* This statement of Mr. RANDOLPH carries the origin of the bill up to the President and his Cabinet, as all who are conversant with legislation under such circumstances—carrying treaties into effect by law—know is always the case. Such bills are drawn in the Department of State, after Cabinet consultation, and then reported to the House, or Senate, by the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The following is the whole of the bill that relates to the government of the Territory:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of said Territories be sooner made by Congress, all the military, civil, and judicial powers exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same Territories, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, for the maintaining the inhabitants of said Territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the laws of the United States relating to the revenue and its collection, subject to the modification stipulated by the fifteenth article of the said treaty, in favor of Spanish vessels and their cargoes, and the laws relating to the importation of persons of color, shall be extended to the said Territories."

A brief enactment, but very comprehensive, and under which General Jackson, first American Governor of the Florida, was commissioned with "all the powers and authorities heretofore exercised by the Governor and Captain General and Intendant of Cuba, and by the Governors of East and West Florida, within the said Provinces, respectively." And upon this ample power, two limitations alone were placed by the commission—first, that no new tax should be imposed by the Governor; secondly, that no grant for land should be made, or confirmed. And with this commission corresponded the heading to the proclamation, drawn at the Department of State, and furnished to the General, and to be promulgated on taking possession of the Territories. Thus: "By Major General Andrew Jackson, Governor of the Provinces of the Florida, exercising the powers of the Captain General and of the Intendant of the Island of Cuba over the said provinces, and of the Governors of said provinces, respectively." And, according to this heading furnished by the Government, all the public acts promulgated by General Jackson—ordinances, decrees, judgments, proclamations, &c., were headed with the same words; so that he constantly appeared, in his official character, as Captain General and Intendant of Cuba, and as the Spanish Governor of the two Floridas: a character quite inconsistent with the idea of any existence of the Constitution of the United States within the territorial limits of his dominion. He constantly repulsed the idea of the presence of the constitution in the Territory committed to his charge; and in that repulsion he was sustained by the Federal Executive Government at Washington, and by each House of Congress, each of these authorities refusing to entertain, as breaches of the constitution, the never supported the bill of the last session. He was, therefore, exempt from any blame, personally, for the passage of it. Mr. R. went on at considerable length in reply to Mr. McDUFFIE, to vindicate his course on this and on various other subjects connected with the part he took in the public councils in years past. Mr. R. contended that it was perfectly competent for the House to order the discharge of the petitioners, as it had in the case of American citizens so held in imprisonment by the public officers, and between these persons and American citizens there should be no difference.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied at some length to Mr. RANDOLPH on those points of his remarks not particularly applicable to the question under consideration; and concluded with an argument to show that the Executive branch of the Government was the proper department to apply the petition for redress in the present case, which had been improperly addressed to this House.

Mr. HARDIN understood the import of the memorial to be, that the petitioners had been long citizens of Pensacola, and officers under the Government of Spain; that they departed from the territory pursuant to treaty, and returned as private individuals, for the purpose of revisiting the land of their nativity, and to enjoy their property. He denied the arbitrary powers which the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) contended the Territorial Government possessed; and was proceeding in his remarks, when he (it being after 4 o'clock) gave way for a motion to adjourn, which was agreed to—ayes 81; and, thereupon, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 25.

Transactions at Pensacola.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the unfinished business of Saturday, and the question recurring to agree to a motion to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the consideration of the petition of the two Spaniards, imprisoned in Pensacola by the orders of the acting Governor—

Mr. EVERTS, the Chairman of the Military Committee, stated that he was informed, from good authority, that the papers relative to the confinement of these men had been forwarded from Pensacola to General Jackson; that he had transmitted them to the President; that they were received in this city on Thursday last; that an order was issued for the release of the men on Saturday, and was actually despatched for Pensacola.

No question was taken on the subject previous to the adjournment, which took place before four o'clock, on the motion of Mr. RAN-complaints forwarded against him by those who had been militarily dealt with under his government. For all which, see the debates in Congress, and the answers of the President to the complaining parties.

DOLPH, which motion, preceded by a pertinent speech, was founded on report, which had reached the Capitol, of the demise of Mr. PINKNEY, Senator from Maryland, which report afterwards turned out to be premature.

Mr. RANDOLPH's remarks were as follows:

Mr. R. rose, he said, to announce to the House a fact, which, he hoped, would put an end, at least for this day, to all further jar or collision, here or elsewhere, among the members of this body. Yes, for this one day, at least, said he, let us say, as our first mother said to our first father—

“While yet we live, scarce one short hour perhaps,
Between us two let there be peace.”

I rise to announce to the House, the not unlooked-for death of a man who filled the first place in the public estimation, in the first profession in that estimation, in this or in any other country. We have been talking of General Jackson, and a greater than him is, not here, but gone for ever! I allude, sir, to the boast of Maryland, and the pride of the United States—the pride of all of us—but particularly the pride and ornament of the profession of which you, Mr. Speaker, are a member, and an eminent one. He was a man with whom I lived, when a member of this House, and a new one too—and ever since he left it for the other—I speak it with pride—in habits, not merely negatively friendly, but of kindness and cordiality. The last time that I saw him was on Saturday—the last Saturday but one—in the pride of life, and full possession and vigor of all his faculties, in that lobby. He is now gone to his account, (for as the tree falls, so it must lie,) where we must all go—where I must very soon go, and by the same road too, the course of nature; and where all of us, put off the evil day as long as we may, must also soon go. For what is the past but as a span, and which of us can look forward to as many years as we have lived? The last act of intercourse between us was an act, the recollection of which I would not be without, for all the offices that all the men of the United States have filled, or ever shall fill. He had, indeed, his faults—foibles, I should rather say; and, sir, who is without them? Let such, and such only, cast the first stone. And these foibles, faults if you will, which everybody could see, because everybody is clear-sighted in regard to the faults and foibles of others; he, I have no doubt, would have been the first to acknowledge, on a proper representation of them. Every thing now is hidden to us—not, God forbid! that utter darkness rests upon the grave, which, hideous as it is, is lighted, cheered, and warmed by fire from Heaven—not the impious fire fabled to be stolen from Heaven by the heathen, but by the spirit of the living God, whom we all profess to worship, and whom I hope we shall spend the remainder of this day in worshipping, not with mouth-honor, but in our hearts; in spirit and in truth—that it may not be said of us, also,

Treaties with the Cherokee and Creek Indians.

[H. OF R.]

"This people draweth nigh unto me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips, but their heart is far from me." Yes, it is just so. He is gone. I will not say that our loss is irreparable; because such a man as has existed may exist again. There has been a Homer; there has been a Shakspeare; there has been a Milton; there has been a Newton. There ~~may~~ then be another Pinkney, but there is now none. And it was to announce this event I have risen. I am, said Mr. R., almost inclined to believe in presentiments. I have been all along as well assured of the fatal termination of that disease with which he was affected, as I am now. And I have dragged my weary limbs before sunrise to the door of his sick chamber, (for I would not intrude upon the sacred sorrows of his family,) almost every morning since his illness. From the first I had almost no hope. I move you, sir, that this House do now adjourn.

When Mr. R. concluded, the question was taken on adjournment, and carried, nem. con.

TUESDAY, February 26.

After the Journal of yesterday had been read, in a part of which the fact of Mr. RANDOLPH's having yesterday announced the death of Mr. PINKNEY was stated—

Mr. RANDOLPH rose and observed, that he prayed the indulgence of the House, and of the delegation from Maryland, and particularly of the young member behind him, (Mr. NELSON, of Maryland,) whom, as well as his late father, his fellow-laborer in that House, he was happy to call his friend, for having announced a fact which took place yesterday, though not true at the time the announcement was made. [He alluded to the death of Mr. Pinkney, of Maryland.] And it was due to his own character to state with precision the canal through which he obtained the information. On the seats reserved for them, I saw, said Mr. R., one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, who told me that the fact was so. I asked him if he was sure of it. He replied that he was—for he had just seen another gentleman—a most worthy member of the bar of Baltimore, equally entitled to credit, and none could be more so—who told him that he had seen the corpse. From thence I returned to my seat. At that moment a gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ROES) was addressing the Chair. The intervening time did not, as well as I could judge, exceed two minutes; and time, under such circumstances, would hardly appear shorter than the reality. I was myself, said Mr. R., under an impulse which I was as utterly unable to control, as I now am to control the throbbing arteries of my frame. It was under that impulse I announced it as a fact to the House—for I could not bear that we should be occupied with that sort of discussion which was then pending, or with any, at a time when a loss had occurred to this nation, and a void created which never can be filled—the loss of a man whose legal reputation transcended that of any other man in this country—the President of that Court—of which both were most illustrious ornaments—only excepted; for, of all others, it might be said that, in point of professional renown, at least, they were proximi longo intervallo.

Mr. R. concluded, by expressing the hope that the apology he had made would be accepted by those to whom it was addressed. He owed it to his very respectable informant to state, that the whole grew out of that gentleman's mistaking the statement of the gentleman from whom he had drawn his information, which was, that he had seen a person who said he had seen the last sad remains of Mr. Pinkney, and not that he had seen them himself.

By unanimous consent, the entry above referred to in the Journal was then expunged.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the order of business of the day was dispensed with, and a recess at the pleasure of the House was directed.

Soon afterwards a message was received from the Senate, announcing the death of the Hon. WILLIAM PINKNEY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland, and that his funeral would be attended on to-morrow from the Senate Chamber, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then rose, and submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That this House will attend the funeral of the Hon. William Pinkney, late a member of the Senate from the State of Maryland, to-morrow at 11 o'clock; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning, and wear crape for thirty days.

And then the House adjourned over to Thursday.

THURSDAY, February 28.

Treaties with the Cherokee and Creek Indians, to extinguish their Title to Lands in Georgia.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

Under the appropriation made by the act of Congress of the 11th of April, 1820, for holding treaties with the Creek and Cherokee nations of Indians, for the extinguishment of Indian title to lands within the State of Georgia, pursuant to the 4th condition of the first article of the Articles of Agreement and Cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, on the 24th of April, 1802, a treaty was held with the Creek nation, the expense of which, upon the settlement of the accounts of the commissioners who were appointed to conduct the negotiation, was ascertained to amount to the sum of $24,695, leaving an unexpended balance of the appropriation, of $5,805, a sum too small to negotiate a treaty, also, with the Cherokees, as was contemplated by the act making the appropriation. The Legislature of Georgia being still desirous that a treaty should be held for further extinguishment of the Indian title to lands within that State, to obtain an indemnity to the citizens of that State for property of considerable value which had been taken from them by the Cherokee Indians, I submit the subject to the consideration of Congress, that a further sum, which, in addition to the balance of the former appropriation, will be adequate to the expense attending a treaty with them, may be appropriated, should Congress deem it prudent.*

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 25, 1822.

The Message was read and committed to the Committee of the whole House, to which is committed the joint resolution making an appropriation for carrying into effect the Articles of Agreement and Cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, entered into on the 24th of April, 1802, and for other purposes.

Transactions in Florida.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Maine, rose to address the House. He thought the period had arrived in which it had become proper to take into the serious consideration of this House that part of the President's Message which related to the transactions in Florida. In the course he had thought it his duty to pursue in relation to the subject, he was actuated by no personal hostility to either of the individuals to whose conduct the inquiry principally related. The further prosecution of this investigation was an irksome task, but he believed it a duty to perform it. That part of the documents which seemed to be referable to the Committee on Foreign Relations, contained, in his opinion, facts which ought to arrest the attention of the people of this country. Would it be said that this subject was an affair which belonged to the Executive only, because those officers were appointed by the Executive? If, indeed, said Mr. W., the Executive only were affected by these transactions, the argument might be a good one. But the character of the nation was also involved, and it could not be the duty of the Representatives of the people to sit still, when it was evident that the Executive had no disposition to interfere.

Mr. WHITMAN thereupon handed to the Chair the following resolutions:

* This Message from Mr. Monroe deserves to be noted for its strict conformity to the constitution, in obtaining the sanction of Congress, through an appropriation, before he would make a treaty involving an expenditure to carry it into effect. These were only Indian treaties, for the purchase of Indian lands within a State; yet he would not hold the treaty until the object was sanctioned by the Legislative power. How different from these later times, when treaties are made, or proposed, with foreign powers, to purchase foreign territory at a cost of 10, 20, 50, 100, and 250 millions of dollars; and all kept a secret from Congress and the people; and if any treaty is made, even then not leaving Congress and the Senate to free action upon it, but making it an administration measure, to be carried into effect by all the means of acting on the will of members known to the power and patronage of the President.

Resolved, That such parts of the documents accompanying the Message of the President of the United States, of the 28th January last, as comprise the correspondence between Andrew Jackson, late Governor of the Florida, his deputies and substitutes, and the officers of His Catholic Majesty there resident, and the issuing by the said Jackson of his proclamation of the 29th September, 1821, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Resolved, That such parts of the documents accompanying the Message of the President of the United States, of the 28th of January last, as relates to the exercise of judicial functions on the part of Andrew Jackson, late Governor of the Florida, and the controversy relative thereto, between him and Eiegus Fromentin, Judge of the Court therein, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Resolved, That such parts of the documents accompanying the Message of the President of the United States, of the 28th of January last, as relate to the employment of the military force of the United States, in the execution of the orders and decrees of Andrew Jackson, late Governor of the Florida, while claiming to act in a judicial capacity there, and to enforce his proclamation of the 29th September, 1821, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolutions having been read—

Mr. WHITMAN then resumed his remarks on the subject, and expressed his opinion that the Governor of Florida did not possess those judicial powers of which he claimed the exercise. He referred to the act under which that officer was appointed, and contended that it was not a fair construction of that law to consider it as conferring upon the Governor the powers which the Spanish Government had conferred upon the Captain General of Cuba. The law was made with reference to the existing habits and laws of this country, and it was never a part of the policy of this Government, or of the people, to combine judicial, executive, and military powers in the same person—and he contended that the moment the cession was consummated, the laws of the United States took place of the Spanish laws in the Territory of Florida. He also maintained that, so far as the laws of Florida were adopted, they were cumulative only, and did not exclude the fundamental laws of this Government, and these laws it was the especial and exclusive right of the judge who was appointed over that Territory to interpret and enforce. He therefore thought there was a peculiar propriety in referring this part of the subject to the committee to which he proposed to refer it.

In respect to the third part of the resolution, he also expressed his views at length in enforcing a reference of it to the Military Committee; and concluded by observing that he should have ceased his remarks long ago had he not been interrupted; yet he could not forbear to express his hope that the House would not sit still and sanction, by silent acquiescence, a combination of executive, judicial, and military powers in a single individual, which was a precedent too important to be suffered to gather strength by the silence of the House.

FEBRUARY, 1822.]

Transactions in Florida.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WRIGHT, of Maryland, expressed his regret that a subject which had already excited considerable discussion, should now be brought forward in another shape. He believed it was unwise to suffer it to distract the attention of the House, at a time when other subjects of greater importance were pressing upon the attention of this body. He contended that the course pursued by the Governor of Florida was evidently correct, and that the documents before the House fully proved it. He had read them with admiration, and they renewed his confidence in the distinguished person who was sent to execute the laws in Florida. The people of that place did not even possess Territorial laws. It was not possible, at that time, to make such a code of laws, and General Jackson was sent, clothed with authority to carry such as were adopted into execution. And what has he done? He has done what the law directed, and he has done no more—and such is the opinion of the Executive. If anybody is in fault, it is the Executive. Why not move, then, that he be impeached? Take the bull by the horns instead of directing these measures against an officer whose conduct is approved by the Executive of the nation. Mr. W. adverted to the equivocal and shuffling evasions that were resorted to by the Spaniards to procrastinate or defeat the cession. Energetic measures were essentially necessary to accomplish the objects of our Government; and, as General Jackson was charged with that duty, he was under an imperious obligation to secure the rights of this Government. In the performance of the task required of him, Mr. W. contended, General Jackson had acted strictly within his duty. The Spaniards had evaded, by every possible artifice, the fulfilment of the treaty of cession. One stipulation of that treaty was, that those Spaniards who were there should depart from the Territory. It was contended, however, that, although they came back again, yet, by once departing, they had complied with the treaty. But was this a fulfilment of the spirit of that instrument?

Mr. GILMER rose to give the reasons why he thought the documents relating to the transactions in Florida, ought to be referred to the Committee of the whole House, to whom is referred the bill for establishing a government for the Territory of Florida. He quoted the law of the last session to show that, by it, certain rights were reserved to the people of Florida, &c. He also quoted that law to show what sort of authority the President was to give to officers appointed for Florida, and compared General Jackson's commission with the provisions of that law, with a view to show that the powers granted to him, (being those belonging to the Captain General of Cuba,) were greater than those contemplated by the law of the last session. It was important, he argued, that, in the establishment of a system for the future government of Florida, no such mistake should be committed. He was, with a view to this object, about inquiring into what were the powers of the Captain General of Cuba, when the Speaker restrained him in the range of his remarks, by observing that the question before the House (that of laying the resolutions on the table) did not admit of that course of debate. Mr. G. then only added, that he thought it important that the Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the government of Florida, should have these papers before them, in order to detect the error from which so much difficulty had flowed.

Mr. LOWNDES expressed his hope that those resolutions would be ordered to lie on the table, and further expressed his opinion that no advantage would result from referring these documents to any committee. The general facts which they presented were sufficiently known to be referred to in debate on the Florida Government bill, without specially referring them to the committee on that subject. The whole subject was already before the House, and before the people of the United States, and he did not perceive that any special order in relation to these documents was necessary, or even desirable, &c.

Mr. BUCHANAN was of opinion that, after what had passed, a full investigation ought to be had on this subject. A charge had been preferred against a public officer of high character, not only of an intention to violate the laws of the country, but of having actually violated them: and, said Mr. B., we, the representatives of the people, are bound to investigate the charge. The most serious consequences might be expected to result, if, after charges of this sort were made against an individual, this House should avoid meeting the question—should put them to sleep by permanently laying them on the table. He, for one, was willing to meet the proper responsibility of declaring his opinion, either of the guilt or innocence of this distinguished individual. This was what the people would expect of their Representatives, and Mr. B. trusted they would not be disappointed. The best course, he thought, which this subject could now take, would be, to refer the subject to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take it up after other subjects, demanding more immediate attention, should be disposed of.

Mr. CANNON was in favor of laying the motion on the table, and of keeping it there. He had been of opinion from the first that it was not a proper subject for the interposition of this House. If any improper exercise of authority had existed in Florida, the President of the United States was responsible for it, and to him he wished to leave it, &c.

Mr. WHITMAN made a few further remarks; when,

The question was taken, and the motion to lay the resolution on the table prevailed—ayes 101, noes 41.

SATURDAY, March 2.

Transactions in Florida—Final Action of the House—Refusing (without division of its members) to take Cognizance of the Complaints of the Persons who had been Extemporaneously, and Militarily dealt with, either by Governor Jackson himself, or by the Acting Governor, George Walton, Esq.

The next subject in the orders of the day, was the report of the Committee on Military Affairs on the petitions of the Spanish officers confined in Pensacola, which report recommended that the Military Committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof. The motion depending when this subject was last under consideration, was, to lay it on the table—which would be in effect to put aside the subject. And the question was taken on laying the same on the table, and decided in the affirmative, without a division.

Suppression of Piracy.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported, in part, pursuant to certain resolutions submitted to them, respecting the piracies committed in the Gulf of Mexico and the contiguous seas—setting forth the measures that had been resorted to to suppress them, and the views of the committee in relation to further measures that were necessary for that purpose.

The report is as follows :

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the several resolutions of the House of Representatives, of the 3d of January, and 5th and 6th of February last, beg leave to submit the following report, in part : That they have made the investigation which the importance of the subject demands, and have kept in view the general object of protecting the persons and property of the citizens of the United States, and of guarding the laws of the United States from violation, upon terms the least embarrassing to the public finances.

The extent, however, to which the system of plunder upon the ocean is carried on in the West India seas, and the Gulf of Mexico, is truly alarming, and calls imperiously for the prompt and efficient interposition of the General Government. Some fresh instance of the atrocity with which the pirates infesting those seas carry on their depredations, accompanied, too, by the indiscriminate massacre of the defenceless and unoffending, is brought by almost every mail, so that the intercourse between the Northern and Southern sections of the Union, by sea, is almost cut off.

The committee are induced to believe that this system of piracy is now spreading itself to a vast extent, attracting to it the idle, vicious, and desperate of all nations, and, more particularly, those who have heretofore been engaged in the slave trade, from which the vigilance of the American cruisers have driven them; and that, if they are not winked at by the authorities in the Island of Cuba, they are in no respect restrained by their interference.

The committee are also of opinion, that, extended as the American coast has now become, the danger of smuggling has considerably increased, and that both these considerations recommend the employment of an ample naval force, which, for scouring those seas, shall have the effect of driving the present freebooters from the ocean, and of preventing others from resorting to similar practices. Depredations of this description can be effectually broken up only by keeping up such a force as will render the hazard of engaging in them greater than the emolument to be derived from success.

Under this view of the subject, the committee have inquired into the situation of the vessels now belonging to the Navy of the United States, to ascertain what portion of them may be advantageously employed for the purposes embraced in the above resolutions.

That of those actually employed, they find that the ship Franklin, of 74 guns, is in the Pacific Ocean, for the protection of our commerce and whale trade in that quarter; and that the Constellation frigate, of 36 guns, is in the same ocean, but ordered to return to the United States upon the arrival of the Franklin; that the schooner Dolphin, of 12 guns, accompanies the Franklin as absolutely necessary upon so long a cruise.

That the frigate Constitution, of 44 guns; sloop of war Ontario, of 18 guns; and schooner Nonsuch, of 10 guns, are cruising in the Mediterranean, to keep the Barbary Powers in awe, and protect our commerce on that sea; and, it is believed, that a less force would be inadequate for these objects.

That the sloop of war Hornet, of 18 guns; the brigs Enterprise and Spark, of 12 guns each; and the schooners Porpoise, Grampus, Shark, and Alligator, of 12 guns each, are already cruising in the West India seas and Gulf of Mexico, for the protection of trade, suppression of piracy, and traffic in slaves; and that two gunboats, Nos. 158 and 168, are also cruising along the coasts of Georgia and Florida for the same purposes.

That the frigate Macedonian is now equipping at Boston, and will soon sail on a cruise for the same object; and that it will be necessary to keep at least one vessel of war, either a corvette or schooner, on the coast of Africa, as the most efficient means for the suppression of the slave trade.

The committee are of opinion that the foregoing enumerated force could be withdrawn from the service in which it is employed without detriment to the public interest, and that the force now in the West India seas and Gulf of Mexico is inadequate for the objects specified in the resolutions above referred to.

That the rest of the force belonging to the navy, consisting of the Java, of 44 guns, and now unworthy of repairs; the Erie, of 18 guns; the Peacock, of 18 guns; Congress, of 36 guns; Guerriere, of 44 guns; John Adams, of 24 guns; United States, of 44 guns; and Cyane, of 24 guns, are in ordinary at the different navy yards, at Boston, New York, Washington, and Norfolk.

But the committee do not hesitate to pronounce sloops of war to be better adapted to the purposes contemplated by the resolutions than frigates, or smaller vessels. They are superior to frigates, because being in relation to the service equally efficient, and costing no more than half the sum, the same expense will enable us to multiply the chances of success by increasing the number of vessels, and doubling the efficiency of the same expense. They are superior to smaller vessels, because they are decidedly of a greater force than any of the piratical cruisers, or even the vessels employed in the slave trade, many of which are now, or soon would be, more than a match for schooners. The number of the men on board of sloops of war would also give these vessels the advantage, by enabling them to man their prizes more securely; to man and send their boats in force into waters too shallow for schooners, where the pirates seek shelter, and for many other objects necessarily incident to such a service. Nor do the committee suppose that the consideration of promoting and preserving a proper discipline among the officers of the navy is altogether to be overlooked in deciding upon the species of force to be employed in a particular service.

The committee are of opinion, therefore, that, to afford immediate and effectual protection to our commerce in the West India seas and the Gulf of Mexico, the most expeditions and advisable course, in the first instance, would be, to fit out the corvettes Cyane and John Adams, and the sloops of war Peacock and Erie, which can be accomplished within a short time, and with little expense; that the Erie can be fitted for sea in the course of five months, the Peacock within two months, the John Adams within six weeks, and that the Constellation frigate, should it be thought necessary, may be directed, on her return from the Pacific, to cruise in the West India seas, though it is believed it would be more expensive to build additional sloops of war for that purpose.

The four first-named vessels are now undergoing repairs, and the amount necessary for this purpose is already embraced in the estimate for the present year; so that, if they should now be directed to be put in service, it will be necessary to increase the estimates for the service of the current year not more than one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. And the committee are authorized to state, that this appropriation will not materially vary the state of the Treasury, as disclosed by the Secretary's report, because, since the date of that report, there has been transferred to the surplus fund an amount of unexpended balances of appropriations for the naval service, sufficient to meet the increased expenditure. But the committee cannot suppose, that where the safety of the commerce and citizens of the United States call imperiously for the exertion of the national force, so small an expenditure can be a matter of any moment. If the protection be necessary, it must be yielded, and the only consideration connected with the cost should be, that the money necessary to make it effectual should not be wastefully expended.

The committee further report that, in their opinion, it would be expedient for the United States to employ, arm, and equip private vessels, for this purpose. If the force already indicated be insufficient for the purpose, the committee would prefer recommending the building of additional sloops of war, rather than to purchase private vessels; which are always of inferior composition, and of unsuitable construction, and requiring repairs and an unprofitable expense, to alter and make them at all fit for public vessels.

The committee are also of opinion that it would be expedient "to authorize the destruction of persons and vessels found at sea, or in uninhabited places, making war upon the commerce of the United States, without any regular commission." And that it would be inconsistent "with public law, or general usage, to give any authority to destroy pirates and piratical vessels found at sea or in uninhabited places."

The committee are of opinion, that it would be dangerous, and productive of great evil, to vest in the commanders of our public vessels an authority to treat as pirates, and punish without trial, even such persons as above described.

It is not necessary for the accomplishment of the objects in view that such an authority should be given, and it is essentially due to the rights of all, and the principles of "public law, and general usage," that the consequences and punishment of piracy should follow only a legal adjudication of the fact.

On the whole, the committee are of opinion, that the employment of a sufficient number of vessels in the West India seas, and the Gulf of Mexico, authorized to make captures under the existing laws and regulations, if the officers are properly industrious and enterprising, would afford all the protection required, and the committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient, forthwith, to fit out and put in service the corvettes Cyane and John Adams, and the sloops of war Peacock and Erie, for the protection of commerce, and the suppression of piracy, in the West India seas, and the Gulf of Mexico, and also to employ the frigate Constellation, should the President of the United States deem the employment of a frigate necessary for the purposes aforesaid.

The report and resolution, on motion of Mr. McLANE, were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Proposed Adjournment.

Mr. RANDOLPH, agreeably to notice heretofore given, introduced a joint resolution for the double purpose of raising a committee to select and arrange such business as might be deemed indispensably necessary to be acted on at this session, and also to fix an early day for adjournment.

Mr. CANNON was willing to concur in the part of the joint resolution which contemplated a limited day for adjournment. But he was entirely unwilling to put it in the power of any joint committee to select from the orders of the day what subjects should be acted on. Experience had convinced him of the expediency of refusing to appoint any committee for that purpose, short of a majority of the House. It was desirable that equal justice should be done to all, and perfect impartiality could not be expected in the disposition of the business, from any committee that could be selected.

Mr. ROCHESTER called for a division of the question, and the branch that related to the appointment of a joint committee to select and arrange the business necessary to be done was first in order.

Mr. WRIGHT said the House had not the necessary facts before them which could authorize them to fix a limit to the session. Three or four weeks hence it would be much easier to act on this resolution than now. Hitherto we have done almost nothing but talk, and talking, too, at the rate of four hundred dollars an hour. There was an evident cacothes loquendi in the House, which, it was to be hoped, would be restrained. He (Mr. W.) came here as a public servant, to do business, and it was the duty of the House to act on the same principles in relation to their business as a court of justice would; and he was sorry that any time should be taken up in discussing this question.

Mr. SAWYER rose to inquire whether, if such a committee were raised, it could place upon the list such cases as were not referred to a Committee of the Whole, but to standing or select committees, and he adverted to a bill which he deemed of importance, in relation to the abolition of sinecure offices in certain collection districts, and which he thought should be acted on at this session.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, was in favor of selecting and arranging the business that was indispensably necessary to be acted on before Congress should adjourn. It was a practice of long standing, and he thought a useful, if not a necessary one.

Mr. E. JOHNSON, under the impression that the motion was premature, moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH was unwilling that the sessions of Congress should be protracted to such a length that nobody fit to represent the people would be able to come here. He referred to the situations of the merchants, the agriculturist, and the lawyer, to show that such persons could not afford to remain here during a long session for the pay they received; and he feared the consequence would be that Congress would be made up of the refuse and offal of all professions, not excepting the clerical. What other great measure, he asked, had been elaborated by the committees of this House, except the bankrupt bill? and that had been previously cut and dried. There was no more pressing or important business now than last year, when the session was limited to the 4th of March, and there was perhaps more danger of doing, than of not doing, the public business. He thought he should take the liberty of saying no to every proposition that should be presented to the House, before he went away—not excepting the civil list—for he was not prepared to vote away any more of the money of the people, until that which had been previously voted was fully accounted for, &c.

Mr. BALDWIN was sorry that this proposition should be brought forward at the present period of the business of the House. It was admitted on all hands that very little had been done; and, if we now go home and say we have done nothing, and are inquired of for the reason of our abrupt departure, what shall be the answer? Can a satisfactory one be rendered? What would any man say to an agent to whom he had intrusted his private business, that should render him no other excuse? If there had been an unnecessary waste of time, the way to redeem it was, not to go away and leave the business unfinished, but to make no such waste of more. There was important business to be done in relation to the public lands, and important claims on the Government to be adjusted. But what are we told? Are we to say no to every proposition that shall be presented? Or is it not our duty to listen and examine? Mr. B. would not say there had been an unnecessary waste of time at the present session; but, if there had not, it was very certain that it took much time to do little business. The people and petitioners have subjects before us that they expect will be acted upon—they expect that their claims will be either allowed or rejected. But it is said that if we protract the session, Congress will be filled with the refuse and offals of all the professions. But did the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) look to the history of Congress when he made the remark? The first Congress under the Government sat almost the whole year, and Mr. B. adverted to a statement to show that the period proposed for this session was shorter than had been ever known for the first session of any Congress during the whole period of the Government. There was much business before the House. The nation was extending in its population, in its territory, and in its interest, and in all its relations. He would ask, then, whether the members of the House could feel that they had done their duty in going off before the public business was accomplished? He believed that the apology of personal inconvenience would not be accepted. Mr. B. was not disposed to abridge the freedom of debate. He believed it was suited to the genius of the Government; but it was generally found that there was too much of it at the commencement of a session, and too little at the close. With him there was but one rule, and that was to do the public business, and then adjourn.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, was opposed to the motion. He was anxious to take measures to assign some limit to the session. By referring to the journals, it would be seen that there was usually as much business done in a short session as in a long one. Fix a time to adjourn, said Mr. E., and then, and not until then, shall we attend to business.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the subject on the table, and decided in the negative by a small majority.

Military Academy.

The next business in order was the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole on the bill making certain appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment.

The question which was under consideration, when this subject was last up, (on Friday week,) was on agreeing to the appropriation for the Military Academy.

To this appropriation, to the amount proposed, objection was made by Mr. COCKER; whose object was to appropriate enough for the immediate support of the institution only, wishing to have a full view of the expenses, &c., of this institution, that the people might see how much the United States paid for the support of the sons of the richest men in the country.

On this subject there took place considerable debate, and on a motion to recommit the bill, in which Messrs. STEWART, MALLARY, EDWARDS of North Carolina, F. JOHNSON, SMITH of Maryland, MERCKE, WARFIELD, NELSON of Maryland, COOKE, and SMITH, took part,

The question to recommit the bill was taken and lost without a division.

MONDAY, March 4.

Sunday Mails.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted for consideration the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, inquire into the expediency of preventing the carriage of the mails on the Sabbath day, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WRIGHT rose to address the Chair in support of the resolution. The following has been furnished by Mr. W. as being the substance of his remarks :

Mr. Speaker, I am requested by a number of my constituents to endeavor to effect a regulation in the carriage of the mails, so as to prevent their being carried on the Sabbath day. We now enjoy a profound peace with all the nations of the earth, under the kind providence of the great Benefactor of the Universe, who has inscribed on the heart of the whole human family his law, "to keep the Sabbath day holy." It will be recollected that even during the late war, when this subject was before this House, that I then advocated this restriction as far as practicable, not inconsistent with the best interest of my country ; and I have a perfect confidence that my devotion to the prosecution of that war by the exercise of all the energies of the nation, will never be forgotten. I have, sir, during the war, advocated this measure, as will appear by the votes and proceedings in that case. Sir, in every State in this Union there is a law making it penal to violate the Sabbath by any work or labor. Sir, the right of Congress to direct the carriage of the mail on the Sabbath day, ought, in its execution, to be so exercised as neither to violate the divine law, nor in any manner to authorize the violation of the laws of the States, unless in such cases as necessity may impose, in which we shall find our justification even in the divine law. I have consulted the Postmaster General on this subject, and am happy to inform this House that it meets his approbation in a certain degree.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, required the question that the House do now consider the resolution ; which question being taken, it was decided in the negative. So the House refused now to consider the resolution.

Military Appropriation Bill—Military Academy—its expenses.

The orders of the day being then called for, the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Military Establishment for the year 1822, was read a third time, when Mr. COOKE moved to recommit the bill for the purpose of correcting a mistake which he had been instrumental in producing in the bill, in which he had supposed that $86,900 would cover the expenditures for the year of the Military Academy. He had since ascertained that the sum of $98,139 would be necessary for its support on its present footing, and it was with the view of correcting that error in the bill that he proposed the recommitment of it.

Mr. RANDOLPH made some remarks at some length in favor of a recommitment, with views more comprehensive than those of Mr. COOKE.

Mr. VAN WYCK felt it his duty to vote against this bill in its present shape, and at this time. But sir, I shall vote against the bill, because I think it high time that this Government curtailed its expenses. Indeed, sir, the very moment after the peace of 1815, steps ought to have been taken to have returned to the old Peace Establishment of 1808 and 1809. At peace, as we now are, with all the world—not a nation, that I know of, that would raise a finger against us—it can, therefore, no longer be necessary to keep up this expensive and imposing attitude. If, under the old Peace Establishment, when Mr. Jefferson administered this Government, when we were every day threatened with a war, a reliance could then be placed on ourselves, or rather on the militia of our country, I think at this time the same confidence may again be restored. Under that Administration, for eight years, the whole sum appropriated for the Military Department was but $11,295,625, or the annual average appropriation was only $1,412,075. But, sir, what does this bill require ; or, rather, what does the Secretary say will be necessary for the year 1822 ? Not less than $5,165,896 19. In two years, then, in a profound state of peace too, we now require as much as was then used in eight years, although the country was in a partial state of war.

Let us take another retrospect. During the eight years of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, the whole revenue of the country averaged annually but $13,363,860, and with it was not only paid all the current expenses of the Government, but the national debt was sunk $40,000,000. But, sir, for the last two years the average annual revenue of the United States has been $15,054,511. And with it, sir, what have we done ? Not only the whole of this has been expended, but the national debt has been increased $4,554,272 16. With an annual revenue of $1,690,711 more than was received under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, we have actually swelled our debt more rapidly than it was ever done in the most prodigal days of the Federal Administration. If, sir, it is intended to be profuse with the public money, I hope it will be backed at once with a bill for a direct tax of five or ten millions. Let the people see our drift. I am certain that they will, as in 1799 and 1800, come out and meet us on this subject. For a young nation so remote from danger, and one, too, who has so lately experienced a total loss of pecuniary credit in time of war, so soon to forget this; so soon to forget that economy, and the discharge of our debts in time of peace, are the only solid base for a good credit in time of war; and so soon, too, to forget those excellent lessons left us by that legislative body under the Administration of Thomas Jefferson, I think, augurs nothing favorable.

I hope, however, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will take no exceptions at what I have said; for I do not think that he has done any thing more than was required. He has reported to us a bill predicated upon the existing laws of his country. What less could he have done? If you will so continue the form of your laws as to keep up a large military establishment, do you expect that the Secretary of War will be able, without our assistance, to maintain them? If you will build 74s, and display them upon the ocean in time of peace, you cannot expect that the Secretary of the Navy, or any other Secretary, will do it at their own expense. And, though not exactly applicable, if you will swell this representative body, and pay us eight instead of six dollars a day, you must expect that these trifling items, as they have been called, will also swell the mass. From pennies, pounds are produced. From our inattention to these little insignificant sums, as they have been so sarcastically called, of $100,000, $200,000, $300,000, or $400,000 each, when they appear in the aggregate, astonishment will be produced, and suspicion but too often succeeds.

So, sir, it is not the fault of the Committee of Ways and Means. It is not the fault of the Executive part of this Government. We are a free and independent branch; let us do our duty, and if the others will not concur in altering a set of laws that have drained our Treasury, swelled our debt, and actually baffled the skill of our financier to furnish the means, let them be accountable to the proper authority—to the people.

Our course now, I hope, will be to recommit this bill, with instructions to bring in a partial appropriation bill, to answer the immediate exigencies of Government, and not to pass the general bill until after that select committee have reported, to whom was referred an inquiry into the modification of our laws, so as to place us upon the old Peace Establishment of 1808 and 1809. When that is done, and we have altered our laws, it will then be time enough to bring in a general bill predicated upon those laws.

After some further remarks from Mr. COCKE, the question was taken on the proposed recommitment, and decided in the negative—ayes 37.

The question then being on the passage of the bill, and Mr. RANDOLPH having required the yeas and nays thereon, (his leading objections being to the appropriation for clothing of the Army so far in advance as for 1823,) the yeas and nays were taken accordingly; and there were—for the bill 138; against it 23.

Christianization of Indians—Leave to withdraw the Papers.

Mr. METCALFE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved, on behalf of that committee, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the report of the Reverend Jedidiah Morse, made by him in pursuance of the objects specified in his commission from the President of the United States, bearing date the 7th of February, 1820, be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the said Reverend Jedidiah Morse have leave to withdraw the same, and also the accompanying documents.

The resolution was read, and, on the question to agree thereto, it passed in the affirmative.

Transactions in Florida—Mr. Archer's Resolutions.

Mr. ARCHER moved that the House do come to the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the appointment, during the past year, of a Governor of the provinces of East and West Florida, invested with larger powers than were "exercised by the officers of the existing government" of said provinces at the time of their delivery to the United States, was not authorized by the act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act for carrying into execution the treaty between the United States and Spain, concluded at Washington, the 22d of February, 1819."

2. Resolved, That the appointment of a Governor of the provinces of East and West Florida, with authority to exercise supreme executive powers within the same, was a contravention of the Constitution of the United States.

3. Resolved, That the arrest and imprisonment, in the month of August last, in Pensacola, in the province of West Florida, by order of the chief executive officer therein, of Don Jose Callava, then or recently charged with the functions and character of a Commissioner of the Government of Spain, were in contravention of the immunities attached to the condition of agents of a public character, by the law and usage of civilized nations.

4. Resolved, That the issuing, about the same time, by the same officer, of a citation, in the nature of a process of contempt, against a person holding the commission of a judge of the United States within the said province, for an alleged undue discharge of a judicial function, was a proceeding not warranted by any legal authority vested in the said officer.

Mr. ARCHER was proceeding to state the motives which induced him to offer the resolves; when

The question to consider the resolves (which admits of no debate) was put, and decided in the negative. So the House refused "now to consider" these resolutions.*

* And thus the House refused to "consider" the resolutions submitted by Mr. Archer, one of which declared a breach of the Constitution of the United States—the breach attaching itself to the "appointment" of a Governor with such extensive powers. This refusal corresponded with repeated other decisions by the House, coupled with expressions of regret from members that General Jackson had acted with so much energy; but, as to the right to do so, there was no question. The temporary act of 1821 authorized it; and, as for our constitution, it had no more application in Florida under that act, or by its own vigor, than the Koran had. Judge Fromentin planted himself upon the constitution, and was immediately shown his error by General Jackson, and afterwards by the Administration—to which he appealed. Callava presented the strongest case; and he was too well advised to have recourse to the constitution: he took position under the law of nations, and his character as Commissary of the King of Spain for the delivery of the province; and presented his case formally to the Executive Government through the Spanish Minister. From it he received the same answer which General Jackson had previously given, and which was as follows:

Mr. Adams to Don Joaquin de Anduaga, Minister from Spain, &c.

[EXTRACT.]

Far would it be from the intention of the American Government to draw within its rigorous limits the exemption from ordinary legal process of a foreign public officer. It would extend to them a liberal measure of time and a full portion of indulgence for the execution of the trust, and for departure after its completion. But it cannot perceive the justice of extending these privileges beyond their limits as sanctioned by custom, for purposes of injustice and wrong. And here we are led to the inquiry, what was the immediate occasion of the summons to Colonel Callava, his resistance against which prompted the subsequent rigorous measures, in reference to his person, house, and papers, complained of in the note of Mr. Salmon? He had withheld, and caused to be packed in boxes for transportation, public records, relating to the property of the province—judicial documents, indispensable for vindicating the titles to succession of infant and orphan children. Application was made to General Jackson, in behalf of those orphans, for the legal judicial process to obtain those papers. He had proof that they had been removed, after a summons from him to the person in whose possession they had been to produce them, to the house and possession of Colonel Callava, for the avowed purpose of abstracting them from the process issued by his authority. Had that officer's personal immunity been complete and unquestionable, what greater abuse of it could have been made than thus to wrest from the course of justice the vouchers on which depended the rights and the subsistence of orphans? General Jackson, considering that Colonel Callava was not entitled to such exemption from legal process, issued the ordinary summons which would have been applicable to any other individual; and, on his refusal to answer the interrogatories put to him, committed him, as others in like cases would have been committed, to prison. By the same order he issued a commission for securing the papers, which ought to have been delivered up before, with all suitable caution, to prevent the taking of any others, and, immediately after the satisfactory return of that commission, ordered the release of Colonel Callava. Such appears to have been the character of the transaction, upon the report of it made by General Jackson; and, although the President cannot but contemplate with unfeigned regret this occurrence, he thinks that blame should be imputed to the party deserving it, and whose misconduct produced it; and that it is a justice due to General Jackson to make him acquainted with the objections in the note of Mr. Salmon to his conduct, and to receive his full explanation of the motives and considerations which governed him.

In concluding this letter, I cannot forbear reminding you, sir, that not only this, but all the other transactions of a painful nature which have arisen in the execution of the treaty, and which it was hoped would have terminated all the differences, and have led to the now harmonious intercourse between the United States and Spain, have proceeded from the unjustifiable delays and evasions of His Catholic Majesty's officers, in direct contravention, as is understood, to his orders and intentions, in withholding proper, and Military Academy, for the years 1818, 1819, 1820, and 1821, and estimates for 1822, arranged under the various heads of expenditure, according to the present and former organization of the Department of War, made in the documents, archives, and vouchers, of which the delivery had been expressly stipulated—vouchers indispensable to the United States, both for the dispensation of private justice and for the establishment of public right, but utterly useless to Spain; and the detention of which, by the Captain General and Governor of Cuba, and by the Spanish Governors of both East and West Florida, however intended, and by whatever motive induced, can subvert no purposes but those of fraud, injustice, and oppression. After a succession of delays, for a period of six weeks at the Havana, in a climate noted for its unhealthiness to strangers, of the Commissioner of the United States authorized to receive those documents, and of the vessel which had conveyed him, he was compelled to depart without them, nor have they yet been delivered. The attempts to carry away, both from Pensacola and from St. Augustine, many of those papers, can be viewed in no other light than as flagrant violations of the treaty. The President relies that they will be so considered by His Catholic Majesty, and that he has ere this given the most positive and effectual orders for the faithful execution, in this respect, of that instrument. I pray you, &c.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.
*Don JOAQUIN DE ANDUAGA,
Envoy Extraordinary, &c.*

The following is Governor CALLAVA's own statement of his case, as furnished to the Spanish Minister, dated October 8, 1821:

On the 17th day of July last, (1821,) at ten o'clock in the morning, I delivered West Florida, which was that day under my charge as Governor, in which character he met me, to the commissary, Don Andrew Jackson, in a public act, held in the Government house. There he received from me all the archives and documents registered, and directly relative to the property and sovereignty of that province of Florida; and he received them by faithful and exact inventories, which had been compared with the documents by four persons, and had been certified to be correct. From the constitutional Spanish alcalde, and by my order, an alcalde named by Don Andrew Jackson received, by like inventories, all the criminal and civil causes of the suits of the neighborhood which are pending before the tribunal of the first instance, over which he presided, and also the notices and papers of its archives.

The day previous to these transactions, (the 31st of August,) three persons, dependents of Don Andrew Jackson, (George Walton, Esq., Secretary of West Florida; Henry M. Brackenridge, Esq., Alcalde for the City of Pensacola; and Mr. John Miller, Clerk of the County Court for the County of Escambia,) came to the house of the secretary, (Souza,) to be informed if he had in his possession some military testamentary dispositions, which they mentioned to him. Souza told them yes, and without reserve they were shown to them; and he informed them that if they wished for any thing, they should ask me. All the papers which he had in his charge were closely examined; they declared they would carry off those which they had pointed out to him, because they could not be in his possession as a private individual. Souza told them that he was not a private individual; that he was an officer depending on my commission and authority; and that he could not give them without my order. And finally they went away, leaving the papers. They demanded of him an answer in writing, which they obtained from Souza, on a second visit.

The following day, (the 2d,) in the morning, this officer (Souza) met me in the street. He informed me of the occurrence, and also told me that he had resolved to carry the boxes to my house, with all the papers which he had in his possession, and had delivered them to my steward, not having found me within; because he was afraid, from what he had observed in those people, that they might take them away from his house, and he wished to save himself from the responsibility. And I answered that it was well.

At four in the afternoon of the same day, and not much before, I was dining at the table of Colonel George M. Brooke, of the fourth regiment of the United States line, and of the garrison at Pensacola, by whom I had been invited, with all the Spanish officers residing there. The company consisted of Brooke, his wife, Judge Fromentin, the commander of the United States vessel of war Enterprise, Mr. Michael Kearney, the citizens Vicar Don James Coleman, Don John Innerarity, Don Juan de la Eua, Don Pedro obedience to the resolution of the 7th ultimo, which was committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The report is as follows:

de Alba, and Don Jose Noriega; and the officers Lieutenant Colonels Don Marcos de Villiers and Don Francisco Palmos; Captains Don Luis Guayare and Don Bernardo Prieto; Lieutenants Don Arnaldo Guillemard and Don Carlos de Villiers; and Sub-Lieutenants Don Mariano Latady and Don Jose Ignacio Cruzat, secretary of my Government.

Don Domingo Sousa presented himself to me there, with an officer of the United States, telling me that he was a prisoner; and that the reason was, that the three persons of the former day had returned to his house the day before, telling him that they came with orders from Governor Andrew Jackson to seize the papers; that, having informed them that he had that morning sent them to my house, they searched his house, and at last carried him to prison. And he related before the company what had occurred about the papers with the same persons the preceding day.

I immediately ordered my aide-de-camp, Don Bernardo Prieto, accompanied by Alba, who was the public interpreter, to present my compliments to Don Andrew Jackson, and to inform him that Sousa was in fact, as he had intimated, an individual of my commission, and was under my power and authority; and that he could not deliver the papers in question of himself; that he would have the goodness to ask me in writing for such as he might find it proper to claim; and if they were to be given by the regulation of the treaty, or other particular circumstances, I would deliver them to him by the same procedure which indispensable regularity dictated, as had been done with the other papers; or that he should have, in the same way, a distinct explanation of the reasons which prevented their delivery; and that every direct mode of conciliation should be sought, if there was any thing that could be of use to him in any way.

The aide-de-camp and interpreter brought back for answer that Sousa should go to prison, and that they should tell me that I should be put into another dungeon with him.

It appearing to me that Don Andrew Jackson had not been well informed of my message by the interpretation, (although the incident offended me and surprised those at table,) I made the same persons return and inform him a second time; and that gentleman repeated to them in a loud voice, in the presence of several persons, and upon the street balcony, the same thing, saying, Colonel Callava to the dungeon!

An occurrence so strange and abusive in the presence of those who surrounded me at table, a great part of whom were there as a greater compliment to me, and others my subordinates, could not but raise a blush in my face, and disorder my stomach in the very act of eating, and in the convalescent state in which I was; and I felt myself attacked by a deadly pain, (which I almost habitually suffered, and which had frequently attacked me on the preceding days;) notwithstanding, I concealed the circumstance so as to render it impossible to be discovered, that, upon quitting the table, I might go and reflect, for it was not known upon what such answers or occurrences rested.

We all left the table. Brooke's lady was very much grieved, and I was going to the street, when three persons presented themselves to me in Brooke's house, telling me, from Don Andrew Jackson, that they came for the papers which Sousa had carried to my house, or to carry me with them to Jackson's house; because the Governor, with his authority, could not respect me in any other light than as a private individual.

The officers went away to carry my answer, which was given then in the presence of all at Brooke's house; and I, feeling now a recurrence of my pain, requested them to permit me to go home, whither several of those persons accompanied me. As soon as I arrived, I caused my secretary to extend in my office all that I had said to the persons sent, and with him I sent Lieutenant Colonel De Villiers, accompanied by another officer, to the Governor, thinking that thus my answer might be more correctly understood by him; but, when it was presented he would not receive it, and they brought it back to me unopen.

After these officers returned to me, now at my own house, the same three persons came with a determined and brief message that I must not make any pretensions to official situation or other considerations—"the papers, or go with them." I was surrounded by my officers, and other persons of character, whose countenances I saw filled with pain and surprise to see me in the sad state of suffering, and unable to remain tranquil. Till then I knew not of what papers they spoke, as I had not entered upon an inquiry, nor had they given me an opportunity of doing so; and I answered

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 1, 1892.

SIR: Pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th ultimo, I have now the honor of submitting "a comparative view of the expenses them that I was unable to go out of my house. I entreated that they would, at least, give me an abstract of what papers and of what class those were which they demanded, and I would inform Don Andrew Jackson that I was sick.

Without giving me any answer, they went away, and I laid myself on the bed. An hour afterwards, one of the three presented himself in my house, and gave me an abstract, written on a half sheet of paper, in the English language, and signed "Alcalde Brackenridge." I took it; I told him that I should have it translated, and should reply to it. He went away. I gave it to the interpreter at that hour, which was nine at night, and sought repose on the bed; but, a while after, and without further preliminaries, a party of troops, with the commissioners, assaulted the house, breaking the fence, notwithstanding the door was open; and the commissioners entered my apartment; they surrounded my bed with soldiers with drawn bayonets in their hands; they removed the mosquito net; they made me sit up; and demanded "the papers, or they would use the arms against my person."

In fine, in a short while after, one of the three went out, and returned accompanied with an officer, who, placing himself before me, told me I was a prisoner, and ordered me to dress myself. I answered that I was so, but that he would have the goodness to observe that I was so sick as that I ought not to be taken out of my house at that hour. He made no answer to the interpreter, and remained silent; but one of three deliberately ordered me to dress. I dressed in my uniform, was going to put on my sword, but, upon reflection, thought it better to deliver it to the officer. I did so, and one of the three took it from his hand and threw it upon the chimney, and in this manner I was conducted through the streets among the troops.

They took me to a private house, in which they presented me to Don Andrew Jackson, who, with two other persons, was seated near a table; the house was filled with people of all ages and classes, and there he made me a sign to sit down, which I did. By the only interpreter who had hitherto delivered and carried back the verbal messages I have already mentioned, he put one question to me, according to my recollection, confined solely to whether certain papers had been carried to my house by Don Domingo Sousa, and delivered to my steward.

I requested him to permit me to answer in writing, and to do so with my own hand. He granted it readily. I set myself to write a regular protest, that I might go on to answer afterwards; but I had hardly begun when Don Andrew Jackson took the paper from before me, and, with much violence and furious gestures, spoke for some time, looking at the bystanders; and when he had concluded, the interpreter told me that he had ordered me to give no other answer to all that he had asked me but yes or no.

Don Andrew Jackson proceeded to speak for a considerable time, looking at the people, but speaking furiously; and in the countenances of the bystanders I perceived fear or surprise, caused by what he said. He concluded, and the interpreter told me that the Governor would not treat with me in any other way than as a private individual; this idea (which I knew not how to account for) made me catch at the word, and demand some explanations. Don Andrew Jackson did not permit me to speak. I insisted that the interpreter should translate what I said; he was sometimes about to do this, and he interrupted him at the very beginning; so that of all that he said in two hours, (and Don Andrew Jackson directed himself to me,) only the aforesaid intimation was translated to me, that I had not a word to answer but yes, or no, to what I should be asked, and that the Governor would not treat me in any other way than as a private individual.

I remained silent; they called my steward; they asked him if certain papers had been delivered to him by Sousa at my house? He answered, yes.

Don Andrew Jackson drew from among other papers one which was already written; he read it to me, and it contained the order for committing me and my steward to prison.

I got upon my feet; I begged the interpreter to ask him if he did not shudder, and was not struck with horror at insulting me; and I pronounced a solemn protest against his proceedings. The interpreter informed him, and he replied, that for what he had done he had no account to give but to his Government, and he told me that I might protest before God himself.

I was carried off to prison at twelve at night, and my steward also. I left my house open, with three or four sol-of the Army proper, and Military Academy, for the years 1818, 1819, 1820, 1821, and estimates for 1822, arranged under the various heads of expenditures according to the present and former organization of the Department of War." The military disbursements for the years 1816 and 1817, as explained by the letter from the Second Auditor, accompanying this report, are so blended with the arrearages of prior years, pay and subsistence of the militia, and claims of certain States and individuals, arising out of the late war, as to preclude the possibility of ascertaining the expenses of the army for those years, and so as to put it out of my power to embrace them in the comparative view called for; though it is believed, if it could be embraced in the comparison, the result would not vary materially from that founded on the expenditure of the year 1818, in which year a separation was made, for the first time, between the current expenses of the army, and the arrearages growing out of the expenditures of the late war.

of the United States troops in it. I left all my private papers, all the official correspondence of my Government, and what was under my charge officially, without any account, at the discretion of Don Andrew Jackson. The keys of my trunks and money chests were not removed. I left in my house no person to represent me, and who was in my confidence; and, lastly, by a respectable citizen of the United States, and my officers, at two in the morning, a coach was spread for me and my other assistants to throw ourselves down upon; (for, by Don Andrew Jackson, I was permitted to throw myself, sick as I was, upon the bricks of the prison;) when, afterwards, I was informed by various persons who understood the Spanish and English languages, that the matters above related, which had been conceived against me, and were not translated by the interpreter, consisted in having endeavored to persuade the people that the papers were taken from the office of the alcalde, and that I was an accomplice in that criminal action.

At eleven in the morning of the following day, (the 23d,) Judge Eligius Fromentin issued a writ of habeas corpus for the release of my person; and Don Andrew Jackson answered that it was not proper to carry it into execution; but, on the same day, at one in the afternoon, he gave order that an officer should inform me that I was released from prison, and might be accompanied by him to my house to examine if the boxes were sealed.

I replied to the person who communicated this to me that I could not enter it unless accompanied by a judge, who might be present, and certify to the situation in which all things in it were found, since I had been dragged from it, leaving every thing to their discretion.

The officer accompanied me into the presence of Judge Fromentin, whom we found sick. I related to him what had happened, and entreated him to afford the protection of the law to my prerogative, person, and house. He informed me that he could not assist me, because his situation rendered it impossible; but he would cause witnesses to accompany me, who should make the examination, and sign it.

I went thither with the officer and many other persons: it was found open, with three or four soldiers within; the papers of official correspondence scattered upon the table, and the covers open; one box, which was left shut, and sealed with the seal of my Government, had been burst open, the seals broken, and again shut, with different seals; and nothing was found wrong in the contents of the money chest. I had not time to examine the papers, nor could I do it, because I was too much indisposed.

On the 26th day of the same month, about half past three in the afternoon, the secretary of the Government of Don Andrew Jackson delivered to mine the testimony which I had asked on the night of the 23d; and early in the morning of the following day, (the 27th,) sick as I was, I set out with my secretary for Washington, to give an account to the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty near the Government of the United States, leaving without my power and authority in Pensacola what was under my charge belonging to the nation of which I am a dependent, because in me all confidence and every law of nations had been violated by the authority now existing there.

THE CASE OF VIDAL'S HEIRS.

There were several cases, all judicial and affecting the rights of persons, in which the ex-Governor retained the papers to carry away; but the one which was the immediate existing cause of the strong proceedings against Callava, his secretary, Sousa, his major domo, Fullarat, and Judge Fromentin, was that of the heirs of Vidal. The case was this: Don Nicholas Maria Vidal had been an officer of the Spanish Government, an auditor of war; and died at Pensacola in 1807, leaving considerable property, and four children, minors, and all girls—the offspring of a connection with a quadroon woman—of course illegitimate. The property he gave by will to these children, and during fourteen years that had elapsed since his death, they had not been able to obtain possession of any part of it. Claims were set up against the estate, and suits instituted, and sales made, and the proceeds went into the hands of the strong house of Forbes and Company, and John Innerarity, as depositaries; and who proved, in one respect, to be very safe depositaries, as the heirs could get nothing from them. Great illegalities and frauds had been committed in the proceedings against the estate—so flagrant in one instance that the sale of 16,000 acres of land, twice made, had been twice set aside for fraud; and once by Callava himself acting as judge. Property sold in New Orleans, and other places, brought nothing to the children: the proceeds went into the hands of the depositaries, and although decrees were repeatedly made, ordering them to account with the heirs, yet every decree remained without execution. This was the state of the case when the Floridas changed hands, and the Americans arrived to supersede the Spanish authorities. The Vidal estate, so far as the heirs and the depositaries were concerned, remained as it had done for fourteen years—the depositaries, and some claimants, the whole beneficiaries of the estate; the heirs, aliens to their father's property. And now, a new feature of oppression developed itself. The records of the case were to be carried off by Callava! By the treaty all the archives of the province, and all evidences of titles and judicial proceedings, were to be delivered up to the American authorities; and the greater part were so delivered. But the papers in this case of Vidal, and some others, formed an exception; and were retained by the Governor to be carried to the Havannah. If this was done, there was an end of justice to the children of Vidal. They heard what was to be done: they applied to American lawyers: and they brought the case before General Jackson, as the supreme judicial authority of Florida. He took cognizance of it—found all the statements made to him to be true; and immediately instituted those proceedings for the recovery of the papers which led to the arrest of Domingo Sousa, Fullarat, Callava, Fromentin, and others. The design of all these arrests was to coerce the delivery of the papers, which being accomplished, the arrested and imprisoned persons were set at liberty, and the cause regularly proceeded with before Governor Jackson in his supreme judicial capacity, and justice done to the heirs of Vidal. In the United States, where people are accustomed to the regular administration of justice, the summary and energetic proceedings of General Jackson appeared to be harsh, and even lawless; but they were all justified by the Administration, and sanctioned by the negative action of Congress; and in Florida, where they took place, and where it was seen that no wealth or power could screen the oppressor; and that governors, judges, and rich merchants were laid by the heels, like common offenders; and the protecting shield of law and justice thrown over the most humble and helpless: in this province, so long a prey to oppression and corruption, the conduct of General Jackson appeared like an emanation of divine justice, greatly exalting the American character.

Table A, accompanying this report, is the statement of the Second Auditor, and exhibits a view of the expenditures of the Army proper, including the Military Academy, from the year 1818 to 1821, inclusive; from which it appears that the expenditures, after deducting for the increased expense, on account of the Seminole War, in 1818, were, respectively, for those years, $3,702,495 04, $3,874,781 95, $316,414 11, and $2,180,093 53; adding to the expenditure of the last year the arrearages of the Quartermaster's department, and subtracting the expenditure incident to the reducing the Military Establishment in June last, the estimate for the expenditure of the year 1822, including the balances of such of the appropriations of the last year as are required for the service of this, amount to $1,800,424 85.

Table B, is an abstract of the general returns of the Army, for the years 1818, 1819, 1820, and 1821, showing the number of officers and enlisted men, as reported by the last returns received at the Adjutant General's office, together with the academic staff and military school at West Point, to which is added the number of the Military Establishment, by the present organization, for the year 1822. From the exhibit in the table, it appears that the average strength of the Army, including officers and cadets, for the year 1818, was 8,199; for 1819, 8,428; for 1820, 9,693; for 1821, 8,109; and that, from the organization of the present Military Establishment, if the rank and file are kept full, the strength, for 1822, will amount to 6,442.

It also appears, from the same table, that the commissioned officers were, in proportion to the cadets and rank and file of the army, in service, for those years, thus:

In 1818, as	-	-	-	1 to 11.75.
In 1819, as	-	-	-	1 to 12.11.
In 1820, as	-	-	-	1 to 13.57.
In 1821, as	-	-	-	1 to 12.18.
In 1822, as	-	-	-	1 to 10.25.

Table C, exhibits the result of the comparative view of the expenditures of the army for the years 1818, 1819, 1820, and 1821, and estimates of expenditures for 1822. To illustrate distinctly the operations of the present system, in controlling the disbursements of the army, through the instrumentality of a proper organized staff, the items composing the expenditures of the army have been classed under two divisions, viz:

First. Those which are fixed by law, and which cannot be materially affected by administration; such as, pay to the officers and men, subsistence to the former, and the allowance to them for servants, forage, transportation for baggage, &c.

Secondly. Those items which are embraced under the general character of supplies for the army, and which may be reduced by correct administration; such as, subsistence to soldiers, clothing, Quartermaster's and medical stores. As most of the articles embraced under the above denomination, are exposed to fluctuate in price, and a considerable reduction took place in the medical, subsistence, and clothing supplies, within the periods compared, proper allowances have been made on that account, amounting, in the price of provisions, from forty to thirty-nine and a half per centum, and, in that of clothing and medical stores, from seven to eight and a half per centum. The contracts made by the different departments, and the price currents for those years, in the principal cities, have been the guides in fixing on those allowances. To the Quartermaster's disbursements no additions have been made, as any reduction which may have taken place in the price of supplies furnished by that department, has been more than balanced by the increased expenditures to which it has been subject from the extension and multiplication of the frontier posts.

From table C, it appears that the expenditures of the army, (additions being made as above stated, for the reduction in prices of stores and supplies in the years subsequent to 1818, so as to raise the prices of those years to the standard of those of that year,) would amount to—

In 1818	-	-	-	$3,702,495 04
In 1819	-	-	-	3,663,785 16
In 1820	-	-	-	3,061,884 00
In 1821	-	-	-	2,327,552 13
And by estimates for 1822	-	-	-	1,929,179 91

From the above data and average strength of each year, conformably to an abstract of the general returns of the army, it results that the average cost of the army, for each individual, taking the aggregate of the officers, professors of the Military Academy, cadets, and enlisted men, in the service of the United States was—

For the year 1818:

In expenditures, not materially affected by administration, on an average, each	-	$151 98
Its expenditures which may be affected by administration, on an average, each	-	299 64
Total average cost for officers and enlisted men, &c., each	-	$451 57

For the year 1819.

In expenditures of the first class, each	-	$158 72
In expenditures of the second class, each	-	275 98
Total average cost, each	-	$434 70

For the year 1820.

In expenditures of the first class, each	-	$140 45
In expenditures of the second class, each	-	178 43
Total average cost, each	-	$315 88

For the year 1821.

In expenditures of the first class, each	-	$136 63
In expenditures of the second class, each	-	150 40
Total average cost	-	$287 02

For the year 1822.

Conformably to estimates, of the first class, each	-	$155 30
Conformably to estimates, of the second class, each	-	144 16
Total average cost, each	-	$299 46

From the above, it appears that there has been an actual annual reduction in the average expense of each officer and soldier in the service—

In the year 1819, of	-	$16 87 each.
In the year 1820, of	-	135 69 each.

Spanish American Provinces.

[H. OF R.]

In the year 1821, of - - - 164 55 each.
And by estimates for 1822, of - 158 11 each.

The act of Congress for organizing the general staff, agreeably to its present formation, was not approved until the 14th of April, 1818; and the change in the system for controlling the disbursements of the army, under the superintendence of the chiefs of each department located at Washington, could not be sufficiently matured before the close of the year 1819; which, with the additional expense to which the Quartermaster's department was unavoidably subjected in the year 1819, from occupying advanced military posts on the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers, will account for the comparatively little reduction in the expenditure in that year.

The expenditure for the year 1822, compared with the aggregate of individuals composing the Military Establishment, though favorable as contrasted with the expenses of 1818, 1819, and 1820, is not so with 1821. This difference is accounted for from the present organization of the Military Establishment, the officers being in larger proportion to the rank and file than under the former organization. But, if we should suppose the proportion to be the same, the comparison, founded on the estimates for 1822, would be more favorable in its results than in the expenditures of the preceding year. From table C, it further appears that the army for the year 1818, being 8,199 strong, including general staff, professors of the Military Academy, cadets, and enlisted men, cost for that year $3,702,495 04; and that for the same numerical force, at the rate of expenditures in 1818, would have cost—

For the year 1819	-	-	$3,564,105	80
For the year 1820	-	-	2,589,900	12
For the year 1821	-	-	2,853,276	98
And on the estimates for 1822	-	-	2,465,272	51

After making an allowance for the difference in prices of articles of supplies, as above stated, the results in favor of the latter years are, respectively, $183,389 74, $1,112,594 92, $1,349,218, and $1,247,222 50.

HON. PHILIP P. BARBOUR,

Speaker House of Representatives U. S.

WEDNESDAY, March 6.

Case of Judge Tait.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him, by Edwin Lewis, of Alabama, complaining of alleged official misconduct on the part of Charles Tait, district judge of the United States for the district of Alabama.

The letter was read.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to refer the letter, with the documents enclosed in it, to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, objected to the reference, as giving too much importance to the complaints of a person, who had heretofore laid before the House charges against Judge Toulmin, and failed to substantiate them. He subsequently withdrew his opposition, and acceded to the reference.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, said he had prepared a resolve on the subject, which he supposed would meet the views of the gentleman from North Carolina, viz: That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the official conduct of Judge Tait, &c.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that such a resolution would give a very different aspect from that of a mere reference of the papers to the Judiciary Committee, and he was, therefore, opposed to it. Let the papers be sent, as now moved, said Mr. W., to the Judiciary Committee, and they will come, I have no doubt, to a very correct conclusion on the subject.

Mr. TRIMBLE suggested that it would not look well to be more anxious to inquire into cases of controversy between citizens and judges than between generals and judges: and thought General Jackson's case had better be referred along with Mr. Lewis's to the same committee.

The question of a reference to the Judiciary Committee, of the papers presented by the Speaker, was then agreed to without opposition.

FRIDAY, March 8.

Spanish American Provinces.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In transmitting to the House of Representatives the documents called for by the resolution of that House, of the 30th January, I consider it my duty to invite the attention of Congress to a very important subject, and to communicate the sentiments of the Executive on it, that, should Congress entertain similar sentiments, there may be such co-operation between the two departments of the government, as their respective rights and duties may require.

The revolutionary movement in the Spanish provinces in this hemisphere, attracted the attention and excited the sympathy of our fellow-citizens from its commencement. This feeling was natural and honorable to them, from causes which need not be communicated to you. It has been gratifying to all to see the general acquiescence which has been manifested in the policy which the constituted authorities have deemed it proper to pursue in regard to this contest. As soon as the movement assumed such a steady and consistent form as to make the success of the provinces probable, the rights to which they were entitled by the law of nations, as equal parties to a civil war, were extended to them. Each party was permitted to enter our ports with its public and private ships, and to take from them every article which was the subject of commerce with other nations. Our citizens, also, have carried on commerce with both parties, and the Government has protected it, with each, in articles not contraband of war. Through the whole of this contest the United States have remained neutral, and have fulfilled with the utmost impartiality, all the obligations incident to that character.

This contest has now reached such a stage, and been attended with such decisive success on the part of the provinces, that it merits the most profound consideration, whether their right to the rank of independent nations, with all the advantages incident to it, in their intercourse with the United States, is not complete. Buenos Ayres assumed that rank by a formal declaration in 1816, and has enjoyed it since 1810 free from invasion by the parent country. The provinces composing the Republic of Colombia, after having separately declared their independence, were united by a fundamental law of the 17th of December, 1819. A strong Spanish force occupied, at that time, certain parts of the territory within their limits, and waged a destructive war. That force has since been repeatedly defeated, and the whole of it either made prisoners or destroyed, or expelled from the country, with the exception of an inconsiderable portion only, which is blockaded in two fortresses. The provinces on the Pacific have likewise been very successful. Chili declared independence in 1818, and has since enjoyed it undisturbed; and of late, by the assistance of Chili and Buenos Ayres, the revolution has extended to Peru. Of the movement in Mexico our information is less authentic, but it is, nevertheless, distinctly understood, that the new Government has declared its independence, and that there is now no opposition to it there, or force to make any. For the last three years the Government of Spain has not sent a single corps of troops to any part of that country; nor is there any reason to believe it will send any in future. Thus, it is manifest, that all those provinces are not only in the full enjoyment of their independence, but, considering the state of the war and other circumstances, that there is not the most remote prospect of their being deprived of it.

When the result of such a contest is manifestly settled, the new Governments have a claim to recognition by other powers, which ought not to be resisted. Civil wars too often excite feelings which the parties cannot control. The opinion entertained by other powers as to the result, may assuage those feelings and promote an accommodation between them useful and honorable to both. The delay which has been observed in making a decision on this important subject, will, it is presumed, have afforded an unequivocal proof to Spain, as it must have done to other powers, of the high respect entertained by the United States for her rights, and of their determination not to interfere with them. The provinces belonging to this hemisphere are our neighbors, and have, successively, as each portion of the country acquired its independence, pressed their recognition by an appeal to facts not to be contested, and which they thought gave them a just title to it. To motives of interest this Government has invariably disclaimed all pretension, being resolved to take no part in the controversy, or other measure in regard to it, which should not merit the sanction of the civilized world. To other claims a just sensibility has been always felt, and frankly acknowledged, but they, in themselves, could never become an adequate cause of action. It was incumbent on this Government to look to every important fact and circumstance on which a sound opinion could be formed, which has been done. When we regard, then, the great length of time which this war has been prosecuted, the complete success which has attended it in favor of the provinces, the present condition of the parties, and the utter inability of Spain to produce any change in it, we are compelled to conclude that its fate is settled, and that the provinces which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognized.

Of the views of the Spanish Government on this subject, no particular information has been recently received. It may be presumed that the successful progress of the revolution, through such a long series of years, gaining strength, and extending annually in every direction, and embracing, by the late important events, with little exception, all the dominions of Spain south of the United States, on this continent, placing thereby the complete sovereignty over the whole in the hands of the people, will reconcile the parent country to an accommodation with them, on the basis of their unqualified independence. Nor has any authentic information been recently received of the disposition of other powers respecting it. A sincere desire has been cherished to act in concert with them in the proposed recognition, of which several were some time past duly apprised, but it was understood that they were not prepared for it. The immense space between those powers, even those which border on the Atlantic, and these provinces, makes the movement an affair of less interest and excitement to them than to us. It is probable, therefore, that they have been less attentive to its progress than we have been. It may be presumed, however, that the late events will dispel all doubt of the result.

In proposing this measure, it is not contemplated to change thereby, in the slightest manner, our friendly relations with either of the parties, but to observe, in all respects, as heretofore, should the war be continued, the most perfect neutrality between them. Of this friendly disposition, an assurance will be given to the Government of Spain, to whom it is presumed it will be, as it ought to be, satisfactory. The measure is proposed, under a thorough conviction that it is in strict accord with the law of nations; that it is just and right as to the parties; and that the United States owe it to their station and character in the world, as well as to their essential interests to adopt it. Should Congress concur in the view herein presented, they will doubtless see the propriety of making the necessary appropriations for carrying it into effect.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1822.

[Accompanying the Message of the President of the United States was the following report:]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, March 7, 1822.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 20th of January last, requesting the President of the United States to lay before that House such communications as might be in the possession of the Executive from the agent of the United States, with the Governments south of the United States which have declared their independence; and the communications from the agents of such Governments in the United States, with the Secretary of State, as tend to show the political condition of their Governments, and the state of war between them and Spain, as it might be consistent with the public interest to communicate, has the honor of submitting to the President the papers required by that resolution.

The communications from the agents of the United States are only those most recently received, and exhibiting their views of the actual condition of the several South American revolutionary Governments.

Report on Weights and Measures.

[H. OF R.]

No communication has yet been received from Mr. Prevost since his arrival at Lima.

There has been hitherto no agent of the United States in Mexico; but among the papers herewith submitted is a letter recently received from a citizen of the United States, who has been some years residing there, containing the best information in possession of the Government, concerning the late revolution in that country, and specially of the character embraced by the resolution of the House.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

Mr. CONDIT moved to refer the Message, and documents accompanying it, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. RHEA preferred that they should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. F. JONES, and Mr. LOWNDES, preferred that the reference should be made to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the course most conformable to custom, and in itself the most proper. The first named of these gentlemen expressed his great satisfaction in having received such a Message, and his regret that it had not been sent earlier.

The question to refer the papers to a Committee of the Whole was negatived; and they were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On the question to print the documents, Mr. COOK supported that motion. The papers, he said, had a close bearing on the subject, and were from official sources. Not having himself that intuitive knowledge of the subject which some gentlemen seemed to possess, he wished these documents to be printed, that he might have an opportunity of examining them.

The Message and documents were both ordered to be printed. The question was stated on printing five thousand copies of the Message—when, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, (at six o'clock nearly,) the House adjourned.

National Medals.

Mr. POINSETT, from the Joint Library Committee, made the following report:

"The Committee on the Library of Congress, to which was referred a letter from Mr. George W. Erving, announcing that he had transmitted to the Speaker of this House a collection of medals, coined in commemoration of some of the most important military successes of France, under its republican Government, and under that of Napoleon; as well as those marking less important epochs in the history of that empire, together with the only medals coined in that country relating to the events of our Revolution, and requesting, through him, to present this collection to the Library of Congress, have agreed to report:

"That, from a letter addressed to the honorable Mr. Dickerson, of the Senate, by the collector of the port of New York, it appears that the medals were shipped at Havre, on board the brig Factor, in the Summer of 1810, bound to New York, which vessel has not since been heard of, and is supposed to have foundered at sea.

"The loss of this very valuable collection of medals is the more to be regretted, as there is reason to believe that the dies from which they were struck have been since destroyed, and these medals are now, therefore, extremely rare and costly.

"The committee recommend that they be authorized to purchase, for the Library, the medals struck in France relating to the events of our Revolution, and which may still be bought at the Mint, in Paris.

"The practice, so general in Europe, of multiplying medals struck in commemoration of great events, and of important epochs in the annals of a nation, ought, in the opinion of the committee, to be adopted in this country. This would enable the public libraries and individuals throughout the United States to acquire all the medals which have been struck in commemoration of events of our Revolution, and of our late naval and military successes. They, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the Director of the Mint be, and he is hereby, instructed to cause a reasonable number of the medals commemorative of important events in the history of the United States to be coined, at such times as shall not interfere with the ordinary business of the Mint, and to be sold at a price adequate to defray the expenses of coining."

The report was read, and committed to a committee of the whole House on Monday next.

MONDAY, March 11.

Report on Weights and Measures.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the select committee, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State on weights and measures, made the following report, which was committed to a Committee of the Whole, with the resolutions:

The committee to whom has been referred "the report on weights and measures," made by the Secretary of State, on the 22d of February, 1821, report:

That so comprehensive a view has been given, in the documents referred to them, of the origin and history of the measures and weights now in use in the United States, and so full an examination of the different proposals which have been made for their improvement, that they deem it scarcely necessary to do more than to submit the resolutions which they think it expedient that Congress should pass at this time. Their object is only to "render uniform and stable the measures and weights which we at present possess."

To effect this, they propose that the President shall cause application to be made to the English Government to allow models of the yard, the Winchester bushel, wine, gallon, and pound, (avoirdupois,) to be procured from its offices. For the purpose of easy and perfect comparison, it may be as well that the yard should be traced upon the rod of platina in the possession of the Department of State, on which is traced the French metre. These models should be made with the utmost accuracy which the art and science of England can give, and, if satisfactory to Congress, should be declared the standard yard, bushel, liquid gallon, and pound, of the United States. There is some difference of opinion as to the material of which the standards shall be formed. The committee will not detain the House by a full exposition of the reasons which led them to conclude, that, at least, the standards of length and weight should be of platina, as the material on which time is found to produce the smallest change. The Secretary of State, who adopts an opposite opinion, has said that "the very extraordinary properties of platina, its unequalled specific gravity, its infusibility, its durability, its powers of resistance against all the ordinary agents of destruction and change, give it advantages and claims to employment as a primary standard for weights and measures and coins, to which no other substance in nature has equal pretensions. Should the fortunate period arrive when the improvement in the moral and political condition of man will admit of the introduction of one universal standard for the use of all mankind, it is hoped and believed, that the platina metre will be that standard." But, if the immutability of platina recommend it so strongly as a standard for all nations and all time, it can hardly be amiss to adopt it for the interval which may elapse before the universal adoption of a national standard. This interval the Secretary and the committee may be willing to shorten, but it seems likely to last as long as diversities of laws and language among men. If the standard pound shall be of platina, it must, of course, be made equiponderant with the English pound in vacuo, and the same means must be used in making the models of weight which are intended for distribution among the States. The standards of measures of capacity must, probably, be of copper or brass, and the careful preservation of all the standards may be provided for in the law which shall establish them. The committee think it best that they should be kept in the Department of State, and used only to verify the models which may be issued under the authority of Government.

The committee believe that, by distributing accurate copies of these standards among the States, the present inequality of weights and measures will be so far removed as to leave little practical inconvenience in that regard. They propose that the President shall cause to be procured such a number of copies or models of these standards of weight and measure (with their most convenient multiples and divisions) as may be necessary to allow one model of each standard to be lodged with the clerk of each district court of the United States, and one to be given to each State and Territory, to be disposed of as its Legislature may direct. The most convenient material for those copies will probably be copper or brass, but the determination of this question may best be referred to the authority which shall procure them.

It is believed that no other obligation will be required to enforce, on the part of the officers in the service of the United States, the use of weights and measures conformed to the standards established by law, than that which a sense of duty and a dependence upon the Government for their continuance in office must produce. The committee think it best, that Congress, after providing the standards of weights and measures, and furnishing models of them to every State, should leave it to the laws of the several States to enforce their use by persons who are not in the service of the United States. In the custom-house and land offices, the measures and weights may be provided from the same funds, and under the same authority, which have been hitherto employed. The committee suppose it necessary only to provide for such a distribution of models as may make it easy to verify the weights and measures which may be used either by public officers, or in private transactions. It was proposed by a former committee of the House of Representatives, in a report made in January, 1819, that the relations between the different standards should be accurately ascertained and declared in the law which should establish them.

It was observed, that "the determination of the proportions between lineal measures and measures of capacity, and between both these and weights, may have some effect in enabling us to detect, without too difficult a process, the defects of measures of capacity, and possibly of weights in common use. For this purpose it would perhaps be convenient to establish, not merely the cubical contents of the common measures of capacity, but to fix determinate forms for all these, and dimensions whose correctness might be ascertained by the common measures of length." But the relations between the standards cannot be ascertained with that absolute certainty which should be exacted in a law fixing permanent standards. The calculation of the dimensions of vessels of capacity is found, even by the most practical artists, to be so uncertain, that they rely entirely upon the trials by the weight of water which they contain. It is of some importance, that the forms of measures of capacity, which are used in commerce, should be left to depend upon the material, or the art which it is found most convenient in the different parts of our country to employ. And, in fine, those relations and dimensions which it is useful to know, will be ascertained by philosophical inquiry, and published in books of easy reference. Indeed, they have been so.

The committee have proposed to establish but one standard of weight. It will be necessary that accurate models of the grain and its usual multiples, should be provided to verify the weights which are used for the precious metals and for medicine. The law which shall establish the standard pound, may declare the grain to be the seven thousandth part of the pound, as frequent and careful examination has shown it to be.

The committee submit the following resolutions:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested (if the consent of the Government of Great Britain shall be given thereto) to cause to be traced on a rod of platina, the yard of the year 1601, which is kept in the British Exchequer; to cause to be made of platina a pound, of the weight in vacuo of the English avoirdupois pound; and that he also cause to be made, of whatsoever material he shall deem best for standards of those measures, a vessel of the same capacity as the standard Winchester bushel, and also a vessel of the same capacity as the standard wine gallon of England.

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be made, for distribution among the States and Territories, and for the purpose of verifying the weights and measures used therein, models of the yard, on which shall be traced its divisions of feet and inches; models of the bushel, half-bushel, quarter-bushel, or peck, thirty-second part of a bushel or quart; models of the wine gallon, of the wine quart and pint; models of the pound, half-pound, quarter-pound, of the sixteenth of a pound or ounce; of the seven thousandth part of a pound or grain; models of the pennyweight or twenty-four grains, of the scruple or twenty grains; and, of the apothecaries' dram or sixty grains; models of the weight of twelve and a half pounds, of twenty-five pounds, of fifty pounds, and of one hundred pounds; that these models of weight and measure be formed with the utmost practical exactness from the weight and measures procured under the authority of the foregoing resolution, and that the number to be procured of each model shall not exceed —.

TUESDAY, March 12.

A new member, to wit, from the State of New York, STEPHEN VAN RENSSELAER, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Solomon Van Rensselaer, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a certificate of the election of STEPHEN VAN RENSSELAER, as one of the Representatives of the State of New York; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Hemp and Flax Machine.

Mr. BUTLER, from the Committee on Agriculture, made a report favorable to the petition of Anthony Dey and James McDonald, praying for encouragement by Congress of their invention for the breaking and dressing flax and hemp, &c., recommending a reference of the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary, with a view to an examination on the bearing of the patent laws; which was agreed to. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the petition of Anthony Dey and James McDonald, report: The petition alleges, that the said McDonald, at the expense of the said Dey, has invented and constructed a new and useful machine for breaking and cleaning of hemp and flax, in an unrotted state, and that the said Dey has discovered the means by which hemp and flax, after being cleaned in an unrotted state in their machine, may be bleached by a process hitherto unknown; that they believe their method of dressing hemp and flax is of very great importance to the agricultural interest of the country, and, therefore, ask an extension of the exclusive right to make, construct, use, and vend, to others to be used, the said invention and discovery.

From the evidence adduced by the petitioners, it appears that they have invented a machine for breaking and cleaning hemp and flax, in an unrotted state, which is different in its principles and construction from any machine that ever has been used for that purpose, and that the said Dey has also discovered a process, never before used, for bleaching hemp and flax after it has been dressed in an unrotted state. And, also, it appears by the certificates of respectable gentlemen, who have witnessed the operation of the machine, that it will, by the power of one horse, with the assistance of one man and three boys, separate the integument and wood from the fibrous part of the hemp and flax plants, and clean the same, at the rate of one pound in a fraction of time over a minute, fit for bleaching.

The petitioners further assure us, from the operation of one machine by horse power, with the attendance of one man and three boys, from 1,600 to 2,000 pounds of unrotted hemp or flax may be cleaned in a day, yielding from 400 to 500 pounds after it is bleached; and that, by the addition of another machine, which can be moved by the same horse, with the addition of one man and one boy more, from 800 to 1,000 pounds may be cleaned at an expense not exceeding five dollars. And the committee are informed by Mr. Dey that one man can bleach 850 pounds of hemp or flax, after it has been cleaned by their machine in a day, at an expense of one dollar and seventy-five cents for the article which he uses in the process.

From these calculations, it appears that any quantity of unrotted hemp or flax taken from the field, where it is raised, may be broke, cleaned, and bleached, at a rate of less than two cents per pound, delivered in a bleached state; and, allowing one cent per pound for the plant, as it comes from the field, the whole cost (except for the wear of the machines,) in growing this valuable plant, and breaking, cleaning, and bleaching it, will be less than six cents per pound. The committee are not informed what the cost of hatchelling or combing it, (which is done after it is bleached,) and preparing it for the manufacturer, would be, but presume it will not exceed two cents per pound. If the information the committee have received, and their calculations, are correct, either hemp or flax may be raised, dressed, and prepared for the best manufacture, at an expense of eight cents, and not exceeding, in any case, ten cents per pound.

By the experiments of the petitioners, and others, it is found that flax, dressed and hatchelled in the ordinary way, after it has been dew-rotted, yields nine pounds from one hundred pounds of the plant which has been rotted, being sixteen pounds less than is produced from one hundred pounds of unrotted flax, cleaned and bleached by the method which the petitioners have discovered. But no experiments have yet been made to determine the difference in the weight of the plant, before and after it is rotted; therefore, it cannot now be ascertained how much will be saved, in quantity, by this method of breaking and cleaning it before it is rotted. It cannot, however, be doubted, that the common process of rotting flax, especially by dew, destroys or injures many of its fibres, and, of course, the quality, as well as the quantity, must be, in some degree, diminished.

The committee have examined the machine, and have seen it operate, and believe it will prove one of the most important and valuable discoveries. The committee have, also, examined the hemp and flax which has been bleached in this new method and hatchelled, and find that the colored matter and harshness of the fibres are removed, and that the flax is rendered very white, and as soft and fine as silk. This method of bleaching hemp and flax, it is believed, will be of great value to the grower and manufacturer of these plants.

Considering hemp and flax among the most valuable plants which can be cultivated in this country, and believing there is an abundance of soil in every State in the Union which is well adapted to their culture and growth, the committee are highly pleased with the invention and discovery of the petitioners. If hemp and flax can be raised in this country as easily and as cheap as in any other, and these inventions should prove as valuable as the committee believe they may, the cultivation of these plants will engage the attention of a large portion of the agriculturists, and become exceedingly important to the United States. It may be seen by the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the quantity and value of merchandise imported, that, during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1821, 86,192 cwt. of hemp, valued at $510,489, (being about $120 per ton;) hempen goods, of the value of $226,174; duck and sheeting, of the value of $894,276; cordage, of the value of $107,868; and linens, bleached and unbleached, of the value of $2,564,159, were imported into this country, amounting to $4,802,968, and that the whole value of the exports of domestic and foreign produce of the same kind, amounted only to $822,976, leaving the value of $3,479,187 in the merchandise produced from the hemp and flax plants to be consumed in this country.

As the petitioners desire an extension of time, and further protection than is secured by the patent law in its present form, and as it is the peculiar province of the Committee on the Judiciary to report any revision or amendment of that law which may be deemed necessary, your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Anthony Dey and James McDonald, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Bankrupt Bill, amended so as to include all Persons, whether Traders, or not; and the Question being upon Ordering the Bill to be Engrossed for a Third Reading,

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Before the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky had obtained the sanction of this House, the question whether the bill should be engrossed for a third reading, was one of very great importance. That question has, however, dwindled into insignificance, compared with the one at present under consideration. We are now called upon to decide the fate of a measure of awful importance. The most dreadful responsibility rests upon us. We are not now to determine, merely, whether a bankrupt law shall be extended to the trading classes of the community; but whether it shall embrace every citizen of this Union, and spread its demoralizing influence over the whole surface of society.

The amendment which has been adopted to-day, makes it my imperative duty, even at this protracted period of the debate, to trespass upon the patience of the House. I have the honor, in part, of representing an honest, a wealthy, and a respectable agricultural community. I owe it to them, to my conscience, and to my God, not to suffer this bill to pass, which I conceive to be now fraught with destruction to their best interests, both moral and political, without entering my solemn protest against its provisions.

We have heard it repeated over and over again, by the friends of a bankrupt bill, that it should be confined to the mercantile classes. One of the principal arguments urged in its favor, by its eloquent supporters, was, that merchants, from the nature of their pursuits, were exposed to the vicissitudes of fortune more than other men; and that therefore their situation required a peculiar system of laws. That, in this country, their fortunes had not only been exposed to the dangers commonly incident to their profession; but, that the commercial regulations of the Government, the embargo, the non-intercourse laws, and finally the war, had brought ruin upon thousands. It was, therefore, inferred, that Congress were under a moral obligation to pass a bankrupt law for their relief.

The policy of all the modern commercial nations in the world, was presented before us for our imitation. England, France, Scotland, Ireland, Holland, and Spain, we had been told, each extended a bankrupt law to the merchant, and absolved him from the payment of his debts, upon certain conditions. Indeed, a great portion of the argument consisted in drawing a line of distinction between traders and the remaining classes of society.

Judge then, Mr. Speaker, of my astonishment, when to-day I found those very gentlemen voting in favor of introducing an amendment, extending the provisions of this bill to every individual in society, who might ask to become its object.

Will you pass a bankrupt law for the farmer? Will you teach that vast body of your best citizens to disregard the faith of contracts? Are you prepared to sanction a principle by which the whole mass of society will be in danger of being demoralized, and it will be left to an election by every man's creditors, in which a majority of two-thirds in number and value, against the consent of the remainder, shall have the power of discharging him from the obligation of all his contracts? Surely the House of Representatives are not prepared to answer these questions in the affirmative. No nation in the world, whether commercial or agricultural, whether civilized or savage, has ever for a moment entertained the idea of extending the operation of their bankrupt laws beyond the class of traders. Fortunately for our constituents, we have not the power of doing so. The constitution, correctly expounded, has proclaimed, "hitherto shalt thou go, but no farther." Nothing but a desperate effort to revive this expiring bill, could ever have induced its friends to have adopted the amendment which has just now been carried.

In the discussion of this question, I can as-

The Bankrupt Bill.

[H. OF R.]

sure the House, it is not my intention to travel over the ground which has been already occupied, or to repeat the arguments which have been already urged.

The subject naturally divides itself into two questions—the one of constitutional power, the other of policy. On the first, as the bill stood before the introduction of the last amendment, I had not a single doubt. Much as I would have deprecated the passage of the then bill, I should have been infinitely more alarmed if this House had determined that the enactment of such a law transcended the constitutional power of Congress. Upon this branch of the subject, the ingenious arguments of the gentleman from Virginia had not created a doubt in my mind. Where doubts before did exist, the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMYER,) and of my honorable colleague, (Mr. SHELLENT,) were, in my opinion, calculated entirely to remove them, and to carry conviction to every understanding.

A new question of constitutional power has now arisen on the amendment. The constitution declares that “the Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.” To this provision I am willing to give a fair and a liberal construction. Congress have the power to discharge from their debts, on the terms prescribed by the bill, all persons upon whom a law emanating from this clause of the constitution, may legitimately act. But can Congress make a law extending the penalties and the privileges of a bankrupt system to every individual in society? Can they embrace in its provisions the farmer, the clergyman, the physician, or the lawyer? Such a proposition was never seriously contended for before this day.

By considering the meaning of the term bankrupt, we shall be able at once to solve the difficulty. In adverting to its origin, we find the literal signification of the word to be a broken counter; which, by a figure of speech, has been applied in our language to a broken merchant. In the commercial laws of all the nations of the continent of Europe, bankruptcy is confined to merchants, in the strictest sense of the word. The operation of the bankrupt laws of England has been extended, by judicial construction, somewhat further; and they now embrace within their grasp not only the merchant, properly so called, but all persons who are traders, and are concerned in buying and selling any kind of merchandise, unless they have been expressly excepted by some positive legislative provision. This exposition of the law extends not only to those who sell any commodity in the same State in which they purchased it, but also to the manufacturer and the mechanic who bestow upon it their favor and their skill, and thus render it more valuable. The bill, as it formerly stood, confined itself strictly within this range. Indeed, it was more circumscribed as to the persons on whom it would have operated than the bankrupt laws of England.

I am willing then to expound the power of Congress upon the subject literally. In construing the constitution, Congress ought not to be fettered by nice technical rules. I admit that they have the power, whenever they think proper to call it into exercise, of establishing a system of bankruptcy which shall embrace all persons who have ever been embraced, even by the bankrupt laws of England. Further than this they cannot proceed, without extending the plain meaning of the word bankruptcy as it has been received by every commercial nation of Europe, and violating both the letter and the spirit of the constitution.

In making this admission, I am sensible that many may suppose I am giving a latitude of construction to the instrument which is not warranted by its spirit. The authority “to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States,” is contained in a clause of the constitution which immediately follows that “to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.” The power over bankruptcy evidently originated from, and is closely connected with, that over commerce. This commerce, which Congress has the power of regulating, is chiefly, if not exclusively, conducted by merchants in the strictest sense of the term, and principally by that class of them denominated importers. They are the men most exposed to the vicissitude of trade, and on that account are more properly the objects of such a law than people of any other description. It might, therefore, with much plausibility be contended that the power of Congress over bankruptcy is confined to that description of merchants.

Another argument, which would give additional strength to this construction, arises from the general spirit of the federal institutions. They do not propose to embrace the internal policy of the States. The jurisdiction of the federal courts is confined by the constitution to controversies between citizens of different States, and between foreigners and citizens of the United States. To such suits the merchants who carry on the intercourse with foreign nations, and between the different States, are most generally parties.

The object which I have in view in using these arguments, is not to prove that the constitutional power of Congress is confined to such merchants; but to show that it is contrary to the nature and the spirit of our Government to extend it to all classes of people in the community. The bill as it stood before the amendment, went quite far enough. It would even then have brought the operation of the law and the jurisdiction of the federal courts into the bosom of every community. The bill, however, as it now stands, if it should pass, will entirely destroy the symmetry of our system, and make those courts the arbiters in almost every case of contract to which any member of society, who thinks proper to become a bankrupt, may be a party.

It will at once be, in a great degree, a judicial consolidation of the Union. This was never intended by the framers of the constitution. Some of the terrible evils which would flow from such a system, I shall have occasion to delineate, when I come to speak of the policy of its adoption.

I shall now proceed to lay before the House my objections to the passage of this bill. As it now stands, certain classes of society are exposed to its adverse operation upon the commission of any of the acts of bankruptcy, described in its first section. Every individual in the community, including those embraced by the bill previous to the late amendment, may become voluntary bankrupts.

It will be necessary, here, briefly to inquire who may be declared bankrupts against their will. The adverse operation of the law will not be confined to wholesale and retail merchants, strictly speaking, and to dealers in exchange, bankers, brokers, factors, underwriters, and marine insurers. By the construction which has been placed upon the words "other person, actually using the trade of merchandise, by buying and selling, in gross or by retail," not only every dealer in any article, but every manufacturer or mechanic who purchases any material, bestows his skill and labor upon it, and sells it in its improved state, falls within the compulsory branch of this bill, unless expressly excepted by the proviso in its first section. Thus the distiller who purchases grain, converts it into whiskey, and sells the whiskey, would clearly be within its operation. The miller, also, who buys wheat, and sells it converted into flour, may be declared a bankrupt against his will. These cases are cited only as examples to illustrate the general rule. Each individual member can imagine many others.

I will now proceed to that which strikes my mind as a radical objection to the existence of this or any other adversary bankrupt bill in the United States. It arises from the nature of our free institutions, and is one that exists in no other country on the globe. It springs out of the best principles of the Federal Constitution, and it cannot be removed without expunging them from the instrument.

In what manner is a person to be declared a bankrupt by the bill now before the House? On the petition of any creditor accompanied by an affidavit of the truth of his debt, the circuit or district judge of the United States is authorized to issue a commission of bankruptcy. The alleged bankrupt may, however, appear before the commissioners, deny that he has committed any act of bankruptcy, and demand a trial by a jury of his country, before the judge who issued the commission. This is a right of which he cannot be deprived by the power of Congress. In the emphatic language of the constitution, "he shall not be deprived of his life, his liberty, or his property, without due process of law."

This trial before the circuit or district judge may, and probably will, in a majority of cases, be delayed for years, before its final termination. In free governments we cannot move with the celerity of despotism. During its pendency, what becomes of the property of the alleged bankrupt? He cannot be dispossessed of it under the constitution of the country, or by the provisions of this bill, until the jury shall have convicted him of some one of the acts of bankruptcy described in its first section. But although it cannot be wrested from him until after the event, yet the moment the commission issues, he, in effect, loses all control over his estate. The reason of this is, that by the provisions of the bill, all intermediate dispositions made by the debtor of his property are absolutely void, should he finally be declared a bankrupt. No person, therefore, could, with safety, in the mean time enter into any contract with him, or purchase any part of his estate. From the very nature of an adverse bankrupt system, this must necessarily be the case. If it were not, every man charged with having committed an act of bankruptcy, would demand a trial by jury before the district or circuit judge of the United States; so that during its pendency he might have an opportunity to dispose of his property as he thought proper. This would be giving a legal sanction to the very evil which the friends of the bill say it is chiefly intended to remedy.

What, then, is the situation which the bill places every man within its adverse provisions? Any of his creditors, or pretended creditors, by making an ex parte affidavit of the truth of his debt, without even proving by his own oath, or otherwise, any act of bankruptcy against him, may bring upon him inevitable and overwhelming destruction. If envy or malice against him rankles in the soul of any enemy who either is his creditor, or who will swear that he is, that enemy may wreak his vengeance to the full extent of his wishes, by having a commission of bankruptcy issued against him. The commission itself would be the death warrant of his property, notwithstanding his property may have been sufficient to discharge his debts, and he may have been guilty of no act of bankruptcy. If he submits to the commission, his credit is gone, and his power of exertion is at an end until he shall have obtained his final discharge. If he does not, and demands a trial, he is, during its pendency, in the situation of Tantalus in the infernal regions. Although he may be surrounded by all the comforts of life, and the means of extricating himself from his difficulties, he has not the power of using them. If he should be a merchant, his counting house must be closed, and his capital remain idle awaiting the result of a tedious lawsuit. If he be a farmer who has carried on a distillery, or who has been a miller or retail merchant, he cannot dispose of an acre of his land or any of his personal property until the controversy is determined. Whether therefore he submits to the commission, or does not, if he be an honest man he is exposed to inevitable ruin. If he be a fraudulent debtor, the delay of the trial will afford him ample time and opportunity to secrete his property, and place it beyond the reach of his creditors; and in this situation he will have the strongest temptation to be guilty of fraud.

The bankrupt law of England, the model from which the present bill has been drawn, provides an effectual remedy for this evil. It is one, however, which we have no constitutional power to adopt, and, if we had, it would be repugnant to every feeling of the hearts of freemen. In that country the bare issuing of the commission is itself equivalent to an execution. The debtor is at once deprived of the possession of all his property, and it is vested in the commissioners. Although he may declare that he has never been guilty of an act of bankruptcy, and petition for a trial, he petitions in vain. The iron hand of the law is upon him, and no innocence can elude its grasp. In that country the law declares that "caveats against commissions are not allowed, for they give too much time for a fraudulent debtor." The proceedings under it resemble those of the judges in the infernal regions, who first condemn and afterwards hear. They first deprive a man of all his property by virtue of the commission, and after the evil has been done, allow him to apply to the Chancellor to have it superseded.

From the nature of those Governments on the continent of Europe, under whose dominion bankrupt laws prevail, and from the peculiar character of those laws and of the commercial tribunals by whom they are administered, the same evils do not exist. I will not exhaust the patience of the House by detailing their different provisions.

It may be said, that as the bill provides that the petitioning creditor, before the commission can issue, shall give bond, to be taken by the circuit or district judge, in such penalty and with such surety as he may direct, conditioned that the obligor shall prove the debtor to be a bankrupt, he will be enabled to recover damages to the extent of any injury which he may sustain in case the condition of the bond should be violated.

This remedy, from its nature, could be no compensation for the injury sustained. To inform a man, after he had been arrested in the pursuit of his business by a commission of bankruptcy; after his prospects in life had been blasted; after his credit had been destroyed; and after he had been pursued for years in a course of litigation, which had terminated in his favor, that he might then enter upon another lawsuit, and bring his action upon the bond, would be laughing at his calamity. This would present no prospect of indemnity, even if the obligors should be solvent; but from the ignorance of the judges, so far removed from the people as those of the United States necessarily are, respecting the solvency of the sureties, and from the lapse of time which must transpire before any suit could be sustained upon the bond, it would, in most instances, be of little or no value.

These, then, would be the effects of the bill on the persons within its adverse operation.

Let us next inquire what would be the moral and practical effects of this bill, with the amendment just adopted, of the gentleman from Kentucky. Should it pass in its present shape, I shudder at the consequences. How will it affect the great agricultural interest of the country? I have the honor, in part, to represent a district chiefly composed of farmers. They are honest, they are industrious, and they esteem their contracts to be sacred and inviolable. The word of most of them, could their existence be perpetuated, binds them as forcibly as their bond. Have they, or have any other agriculturists, over the whole range of this extensive Union, asked you to pass a bankrupt law in their favor? Have they ever petitioned you to discharge them from the obligation of their contracts, which they feel themselves as much bound in conscience as in law to perform? It is certain that many honest and respectable men of that valuable class of society have been unfortunate, and I pity them from my inmost soul; but I beseech you, spare them from a law for which they have never asked, and which would tempt them to add guilt to misfortune.

What would be the necessary operation of such a law, when brought home to them, and to every other member of society? Once declare that contracts shall be no longer sacred; that any debtor, whether he has been a trader or not, by complying with the provisions of the law may have an election held by his creditors, and if two-thirds of them in number or value consent, may be relieved from all his debts against the will of the remainder; and you make a direct attack on the first principles of moral honesty by which the great mass of the people have been hitherto directed. Let a bankrupt be presented to the view of society, who has become wealthy since his discharge, and who, after having ruined a number of his creditors, shields himself from the payment of his honest debts by his certificate, and what effects would such a spectacle be calculated to produce? Examples of this nature must at length demoralize any people. The contagion introduced by the laws of the country, would, for that very reason, spread like a pestilence, until honesty, honor, and faith, will at length be swept from the intercourse of society. Leave the agricultural interest pure and uncorrupted, and they will forever form the basis on which the constitution and liberties of your country may safely repose. Do not, I beseech you, teach them to think lightly of the solemn obligation of contracts. No Government on earth, however corrupt, has ever enacted a bankrupt law for farmers; it would be a perfect monster in this country, where our institutions depend altogether upon the virtue of the people. We have no constitutional power to pass the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky; and, if we had, we never should do so, because such a provision would spread a moral taint through society which would corrupt it to its very core.

There is another point of view in which this bill, in its practical effects, would be intolerable. The jurisdiction of federal courts over citizens of the United States, is now chiefly confined to controversies existing between the citizens of different States. This bill, if it should become a law, will amount to almost a judicial consolidation of the Union. The litigation which will arise out of it, and which, by its provisions, must be exclusively determined by the federal courts, will embrace a large portion of the citizens of every State, either as parties or witnesses.

The numerous acts of bankruptcy described in the bill, many of which depend altogether upon the intention of the party charged with having committed them, would form the first ample source of exclusive federal jurisdiction.

By the fifty-sixth section it is provided that any creditor of a bankrupt, appearing before the Commissioners, may, at his election, have the validity of his claim determined in the circuit court of the district in which the bankrupt resides. The same privilege is extended to the assignees objecting to the validity of any claim upon the bankrupt, presented before the Commissioners; in this manner every lawsuit which could arise in the settlement of a bankrupt's estate, respecting the demands of any of his creditors, would be drawn into the circuit court for decision. This would be the case whether he became a bankrupt voluntarily, or by compulsion, and without any regard either to his occupation or place of residence, or that of his creditors. The whole structure of the National Judiciary would thus be changed. It would then possess jurisdiction, not only over controversies arising between citizens of different States, but over an immense number of those existing between citizens of the same State.

It would be tedious to enumerate, and perhaps impossible to foresee, all the controversies which, under the provisions of this bill, must exclusively be determined by the federal courts. The sixty-third section contains a sweeping clause upon this subject. It provides "that, except in the cases which are in this act otherwise specially provided for, if any bankrupt, or any assignee or assignees, creditor or creditors, or any other person, shall conceive himself, herself, or themselves, aggrieved by any examination, order, decision, denial, or other proceeding of the Commissioners, under any commission, or any act, proceeding, refusal, neglect, or omission of the bankrupt, or any assignee or assignees, or creditor or creditors, under, or by virtue of this act," such person may petition the circuit court, for the district where the commission issued, or either of its judges, for relief. The court, or the judge, is then bound to take cognizance of the complaint, and, at the election of either party, direct any facts in controversy to be tried by a jury.

In the State of Pennsylvania there are but two district courts of the United States, the one located in the city of Philadelphia, the other in the city of Pittsburg. The distance between these two places is three hundred miles. The inconvenience and expense to the people, from every section of the State, of attending those two courts, as parties, and as witnesses, would be an intolerable grievance. Under the provisions of this bill, however, such attendance must necessarily be a matter of daily occurrence. The people are already sufficiently harassed, by being obliged to be present at the courts within their own counties; but, if you compel them to travel to the federal courts, from one extremity of a large State to the other, it would be an evil scarcely to be endured. The same inconveniences will exist in every other State in the Union, but they will be felt in a greater degree by the people of the larger States. This is another radical objection against the passage of a bankrupt bill by Congress. It is one which cannot be renewed, because it results from the organization of the federal courts under the constitution, and the allotment of judicial power between them and the courts of the several States. It demonstrates, however, that the power to pass bankrupt laws could be exercised by the States much more conveniently for the people, than by the General Government.

Another serious objection to the passage of the bill, is its manifest tendency to increase the perpetration of fraud. It is true, it has been strenuously maintained by its friends, that it will, in a great degree, repress that evil. Has the experience of England justified them in making this prediction? Does not the testimony which has been taken before the committee of the House of Commons prove clearly the contrary? Indeed, so pressed down with its weight was my honorable colleague, (Mr. S.) that he was obliged to attribute the innumerable frauds which had been committed under the bankrupt law of that country, not to the operation of the law itself, but to the general corruption which prevailed among the people. This bill, should it become a law, must be productive of innumerable frauds, unless it will have the power of changing the nature of man, and rendering him the less criminal because he is the more tempted. He who created man, and therefore best knew his heart, directed him to pray that he might not be led into temptation. This bill informs the debtor that, if he will conform to its provisions, he shall obtain a certificate which will discharge him from all his debts. The State insolvent laws declare to him that, when he has given up all his property for the use of his creditors, he has done no more than his duty, and that his future acquisitions shall be answerable until his debts are paid. If a debtor can pass the ordeal of this bankrupt law, and obtain his certificate, he may then in security enjoy that property which successful fraud has enabled him to conceal. Under the State insolvent laws, however, he must know that the moment his concealed property is brought to light, it is liable to be seized by his creditors. Whilst, therefore, a bankrupt law holds out every temptation to make the debtor dishonest, an insolvent law presents him no such inducement. Indeed, his true policy is directly the reverse. Upon his good and fair conduct, and the consequent favorable regard of his creditors, depends his hopes of a discharge.

The Bankrupt Bill.

It is true, that by this bill a bankrupt cannot obtain a discharge from all his debts, unless by the consent of two-thirds of his creditors in number and value. In theory, this would appear to present a considerable difficulty in the way of obtaining a certificate. In practice, under the English bankrupt laws, it has been found more nominal than real. Indeed, but few instances have, I believe, occurred in the history of their bankrupt laws, in which consent has not been obtained. In this country, under our judiciary system, it would, perhaps, be still easier for the bankrupt to escape from his debts. He himself, if he be fraudulently disposed, can, by his own act, create as many creditors as he chooses. If the assignees or the other creditors think proper to dispute the claims of those believed to be fraudulent, they may insist upon having a trial by jury before the circuit court. Where the bankrupt has little or no property to divide, as would be the case in most instances, neither his assignees nor honest creditors would incur the expense and trouble of carrying on a lawsuit, perhaps a hundred miles from home, to disprove any debt presented before the commissioners. Even should they think proper to do so, it would be difficult to accomplish it, if the fraud had been conducted with any art; because, in the law, fraud is never to be presumed, but must be clearly proved.

The evils which would flow from the retrospective operation of this bill, I shall not touch; they have already been ably and eloquently decanted upon by others.

I shall now come to my concluding argument against the passage of this bill. It would tend again to arouse the spirit of wild and extravagant speculation, which has spread distress far and wide over the land. It will tend again to produce those very evils for which its friends say it is intended to provide a remedy.

What has been the history of this country? Upon this subject let us not turn a deaf ear to the dictates of experience. It is the best teacher of political wisdom.

Under our glorious constitution, the human mind is unrestrained in the pursuit of happiness. The calm of despotism does not rest upon us. Neither the institutions of the country, nor the habits of society, have established any castes within the limits of which man shall be confined. The human intellect walks abroad in its majesty. This admirable system of government, which incorporates the rights of man into the constitution of the country, develops all the latent resources of the intellect, and brings them into active energy. The road to wealth and to honor is not closed against the humblest citizen; and Heaven forbid that it ever should!

It is, however, the destiny of man to learn that evil often treads closely upon the footsteps of good. The very liberty which we enjoy, unless we are restrained by the dictates of morality and of prudence, has a tendency to make us discontented with our condition. It often produces a restless temper, and a disposition to be perpetually changing our pursuits, for the purpose of becoming more wealthy or more distinguished. The frame of mind produced by freedom, if kept within proper bounds, is a source of the greatest advantages to individuals and to society; if unrestrained and suffered to run wild, it leads to every species of extravagance and folly.

A few merchants, both in the cities and in the country, have amassed splendid and princely fortunes. These have glittered in the fancy of the thoughtless and unsuspecting countryman, and have roused his ambition or his avarice. He never calculated that it requires a union of considerable parts, with great experience, to make an accomplished merchant; and that, with all these advantages, but few comparatively are successful. His son is taught book-keeping at a country school, and then he abandons the pursuit of his fathers. He leaves the business of agriculture, which is the most peaceful, the most happy, the most independent, and, I might add, the most respectable, in society, to become a merchant. He spurns the idea of treading in the path of his ancestors, and acquiring his living by the sweat of his brow. Wealth and distinction have become his idols, and have turned his brain.

Is not this the history of thousands in our country within the last twenty years? It was not difficult to predict what would be the melancholy catastrophe. Bankruptcy and ruin have fallen upon the thoughtless adventurers.

Happy would it have been for the country had this spirit of speculation confined itself to the farmer who turned merchant. We have witnessed it spreading over every class of the community. We have, in innumerable instances, seen the plain, sober, industrious, and experienced farmer, converted into a speculator in land and in stocks. We have lived in a time when the foundations of society appeared to be shaken, and when the love of gain seemed to swallow up every other passion of the heart. This disposition gave birth to the hundreds and thousands of banks which have spread themselves over the country. Their reaction upon the people doubled the force of the original cause which produced them. They deluged the country with bank paper. The price of land rose far beyond its real value; it commanded from $200 to $400 per acre in many parts of the district which I have the honor, in part, to represent; and I know one instance in which a man agreed to give $1,500 per acre for a tract of land, which he afterwards laid out in town lots. He sold the lots at so large a profit that he would have accumulated an independent fortune by the speculation, had not the times changed, and the lot-holders, in consequence, been unable to pay the purchase money.

This universal delusion has vanished; the enchantment is at an end; the people have been restored to their sober senses. In the change, which was rapid, many honest and respectable citizens have been ruined. Among many, misery and want have usurped the abodes of happiness and plenty. I most sincerely deplore their situation; but, as legislators, we should also have some compassion on the community. Experience has taught us a lesson which, I trust, we shall never forget—that a wild and extravagant spirit of speculation is one of the greatest curses which can pervade our country. Do you wish again to arouse it? Do you wish again to witness the desolation which it has spread over the land, and which we are now slowly repairing? Then pass this bankrupt bill. Inform the farmer, who is now contented and happy, and whom experience has taught the danger of entering into trade, that he may become a merchant or a landjobber; that he may proceed to any excess he thinks proper; that he need confine the extravagance of his speculations within no other limit but the extent of his credit; that if, at last, he should be successful, unbounded wealth will be his portion—if not, the law will discharge him from all his debts, and enable him to begin a new career; hold out a lure to all the industrious classes in society to abandon their useful and honorable pursuits, and enter into a speculation of some kind or other, by proclaiming it as the law, that, if they should prove unsuccessful, their debts shall be cancelled, and they shall be restored to their former situation. Such a law would present the strongest temptations to a man in society to become indolent and extravagant, because every man in society is embraced by its provisions. In this respect it is as novel as it is dangerous. Rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that our population require the curb more than the rein. If you hold out such encouragement to unbounded speculation as this bill presents, we shall, before many years, see all the occurrences again presented before us which have involved the country in unexampled distress.

The time may come, ages hence, when a bankrupt law may become necessary for the encouragement of commerce. History has instructed us that nations, like men, rise, and flourish, and decay. At present our population possesses all the vigor and enterprise of youth. The stimulus of such a bill would drive us on to madness. It would be putting into the hands of Phæton the reins of the chariot of the sun. The day will come, but I trust it is now far distant, when old age shall fall upon us as a nation—when wealth shall beget luxury and corruption—and when we shall be enfeebled in all our exertions. Then it may be necessary to hold out extraordinary allurements to commercial enterprise. When that day shall arrive; when our country shall be sinking into decline; when her energies shall be paralyzed; and when, perhaps, a new Republic, vigorous as ours is at present, may be her competitor in commerce, then, and not till then, will it be necessary that Congress should exercise the power vested in them by the constitution, and pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies.

When Mr. B. had concluded—

Mr. WRIGHT replied.

To put an end to further discussion of the subject, Mr. TAYLOR remarked that he felt it his duty to call for the previous question, and, on motion, it was decided in the affirmative—years 96.

At the suggestion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, Mr. CAMBRELENG moved for a reconsideration of the vote for the previous question just taken; but the House refused to reconsider the same—years 69, says 88.

The main question was then ordered, and was put, on reading the bill a third time, and decided in the negative—years 72, says 99, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, Baldwin, Barber of Connecticut, Bayly, Bigelow, Borland, Breckenridge, Burrows, Cambreleng, Campbell of New York, Causden, Cocke, Colden, Conkling, Crafts, Cushman, Darlington, Denison, Dorice, Dwight, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Eustis, Farrelly, Findlay, Fuller, Gorcham, Hawks, Herrick, Hill, Holcombe, Hubbard, Jones of Tennessee, Kent, Kirkland, Little, McCarty, Milnor, Montgomery, Moore of Pennsylvania, Moore of Virginia, Moore of Alabama, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Patterson of New York, Pitcher, Poinsett, Rich, Rochester, Rogers, Ruggles, Russ, Russell, Sawyer, Sergeant, S. So the bill was rejected. And then the House adjourned.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on "a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange certain stocks."

The general object of the bill was to pay off the United States stocks, bearing six and seven per cent. interest at five per cent. redeemable at a future period.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to amend the bill by inserting after the word "thirteen" in the 7th line, the words, "and also two millions of the six per cent. stocks of 1820."

Mr. LOWMEYER suggested that it was probable, from the tenor of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the two millions contemplated by the amendment would be redeemed within no long time, and it would therefore be inexpedient to continue for many years to pay interest for the sum when it was in our power to redeem the principal; and that the effect of the amendment would naturally be to injure the public credit, by carrying with it the impression that the Government was not able to redeem that portion of the debt as soon as expected.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, proposed to modify the amendment in such a manner as to leave it discretionary with the Executive to include the six per cent. of 1820, or not, as he may deem expedient.

This course was advocated by Mr. CAMBRELENG, but the modification was not then acceded to by the mover, and an extensive range of debate ensued upon the original amendment, which was supported by the mover and Messrs. TRIMBLE, MALLARY, BUCHANAN, ROSS, and FARRELLY, and opposed by Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, COLDEX, LOWMEYER, WOOD, GORHAM, and NELSON, of Virginia.

Mr. BALDWIN finally expressed his willingness to leave it to the Executive to include the stock of 1820 or not, conformably to Mr. TUCKER's proposition; but before the question was determined, the committee rose, reported progress, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, March 18.

Military Establishment.

Mr. COCKE moved that the House do come to the following resolutions, viz:

1. Resolved, That the act of the 2d of March, 1821, to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States, was not intended to authorize the President of the United States to dismiss officers then in service, and introduce others of the same grade into the army.

2. Resolved, That the dismissal of Brevet Brigadier General Daniel Bissell, Colonel of the 1st regiment of infantry, and of Joseph L. Smith, Colonel of the 3d regiment of infantry, as supernumerary, and the creation of three new colonels, to wit: Towson, Fenwick, and Butler, on the 1st day of June, 1821, was not authorized by the terms or by the spirit of the act of the 2d of March, 1821.

3. Resolved, That the appointment of Colonel James Gadsden to the office of Adjutant General of the United States Army, and the dismissal of Colonels Butler and Jones from that office, was not justified by the act of the 2d of March, 1821.

4. Resolved, That the transfer of Lieutenant Colonel Lindsay from the seventh regiment of infantry to the third regiment of artillery, after the 1st of June, 1821, was contrary to the regulations for the government of the army of the United States, and not authorized by the terms or spirit of the act of the 2d of March, 1821.

5. Resolved, That it is the duty of Congress, upon national principles and considerations, to protect each officer and soldier of the army in the enjoyment of his legal and constitutional rights.

Mr. COCKE thought that the subject embraced by the resolutions was one which involved the interest of the country, and he therefore moved that they be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. WALWORTH observed that the subject embraced by the resolutions was now before the Military Committee, and he believed a member of it was employed at that moment in drawing a report upon it.

The SPEAKER observed that he thought it was proper on this occasion to put the question of consideration, and he was about to put the question, whether the House would now consider the resolutions; when

Mr. COCKE inquired by what rule he was deprived of the right to lay a resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER referred to the rule of the House, that, "when any motion or proposition is made, the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put, unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker"—and the question of consideration was then put, and carried—ayes 62, noes 55.

Mr. COCKE then renewed his original motion that the resolutions be laid on the table and printed; which was carried without a division.

TUESDAY, March 19.

South American Independence.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the Message from the President of the United States, concerning the recognition of the independence of the late Spanish provinces in America, made report thereon; which was read and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union; and five thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the members of this House, in addition to the usual number. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which were referred the Message of the President, concerning the recognition of the late Spanish provinces in America, and the documents therewith communicated, having examined the same with the most profound attention, unanimously report:

That the provinces of Buenos Ayres, after having, from the year 1810, proceeded in their revolutionary movements without any obstacle from the Government of Spain, formally declared their independence of that Government in 1816. After various intestine commotions and external collisions, those provinces now enjoy domestic tranquillity and good understanding with all their neighbors, and actually exercise, without opposition from within or the fear of annoyance from without, all the attributes of sovereignty.

The provinces of Venezuela and New Granada, after having, separately, declared their independence, sustained, for a period of more than ten years, a desolating war against the armies of Spain, and having severally attained, by their triumph over those armies, the object for which they contended, united themselves, on the 19th of December, 1819, in one nation, under the title of "the Republic of Colombia."

The Republic of Colombia has now a well-organized Government, instituted by the free will of its citizens, and exercises all the functions of sovereignty, fearless alike of internal and foreign enemies. The small remnant of the numerous armies commissioned to preserve the supremacy of the parent State, is now blockaded, in two fortresses, where it is innocuous, and where, deprived as it is, of hope of succor, it must soon surrender at discretion; when this event shall have occurred, there will not remain a vestige of foreign power in all that immense Republic, containing between three and four millions of inhabitants.

The province of Chili, since it declared its independence, in the year 1818, has been in the constant and unmolested enjoyment of the sovereignty which it then assumed.

The province of Peru, situated like Chili, beyond the Andes, and bordering on the Pacific Ocean, was for a long time deterred from making any effectual effort for independence, by the presence of an imposing military force, which Spain had kept up in that country. It was not, therefore, until the 12th of June of the last year, that its capital, the city of Lima, capitulated to an army, chiefly composed of troops from Buenos Ayres and Chili, under the command of General San Martin. The greatest part of the royal troops which escaped on that occasion retreated to the mountains, but soon left them to return to the coast, there to join the royal garrison in the fortress of Callao. The surrender of that fortress, soon after, to the Americans, may be regarded as the termination of the war in that quarter.

When the people of Peru found themselves, by this event, free to express their will, they most unequivocally expressed in favor of independence, and with a unanimity and enthusiasm which have nowhere been excelled.

The revolution in Mexico has been somewhat different in its character and progress from the revolutions in the other Spanish American provinces, and its result, in respect to the organization of its internal government, has, also, not been precisely the same. Independence, however, has been as emphatically declared and as practically established, since the 24th of August last, by the "Mexican Empire," as ever it has been by the Republics of the South; and her geographical situation, her population, and her resources, eminently qualify her to maintain the independence which she has thus declared, and now actually enjoys.

Such are the facts which have occupied the attention of your committee, and which, in their opinion, irresistibly prove that the nations of Mexico, Colombia, Buenos Ayres, Peru, and Chili, in Spanish America, are in fact independent.

It now remains for your committee to examine the right and the expediency, on the part of the United States, of recognizing the independence which those nations have thus effectually achieved.

In this examination, it cannot be necessary to inquire into the right of the people of Spanish America "to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the powers of the earth, that separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them." The right to change the political institutions of the State has, indeed, been exercised equally by Spain and by her colonies; and for us to deny to the people of Spanish America the right to independence, on the principles which alone sanction it here, would be virtually to renounce our own.

The political right of this nation to acknowledge their independence, without offending others, does not depend on its justice, but on its actual establishment. To justify such a recognition, by us, it is necessary only to show, as is already sufficiently shown, that the people of Spanish America are, within their respective limits, exclusively sovereign; and thus, in fact, independent. With them, as with every other Government possessing and exercising the power of making war, the United States, in common with all nations, have the right of concerting the terms of mutual peace and intercourse.

Who is the rightful sovereign of a country, is not an inquiry permitted to foreign nations, to whom it is competent only to treat with "the powers that be."

There is no difference in opinion on this point among the writers on public law, and no diversity, with respect to it, in the practice of civilized nations. It is not necessary here to cite authority for a doctrine familiar to all who paid the slightest attention to the subject, nor to go back, for its practical illustration, to the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster. Long since, the chiefs of those conflicting houses alternately triumphed and ruled, and were alternately obeyed at home and recognized abroad, according as they, successively, exercised the power, without demonstrating the right—monarchies have become commonwealths or republics, and powerful usurpers have been recognized by foreign nations, in preference to legitimate and powerless pretenders. Modern history is replete with instances in point. Have we not, indeed, within the brief period of our own remembrance, beheld governments vary their forms, and change their rulers, according to the prevailing power or passion of the moment, and doing so in virtue of the principle now in question, without materially and lastingly affecting their relations with other Governments? Have we not seen the emperors and kings of yesterday receive, on the thrones of exiled sovereigns, who claimed the right to reign there, the friendly embassies of other powers, with whom those exiled sovereigns had sought an asylum—and have we not seen to-day those emperors and kings, thus courted and recognized yesterday, rest of their sceptres, and, from a mere change of circumstances, not of right, treated as usurpers by their successors, who, in their turn, have been acknowledged and caressed by the same foreign powers?

The peace of the world, and the independence of every member of the great political family, require that each should be the exclusive judge of its own internal proceedings, and that the fact alone should be regarded by foreign nations. "Even when civil war breaks the bonds of society and of government,

Spanish American Provinces.

er, at least, suspends their force and effect, it gives birth in the nation to two independent parties, who regard each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge." It is of necessity, therefore, that these two parties should be considered, by foreign States, as two distinct and independent nations. To consider or treat them otherwise would be to interfere in their domestic concerns, to deny them the right to manage their own affairs in their own way, and to violate the essential attributes of their respective sovereignty. For a nation to be entitled, in respect to foreign States, to the enjoyment of these attributes, "and to figure directly in the great political society, it is sufficient that it is really sovereign and independent; that is, that it governs itself by its own authority and laws." The people of Spanish America do, notoriously, so govern themselves, and the right of the United States to recognize the governments which they have instituted is incontestable. A doubt of the expediency of such a recognition can be suggested only by the apprehension that it may injuriously affect our peaceful and friendly relations with the nations of the other hemisphere.

Can such an apprehension be well founded?

Have not all those nations practically sanctioned, within the last thirty years, the very principle on which we now propose to act; or have they ever complained of one another, or of us, for acting on that principle?

No nation of Europe, excepting Spain herself, has, hitherto, opposed force to the independence of Spanish America. Some of those nations have not only constantly maintained commercial and friendly intercourse with them, in every stage of the Revolution, but indirectly and efficiently, though not avowedly, aided them in the prosecution of their great object. To these the acknowledgment, by the United States, of the attainment of that object, must be satisfactory.

To the other nations of Europe, who have regarded the events occurring in Spanish America, not only without interference, but with apparent indifference, such an acknowledgment ought not to be offensive.

The nations who have thus respectively favored, or never opposed, the Spanish American people during their active struggle for independence, cannot, it is believed, regard with dissatisfaction the formal recognition of that independence by a nation, which, while that struggle lasted, has religiously observed, towards both the conflicting parties, all the duties of neutrality. Your committee are therefore of opinion, that we have a right, on this occasion, confidently to expect, from what these nations have done or forbore to do, during the various fortunes of the civil war which has terminated, that they will frankly approve the course of policy which the United States may now think proper to adopt in relation to the successful party in that war. It surely cannot be reasonably apprehended, that nations who have thus been the tranquil spectators, the apparent well-wishers, if not the efficient supporters, of this party, and who have not made the faintest attempt to arrest its progress, or to prevent its success, should be displeased with a third power, for merely recognizing the Governments which, owing to that success, have thus been virtually permitted, or impliedly approved, in acquiring the undisputed and exclusive control of the countries in which they are established. It is therefore on the consistency as well as on the justice of these nations of Europe, that we may confidently rely, that the simple recognition, on the part of the United States, of the necessary effect of what has already been done, will not be considered as a just cause of complaint against them; while the interested and immediate agents, who have been directly and actively engaged in producing that effect, have neither been opposed nor censured.

Your committee, therefore, instead of seriously apprehending that the recognition, by the United States, of the independence of Spanish America, will be unacceptable to these nations, are not without hope that they may practically approve it, by severally adopting a similar measure. It is not, indeed, unreasonable to suppose, that those Governments have, like this, waited only for the evidence of facts which might not only suffice to justify them, under the laws and usages of nations, but to satisfy Spain herself, that nothing has been prematurely done, or which could justly offend her feelings, or be considered as inconsistent with her rights. As their motives for not having hitherto recognized the independence of Spanish America, may thus be supposed to have been analogous to our own, it is permitted to presume that the facts and reasons which have prevailed on us no longer to hesitate, will, confirmed as they are by our example, have a like influence on them.

No nation can entertain a more sincere deference for the feelings of Spain, or take a more lively interest in her welfare, than the United States. It is to this deference, too evident to be doubted or misunderstood, that ought to be ascribed the hesitation of this Government, until now, to yield to the claims of Spanish America, although these claims were in perfect accordance with our own principles, feelings, and interests. Having thus forbore to act, even at the hazard of having those principles and feelings misunderstood on this side of the Atlantic, we have, as your committee believe, given at once satisfactory proof of our disinterestedness and moderation; and of our scrupulous respect to the principle which leaves the political institutions of every foreign State to be directed by its own view of its own rights and interests.

Your committee have been particularly anxious to show, in a manner satisfactory to Spain herself, that the measure which this Government now proposes to adopt, has been considered with the most respectful attention, both in relation to her rights and to her feelings.

It is not on the laws and usages of nations, or on the practice of Spain herself on like occasions, that your committee have relied for our justification towards her.

The fact that, for the last three years, she has not sent a single company of troops against her transatlantic colonies, has not been used as evidence of their actual independence, or of her want of power to oppose it. This fact, explained as it is, by the public acts of Spain herself, is regarded by your committee as evidence only of her policy.

The last troops collected at Cadiz, in 1819, which were destined to suppress the revolutionary movements in Spanish America, not only rejected that service, but joined in the revolution, which has since proved successful in Spain itself. The declaration of the leaders in that revolution was, that "Spanish America had a right to be free, and that Spain should be free." Although the constitution, which was re-established by that revolution, guaranteed the integrity of the Spanish dominions, yet the principles commotions and external collisions, those provinces now enjoy domestic tranquillity and good understanding with all their neighbors, and actually exercise, without opposition from within or the fear of annoyance from without, all the attributes of sovereignty.

The provinces of Venezuela and New Granada, after having, separately, declared their independence, sustained, for a period of more than ten years, a desolating war against the armies of Spain, and having severally attained, by their triumph over those armies, the object for which they contended, united themselves, on the 19th of December, 1819, in one nation, under the title of "the Republic of Colombia."

The Republic of Colombia has now a well-organized Government, instituted by the free will of its citizens, and exercises all the functions of sovereignty, fearless alike of internal and foreign enemies. The small remnant of the numerous armies commissioned to preserve the supremacy of the parent State, is now blockaded, in two fortresses, where it is innoxious, and where, deprived as it is, of hope of succor, it must soon surrender at discretion; when this event shall have occurred, there will not remain a vestige of foreign power in all that immense Republic, containing between three and four millions of inhabitants.

The province of Chili, since it declared its independence, in the year 1818, has been in the constant and unmolested enjoyment of the sovereignty which it then assumed.

The province of Peru, situated like Chili, beyond the Andes, and bordering on the Pacific Ocean, was for a long time deterred from making any effectual effort for independence, by the presence of an imposing military force, which Spain had kept up in that country. It was not, therefore, until the 12th of June of the last year, that its capital, the city of Lima, capitulated to an army, chiefly composed of troops from Buenos Ayres and Chili, under the command of General San Martin. The greatest part of the royal troops which escaped on that occasion retreated to the mountains, but soon left them to return to the coast, there to join the royal garrison in the fortress of Callao. The surrender of that fortress, soon after, to the Americans, may be regarded as the termination of the war in that quarter.

When the people of Peru found themselves, by this event, free to express their will, they most unequivocally expressed in favor of independence, and with a unanimity and enthusiasm which have nowhere been excelled.

The revolution in Mexico has been somewhat different in its character and progress from the revolutions in the other Spanish American provinces, and its result, in respect to the organization of its internal government, has, also, not been precisely the same. Independence, however, has been as emphatically declared and as practically established, since the 24th of August last, by the "Mexican Empire," as ever it has been by the Republics of the South; and her geographical situation, her population, and her resources, eminently qualify her to maintain the independence which she has thus declared, and now actually enjoys.

Such are the facts which have occupied the attention of your committee, and which, in their opinion, irresistibly prove that the nations of Mexico, Colombia, Buenos Ayres, Peru, and Chili, in Spanish America, are in fact independent.

It now remains for your committee to examine the right and the expediency, on the part of the United States, of recognizing the independence which those nations have thus effectually achieved.

In this examination, it cannot be necessary to inquire into the right of the people of Spanish America "to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the powers of the earth, that separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them." The right to change the political institutions of the State has, indeed, been exercised equally by Spain and by her colonies; and for us to deny to the people of Spanish America the right to independence, on the principles which alone sanction it here, would be virtually to renounce our own.

The political right of this nation to acknowledge their independence, without offending others, does not depend on its justice, but on its actual establishment. To justify such a recognition, by us, it is necessary only to show, as is already sufficiently shown, that the people of Spanish America are, within their respective limits, exclusively sovereign; and thus, in fact, independent. With them, as with every other Government possessing and exercising the power of making war, the United States, in common with all nations, have the right of concerting the terms of mutual peace and intercourse.

Who is the rightful sovereign of a country, is not an inquiry permitted to foreign nations, to whom it is competent only to treat with "the powers that be."

There is no difference in opinion on this point among the writers on public law, and no diversity, with respect to it, in the practice of civilized nations. It is not necessary here to cite authority for a doctrine familiar to all who paid the slightest attention to the subject, nor to go back, for its practical illustration, to the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster. Long since, the chiefs of those conflicting houses alternately triumphed and ruled, and were alternately obeyed at home and recognized abroad, according as they, successively, exercised the power, without demonstrating the right—monarchies have become commonwealths or republics, and powerful usurpers have been recognized by foreign nations, in preference to legitimate and powerless pretenders. Modern history is replete with instances in point. Have we not, indeed, within the brief period of our own remembrance, beheld governments vary their forms, and change their rulers, according to the prevailing power or passion of the moment, and doing so in virtue of the principle now in question, without materially and lastingly affecting their relations with other Governments? Have we not seen the emperors and kings of yesterday receive, on the thrones of exiled sovereigns, who claimed the right to reign there, the friendly embassies of other powers, with whom those exiled sovereigns had sought an asylum—and have we not seen to-day those emperors and kings, thus courted and recognized yesterday, left of their sceptres, and, from a mere change of circumstances, not of right, treated as usurpers by their successors, who, in their turn, have been acknowledged and caressed by the same foreign powers?

The peace of the world, and the independence of every member of the great political family, require that each should be the exclusive judge of its own internal proceedings, and that the fact alone should be regarded by foreign nations. "Even when civil war breaks the bonds of society and of government, or, at least, suspends their force and effect, it gives birth in the nation to two independent parties, who regard each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge." It is of necessity, therefore, that these two parties should be considered, by foreign States, as two distinct and independent nations. To consider or treat them otherwise would be to interfere in their domestic concerns, to deny them the right to manage their own affairs in their own way, and to violate the essential attributes of their respective sovereignty. For a nation to be entitled, in respect to foreign States, to the enjoyment of these attributes, "and to figure directly in the great political society, it is sufficient that it is really sovereign and independent; that is, that it governs itself by its own authority and laws." The people of Spanish America do, notoriously, so govern themselves, and the right of the United States to recognize the governments which they have instituted is incontestable. A doubt of the expediency of such a recognition can be suggested only by the apprehension that it may injuriously affect our peaceful and friendly relations with the nations of the other hemisphere.

Can such an apprehension be well founded?

Have not all those nations practically sanctioned, within the last thirty years, the very principle on which we now propose to act; or have they ever complained of one another, or of us, for acting on that principle?

No nation of Europe, excepting Spain herself, has, hitherto, opposed force to the independence of Spanish America. Your committee have been particularly anxious to show, in a manner satisfactory to Spain herself, that the measure which this Government now proposes to adopt, has been considered with the most respectful attention, both in relation to her rights and to her feelings.

It is not on the laws and usages of nations, or on the practice of Spain herself on like occasions, that your committee have relied for our justification towards her.

The fact that, for the last three years, she has not sent a single company of troops against her transatlantic colonies, has not been used as evidence of their actual independence, or of her want of power to oppose it. This fact, explained as it is, by the public acts of Spain herself, is regarded by your committee as evidence only of her policy.

The last troops collected at Cadiz, in 1819, which were destined to suppress the revolutionary movements in Spanish America, not only rejected that service, but joined in the revolution, which has since proved successful in Spain itself. The declaration of the leaders in that revolution was, that "Spanish America had a right to be free, and that Spain should be free." Although the constitution, which was re-established by that revolution, guaranteed the integrity of the Spanish dominions, yet the principles on which that constitution was founded seem to discountenance the employment of force for the accomplishment of that object, in contempt of the equal rights and declared will of the American portion of the Spanish people. The conduct of the Government, organized under that constitution, has uniformly been, in this respect, in conformity to those principles. Since its existence, there has not been even a proposal by that Government to employ force for the subjugation of the American provinces, but merely recommendations of conciliatory measures for their pacification.

The answer of the Cortes, on the 10th of July, 1820, to the address of the King, furnishes conclusive proof of this policy.

"The intimate union," says this answer, "of the Cortes with your Majesty; the re-establishment of the constitution; the faithful performance of promises, depriving malevolence of all pretext, will facilitate the pacification of the ultra marine provinces, which are in a state of agitation and dissension. The Cortes, on its part, will omit no opportunity to propose and adopt measures necessary for the observance of the constitution and restoration of tranquillity in those countries, to the end that the Spain of both worlds may thus form a single and happy family."

Although the ultra marine provinces are not here encouraged to expect absolute independence, yet they are no longer treated as vassal colonies, or threatened with subjugation, but are actually recognized as brothers in the great constitutional and free family of Spain.

A report made to the Cortes on the 24th of June, 1821, by a committee appointed by that body, not only manifestly corroborates the policy above stated, but sufficiently intimates that the recognition of the independence of Spanish America by Spain herself, had nearly been the measure recommended by that committee.

That report avers that "tranquillity is not sufficient, even if it should extend throughout America, with a prospect of permanency. No; it falls short of the wishes of the friends of humanity."

In speaking of the measure demanded by the crisis, it says that this measure was not only warmly approved by the committee, but at first entirely assented to by the Ministers with whom it had been discussed, and failed only to be proposed to the Cortes "by these Ministers having, on account of peculiar occurrences, suspended their judgment." It speaks of this measure as indicative of a new and glorious resolution; that it was demanded by America and the true interests of the Peninsula; that from it Spain might reap advantages which otherwise she could never expect; and that the ties of kindred and the uniformity of religion, with commercial relations, and those emanating from free institutions, would be the surest pledge of mutual harmony and close union.

Your committee do not feel themselves authorized to say positively what that measure was, but they do not hesitate to declare their entire conviction that no measure short of a full recognition of unconditional independence, could have deserved the character, nor been capable of producing the effects ascribed to it.

It is therefore sufficiently manifest that Spain, far from wishing to call into action her means of prosecuting hostilities against the people of Spanish America, has renounced even the feelings of an enemy towards them, and but for "peculiar occurrences" had been prepared nearly a year ago to consent to their independence.

She has not only practically discontinued, and even emphatically deprecated, the employment of force to restore tranquillity to Spanish America, but she has declared that even universal and permanent tranquillity there "falls short of the wishes of the friends of humanity."

While she appeals to the "ties of kindred," she undoubtedly feels them; and if she has not abandoned her desire, so often avowed, of mere constitutional union and equal commercial intercourse with her former colonies, as between provinces of the same empire, a union and an intercourse which intervening Andes and oceans seem to render highly inconvenient, if not utterly impracticable, she evidently refers the accomplishment of this desire to the unawed deliberations and to the congenial and kindred feelings of the people of those colonies, and thus substantially acknowledges their independence.

Whatever may be the policy of Spain, however, in respect to her former American colonies, our recognition of their independence can neither affect her rights nor impair her means in the accomplishment of that policy. We cannot for this be justly accused of aiding in the attainment of an independence which has already been established without our assistance. Besides, our recognition must necessarily be co-existent with the fact on which it is founded, and cannot survive it. While the nations of Spanish America are actually independent, it is simply to speak the truth to acknowledge them to be so.

Should Spain, contrary to her avowed principles and acknowledged interests, renew the war for the conquest of South America, we shall indeed regret it; but we shall observe, as we have done between the independent parties, an honest and impartial neutrality. But on the other hand should Spain, faithful to her own glory and prosperity, consent that her offspring in the New World should enjoy the right of self-government equally with their brethren in the Old, we shall sincerely rejoice; and we shall cherish with equal satisfaction, and cultivate with equal assiduity, the friendship of regenerated Spain and of emancipated America.

Your committee, in justice to their own feelings and to the feelings of their fellow-citizens, have made this declaration without disguise; and they trust that the uniform character and conduct of this people will save it from all liability to misinterpretation.

Happy in our own institutions, we claim no privilege; we indulge no ambition to extend them to other nations; we admit the equal rights of all nations to form their own governments and to administer their own internal affairs as they may judge proper; and however they may in these respects differ from us, we do not on that account, regard with the less satisfaction their tranquillity and happiness.

Your committee, having thus considered the subject referred to them in all its aspects, are unanimously of opinion, that it is just and expedient to acknowledge the independence of the several nations of Spanish America, without any reference to the diversity in the forms of their governments; and in accordance with this opinion, they respectfully submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President in his Message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the American provinces of Spain which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognised by the United States as independent nations.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition.

District of Columbia.

Mr. KEET, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred, on the 9th instant, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the said District, reported a bill to enable the inhabitants of the District of Columbia to form a frame of government; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.—The bill is as follows:

A Bill to enable the inhabitants of the District of Columbia to form a frame of Government.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of the District of Columbia be, and they hereby are, authorized to hold a Convention, to determine whether it will be for their benefit to have the rights of self-government extended to them, so far as the same may constitutionally be done; and if they shall be of such opinion, to form a frame of government, to be submitted to Congress for their approbation.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Convention shall be composed of twelve representatives for the city of Washington, and that part of the county of Washington east of Rock Creek; of eight representatives for the town of Georgetown, and that part of the county west of Rock Creek; and of nine representatives from the town and county of Alexandria. The said representatives to be free white taxable males, inhabitants of said District, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall be chosen by ballot, by the free white taxable males, inhabitants of said District, above the age of twenty-one years, on the — day of — next, under the superintendence of such judges, at such place in each of the said towns, and subject to such other directions, as the President of the United States may prescribe.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the persons so chosen shall convene, in the city of Washington, at such place as shall be fixed by the President of the United States, on the — day of —, and shall organize themselves by the appointment of a presiding officer, and such other officers as may be necessary. A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum, and their proceedings shall be communicated to the President of the United States, to be by him laid before Congress at their next session.

Revolutionary Pension Bill.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill supplementary to the act to provide for persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war.

Mr. KEYES submitted the following amendment to the first section: "and in all cases he shall be considered unable to support himself if he is over the age of sixty-five years, and his property does not exceed one hundred dollars."

Mr. KEYES observed that this was a bill supplementary to two acts passed by Congress. The first was passed March 18, 1818, which was favorable to a certain proportion of the American Revolutionary Army. The other act of Congress, which was in addition to the act of 1818, was passed May 1, 1820, and in my opinion, said Mr. K., it had torn out a part of the bowels of the act of 1818; for it gave one man authority to drop from the pension roll as many men as he should please—and it had been his pleasure to drop from the pension roll in pursuance of said act, more of the old soldiers than the British, and their allies, the Hessians and Indians, ever slew in any one battle during the Revolutionary war. And the striking off of the pension roll, is the cause of so many prayers and petitions being presented to this Congress from the old heroes—stating that they were wrongfully struck off the pension roll, and now begging Congress to restore them to said roll again; and I ask Congress, said Mr. K., what will you do with these old worthies? Time is short—I mean it is short with the remnant of that Revolutionary Army. Mr. Chairman, let us make a calculation. Many of that Army, in the year 1775, were rising of sixty years of age forty-seven years ago. That would make this class of soldiers one hundred and seven years old. Where are they, Mr. Chairman? They are all in their graves. No pensions are needed for this class of soldiers. But, sir, generally speaking, that Army were from the age of forty-five to eighteen years of age. Take forty-five and add forty-seven years, since the commencement of that war, and it would make that class ninety-two years old at the present time. I ask where are they? They likewise are all in their graves, or nearly all. You will not have any pensions to give them, or, if any, but few. We will now speak of the youngest class, or nearly so—eighteen at the commencement of the war, forty-seven since, will make that class sixty-five. This class is in the evening of their days, and will you not afford them a little relief? Mr. Chairman, I was one of those American Revolutionary rebels, as the British were pleased to call us, when we fought under the authority of the thirteen colonies, and I well remember the cold and hunger, the fatigue and slaughter which that Army had to meet with. Yes, Mr. Chairman, that Revolutionary Army, under the confederated States, underwent every thing but death, in defending their country from the oppression and tyranny of their mother country, and thousands and thousands of them were slain in that bloody and awful conflict. These old heroes were undoubtedly the bravest men that the world ever produced, ever since David fought Goliath, the Lion, and the Bear. And how, Mr. Chairman, were these worthy soldiers paid for the great services they had rendered their country? I answer, they were paid in rags, made into Continental bills, which bills represented gold and silver. But these bills were never redeemed, therefore the soldiers were never paid according to contract. But these old heroes, after they had spent the glory of their days in defending the liberties of their country, sat down easy and contented. No murmuring—no complaint was heard from them. No prayers—no petitions were presented by them to Congress to give them pensions; and so the old heroes would have remained in their poverty until death, had not the Congress in March, 1818, of their own free will and accord, unsolicited by the indigent soldiers, passed a generous law, inviting the soldiers and sailors who were poor and needy, to come and take a pension for life. Congress pointed out the road for them to come; and what, said Mr. K., were the requirements of Congress in that bill? I answer, the applicant was to make a declaration under oath, before a United States judge, or one of the judges of the State, Territory, or county, where the applicant resided, stating his reduced circumstances, and need of his country's help—the time he engaged in the United States service—the company, regiment, and the line of the Army he served in, the time and manner of his discharge from the Army, and what other proof was in his power to make; and when he had thus sworn under oath before the said judge, and made what other proof he could—if the judge was of the opinion he had served against the common enemy, according to the requirements of the act, and was in such reduced circumstances as to need the assistance of his country, the judge was to transmit the testimony in the case, and the proceedings had thereon, to the Secretary of the Department of War, and if he was satisfied that the soldier or sailor comes under the provisions of said act, it was his duty to put him on the pension roll. And was this all, Mr. Chairman? No—there was a clause in the act which provided that, if any applicant gave false testimony in his declaration, he should be liable to indictment for wilful and corrupt perjury. And now I ask every lawyer in this Congress the question, whether there was any other legal way to have dropped any soldier from the pension roll, except to first convict him of wilful and corrupt perjury? And I am fully persuaded that every lawyer of good understanding will join me in the opinion, that there was not any other legal way to drop any off of the pension roll.

Mr. ALEXANDER, of Virginia, said, in order to try the sense of the House as to the principle of the bill, he would move to strike out the first section, which was extremely obnoxious to him. He was not so much opposed to the second, which resulted from the necessity of the case; but, rather than gain that at the expense of the other, he would be willing to give up the whole. He must confess his surprise to find his friend from Tennessee (Mr. COOKE) among the advocates of this bill, who had at all times evinced such a disposition to economize every department, and to bring the expenditure within the means of the Government. It was not so surprising to find a support elsewhere, when he recollected, at a former period, that every effort was made to destroy the provisions of the last act upon the subject, which, however reluctantly, gentlemen are obliged to admit have been extremely salutary. No one ever thought, under the original act, we should be compelled to appropriate three millions of dollars to carry it into effect. And no one can take upon himself to say—not even the gentleman from Tennessee—if the bill passes in its present shape, that we shall not be called upon to add five hundred thousand or a million to the present fund for the present purpose. These contingencies, like some others, will be presented at a time when we are least prepared to meet the demand, and will have to be put down under the head of deficiencies. And I do deem it of some consequence to know what will be the probable estimate, if gentlemen are determined to entail this system upon the nation. The amount, however, out of the question, and I am opposed to the bill in principle.

Gentlemen may call it by what name they please, it is little else than the original act itself, liable to the same system of fraud, perjury, and corruption, which have heretofore been practiced upon the Government. For, sir, what is the character of it? It provides that "in all cases where persons are stricken from the pension roll, and they are afterwards from any cause so reduced in circumstances as to be incapable of supporting themselves, they may be permitted to come in and take advantage of the act passed in 1820." And, my word for it, there will be scarcely one who will not bring himself within the rule; for we know how easy a matter it is for an individual, if you prescribe to him the nature of the evidence required, to make out his case. It is in fact an invitation—nay, an encouragement—to those who, with a proper share of industry and exertion, are capable of supporting themselves and family, to get rid of the little property which they have as an encumbrance, by putting it to hazard in dissipation or any other way, provided it does not appear to be done with a fraudulent intent; and (as the ingenuity of man is always capable of the task) well knowing that, let the worst happen, they can here take the benefit of the insolvent act, by which they will be placed in a more solvent condition.

I do not say that it will be the case with all of them, but that it will with the greater part there is every reason to believe, notwithstanding your oaths, your schedules, and every thing besides; particularly when we have been told that an individual who once claimed the honor of a seat on this floor, and it is presumed stood well in the confidence of the people, felt no scruples upon this subject. And with such high examples before their eyes, is it at all wonderful that they who move in a much humbler sphere should equally disregard the solemnity and obligation of an oath?

I do not mean to disparage the claim of the Revolutionary soldier, but, as my honorable colleague (Mr. RANDOLPH) very properly remarked on a former occasion, it is disparaged by the very act itself. For you know, sir, it is one thing to face your enemy, and another to turn your back upon him; and no one will pretend to say, that these are equally deserving the affections of the American people.

Gentlemen tell us that the Revolutionary soldier is fast hastening to his home; and the one who spoke first in this debate (Mr. KEYES) undertook to prove—what is reduced to almost arithmetical certainty—that the first enlistment is fairly off the stage, and the last well turned of sixty, and a few more days will light their "way to dusty death." Yes, sir, labitur et labetur is applied to the progress of time, and I wish it may not with some propriety be applied to the Revolutionary course of the soldiers; for in truth, from the evidence before us, they put me very much in mind of the buckram gentry, who, instead of diminishing, multiply in a geometrical ratio. The system, sir, is wrong in itself; and the more it is attempted to be mended, the worse it is for the nation.

Mr. McCoy moved to lay the bill on the table, which was lost; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

TUESDAY, March 26.

Project of the French citizen, Mons. Franchieu, for the Protection of the Liberty of the Press.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two pamphlets which had been transmitted to him as Speaker, by Monsieur Franchieu, a citizen of France, containing a project for the protection of the liberty of the press, which he desired to be laid before the House of Representatives. They were ordered to lie on the table.

Revolutionary Pension Bill.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the acts providing for the relief of certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," was read the third time.

And, on the question, "Shall the said bill pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 23.

Expenditures on Public Buildings.

Mr. NELSON, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings, made the following report:

The Committee on the Expenditures on the Public Buildings, report: That it appears from the statement of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, laid before the committee, that his disbursements on account of the centre building of the Capitol, during the year 1821, were as follows, viz:

For materials - - - -	$32,209 50
For freight, warfage, drayage, tools, smith's bill, fuel, stationery, &c. -	7,922 49
For compensation to architect, clerk, and three persons at the head of carvers', stonecutters', and carpenters' departments - - - -	8,250 00
For labor, including pay of five persons employed as foremen and overseers -	53,932 30

Amount expended on centre building of Capitol, in 1821 - - - -	$102,814 29
And there was expended upon the President's House, in the same year, the sum of - - - -	5,405 32
For old Executive offices - - - -	5,736 67
For ground around the Capitol - - - -	2,017 56

Amount expended on the public buildings and Capitol square, in 1821 -	$115,478 84
---	--------------

Appropriations.

March 3, 1821. For the work on centre building of Capitol, in addition to unexpended balances of appropriations to other buildings - - -	$80,000 00
--	-------------

January 1, 1821. The unexpended balance of former appropriations for the centre building, as appears by the Commissioner's letter, of the 25th of January, 1821, was - - - -	35,664 19
--	-----------

The unexpended balance of appropriations of the 11th of April, 1820, for wings of Capitol and Senate Chamber, transferred by act of 3d March, 1821, was - - - -	993 23
---	--------

March 3, 1819. For covering the old Executive offices with Slate - - -	10,000 00
--	-----------

March 3, 1821. For covering the roof of the President's house with copper -	7,845 00
---	----------

March 3, 1821. For graduating and improving the ground around the Capitol - - - -	2,000 00
---	----------

Amount applicable to public buildings and Capitol square, in 1821 - - -	$136,502 45
---	--------------

From the foregoing statement it will be perceived that, with the exception of a small excess in the disbursement on Capitol square, the expenditures have been kept within the appropriations; that, on the 1st January, 1822, there was an unexpended balance of appropriations for the centre building and wings of the Capitol, of $14,343 16, applicable to the work on the centre building; and that the amount of the sums expended upon the President's house, the old Executive offices, and the ground around the Capitol, in 1821, is less by $6,685 45 than the amount of appropriations for those objects, by the acts of the 3d of March, 1819, and the 3d of March, 1821. An appropriation of $700 by the act of the 3d of March, 1821, for improvements in the Senate Chamber, and in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and in the Library, is not embraced in the above statement. The committee are of opinion that the materials were purchased at moderate prices; that the labor was procured on reasonable terms; and that the work has been executed in a substantial and workmanlike manner.

The report was, on motion of Mr. NELSON, ordered to lie on the table.

Florida Territorial Government—Refusal to Extend "the Principles of the Constitution" to the Territory for the Protection of Liberty, Property, and Religion; and the Grant of the same Protection under the Ordinance of '87, and the Treaty of Cession.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on a bill from the Senate to establish a Territorial government in Florida.

Mr. HILL proposed to insert in the 20th line of seventh section, after the word "court," the words who shall reside in or near St. Augustine and Pensacola, respectively." The amendment was supported by the mover, and opposed by Messrs. SERGEANT and MOORE, of Alabama, when the question was put, and the amendment negatived.

Many amendments were proposed and considered; among which were two by Mr. SANDERS, of North Carolina, which gave rise to some debate, one of which was withdrawn by the mover, and the other was adopted. Among the gentlemen who proposed or spoke to amendments, were Messrs. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, BURTON, RHEA, and many others.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, after a few prefatory remarks, submitted, as a substitute for a section which it was proposed to strike out, the following:

And be it further enacted, That all the principles of the United States Constitution, for the security of civil and religious freedom, and for the security of property, and the sacredness of rights to things in action; and all the prohibitions to legislation, as well with respect to Congress as the Legislatures of the States, be, and the same are hereby declared to be, applicable to the said Territory, as paramount acts.

Mr. RHEA said he would vote against striking out the section under consideration. We have, said he, lately obtained the sovereignty of Florida. The people inhabiting that country have not long been comprehended within the territory of the United States. The ninth [tenth] section of the bill contains three great principles, namely: one securing the right of conscience, one securing personal liberty, and another securing the right of property. The people of Florida (except citizens of the United States who may have removed there either temporarily or permanently) know little of our constitution and laws; to these they are strangers. Many principles of the Constitution of the United States require laws of the United States to carry them into operation. It has been intimated that the Constitution of the United States covers the people of Florida, and that is sufficient. The treaty whereby Spain ceded Florida to the United States might as well be urged in this argument as the Constitution of the United States; for that treaty provides for the security of the people of Florida in the enjoyment of their religion, and personal liberty, and right of property. The Constitution of the United States provides that new States may be admitted into this Union; the treaty with Spain provides that the people of Florida shall, in due time, be admitted into this Union; but laws of the United States, providing for such admission, are necessary. Who has heard of a new State being admitted into this Union without laws of the United States providing for such admission? This "bill for the establishment of a Territorial government in Florida," provides that certain laws of the United States shall have full force and effect in Florida. The reasons urged for striking out the ninth section may, with equal propriety, be urged for striking out the eighth section of this bill, which provides that the said laws shall be in force and obtain in Florida, because the eighth section of the first article, and the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States give power to Congress to enact such laws. That the Constitution of the United States shall obtain and have full force and effect in a territory not included within the bounds and limits of the territories of the old thirteen States, or either of them, but which has been acquired by treaty from any foreign power since the adoption of that constitution, and that the inhabitants of such territory shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities, sanctioned and confirmed by the constitution to citizens of the United States; it appears necessary and consistent with the Constitution of the United States, that the sovereign people shall, by the Congress of the United States, enact laws preparatory to, and declaratory of, the admission of such territory to a participation of the rights, &c., derived from the constitution, and afterwards to be admitted a State of this Union on the same footing as one of the original States; the people of such new State will then have their full representation in both Houses of Congress of the United States, and then the Constitution of the United States is in full operation in and over such new States as it is in one of the original States.

Religious liberty, the right to worship the Eternal, agreeably to the dictates of conscience, is the highest right a human being can possess. The treaties made by the United States with foreign powers, by which territory has been acquired, do guarantee religious liberty—the right to worship the Eternal, agreeably to the dictates of conscience, to the people of that acquired territory. The first article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, declares that Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the exercise thereof—the Constitution of the United States guarantees to each State a republican form of government; and the constitution of each State respectively guarantees to the citizens thereof the freedom of religious opinions, professions, or worship—and the citizens are protected in their liberty and property. The ninth section of this bill provides that the inhabitants of Florida shall be protected in their liberty, property, and the exercise of their religion; thereby confirming, by the sovereign powers of the United States, the rights which the Florida treaty reserved to them.

This ninth section, so far as it goes, may be considered as a constitution containing principles of a permanent nature; on which is bottomed, so far as this bill provides, the constitutional compact of the people of the United States with the people of Florida; this section declares to the inhabitants of Florida that they shall be protected in their liberty, property, and the exercise of their religion—and it notifies them that no law shall ever be valid, which shall impair, or in any way restrain them in the freedom of their religious opinions, professions, or worship.

In all ages, men who sincerely worshipped the Almighty, in any manner or form, have deemed the rights of conscience and the freedom of religious opinions most sacred; of this right they have been most tenacious, and have suffered persecution of every kind rather than surrender or give it up to the arbitrary will of others. The inhabitants of Florida are presumed to be tenacious of their religious opinions, as well as of their liberty and rights of property. They may have been informed that the Florida treaty provides that they shall possess these rights—they may understand that they are to be admitted as soon as possible into this Union, under the Constitution of the United States; let the ninth section of this bill be retained, and they will be expressly informed that the rights enumerated in this section are to them confirmed by the sovereign power of the United States.

The question was then taken upon striking out the 10th section, (of which Mr. MONTGOMERY's amendment was proposed to be inserted as a substitute,) and the motion was lost.*

* This prompt rejection of Mr. Montgomery's proposition, shows what the Congress of 1822 thought of the right of territories to the enjoyment of any part of the Constitution of the United States. The proposition was to extend, not the constitution generally, but the "principles" of it, in three enumerated cases, to the territory; and it was rejected upon the ground that the "principles" of the constitution required laws of Congress to put them into operation; and also upon the ground that the bill itself contained the three principles, (as all territorial bills did from the ordinance of 7 down to the present time.) The three principles were: protection to liberty, property, and religion; so that the only question between Mr. Montgomery's proposition and the clause already in the bill was, as to the tenure by which these rights should be held; whether under the Constitution of the United States, or under a law of Congress and the treaty of cession. And the decision was, that they should be held under the law and the treaty. Thus a direct issue was made between constitutional rights on one hand, and

Mr. WALKER then moved to amend the bill so as to authorize the people of Florida to elect their Legislative Council. The question was taken and lost—ayes 15.

Mr. COLDEN called for the reading of a memorial of certain citizens of the city of New York, praying for the suppression of slavery in Florida, and which had been referred to this committee; and the memorial was read.

The committee then rose and reported the bill as amended to the House, when the amendments were respectively concurred in.

Mr. HILL moved to amend the 7th line of the 5th section, by inserting after the word "law," the words "which is now in force or which shall hereafter be passed."

The amendment was opposed by Mr. McDURFILL, and negatived.

Mr. MONTGOMERY again submitted the substitute he had offered in the Committee of the Whole, which was again negatived.

No further amendment having been offered, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 27.

The House took up and proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the petition of the General Assembly of Alabama, for permission to tax certain lands; and the said report was again ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARFIELD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sufficient sum of money to turnpike the post road leading from the city of Washington to Fredericktown, in the State of Maryland.

the discretion of Congress on the other, in the government of this territory, and decided promptly, and without debate (for there was no speech after that of Mr. Rhea on either side,) against the constitution. It was tantamount to the express declaration, "You shall have these principles which are in the constitution; but not as a constitutional right, nor even as a grant under the constitution, but as a justice flowing from our discretion, and as an obligation imposed by the treaty which transferred you to our sovereignty." This is the language which this legislation speaks; and I defy any language to be more explicit—more to the point—or more authoritative.

The following is the tenth section of the bill, granting these rights to the territory, and other rights, constituting, in fact, its constitution:

"Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That to the end that the inhabitants may be protected in their liberty, property, and the exercise of their religion, no law shall ever be valid which shall impair, or in any way restrain, the freedom of religious opinions, professions, or worship. They shall be entitled to the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus. They shall be bailable, in all cases, except for capital offences, where the proof is evident or the presumption great. All fines shall be moderate and proportioned to the offence; and excessive bail shall not be required, nor cruel or unusual punishments inflicted. No ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall ever be passed; nor shall private property be taken for public uses, without just compensation."

Fugitive Slaves.

[MARCH, 1822.]

And the question being taken thereon, the resolution was negatived.

Mr. REID called for the consideration of a resolution submitted by him yesterday, for placing a glass ceiling under the dome of the Representative Hall, but the House refused to consider the same, ayes 52, noes 64.

Mr. REID submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That the canvas lately covering the Hall, be replaced, under the direction of the Speaker.

But the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. COOK called for the consideration of the bill for the relief of James McFarland. The House agreed to consider the same, and concurred in the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole. On the question of engrossing the bill for a third reading, it was opposed by Messrs. COOKE, ALEXANDER, and MCCOY, and supported by Messrs. COOK, STERLING, of New York, and MOORE, of Alabama; when, after a further amendment, at the suggestion of Mr. RANKIN, had been adopted, the said bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message was received from the Senate announcing the disagreement of that House to an amendment to the bill granting certain lots of lands in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile, &c.; and, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the House receded from their amendment, and the bill was passed.

Col. Trumbull's Paintings.

The joint resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. BLACKLEDGE, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, relative to the proper disposition of the paintings of Colonel Trumbull, was called up, and, by unanimous consent, the following substitute was received in lieu thereof :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, consisting of three members, jointly with such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to examine and report to the respective Houses the most eligible disposition to be made of the national paintings executed by Colonel Trumbull, under the authority of Congress.

The resolution was ordered to be laid on the table.

Government of Florida.

The bill from the Senate providing for the establishment of a territorial government in Florida, with the amendments adopted in this House, was then read a third time.

The question on the passage of the bill was then taken without debate, and carried without opposition. [The bill has to go back to the Senate for concurrence in the amendments.]

Fugitive Slaves.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape to any other State or Territory.

No amendment having been proposed to the first section of the bill, the second was read, when

Mr. COLDEN moved to strike from the different parts thereof where they occurred, the words "or justice," so as to limit the exercise of the power contained in that section, to judges of a court of record. He contended that the great powers contemplated, ought not to be given to justices of the peace, who were, in rank, the most inferior officers to whom the administration of justice is confided.

Mr. WRIGHT replied, and observed that he had no great objection to this specific proposition; nor did he wish to extend the powers contemplated by the bill to justices of the peace, but contended that the word justice, in the bill, was used in its primitive sense. Mr. W. extended his remarks to considerable length, not only in respect to the amendment, but on the general principles of the bill, which he contended were in conformity to the constitution, which each member of the House was sworn to observe.

Mr. MOORE, of Virginia, observed that he felt a strong and peculiar interest in the passage of the bill. He thought he should be correct in saying that the district he represented sustained an annual loss of four or five thousand dollars by runaway slaves. The law of 1793 was inadequate to the object it proposed to effect; and he believed a bill of this sort was indispensably necessary, and urged a variety of reasons in favor of the principle of the bill.

Mr. COLDEN then withdrew, the amendment he had proposed, and moved to strike out the enacting clause to test the principle of the bill. He observed that no man would go further than he would to give effect to the constitution, which all agreed to denominate sacred. He was not one of those visionary philanthropists who would contend for immediate and universal emancipation. He was aware that such an attempt was impracticable, however greatly it was to be desired. As a primary consideration, it was first to be determined whether this bill contained any necessary and valuable provisions beyond those already existing, and under this view of the subject he examined with minuteness the present laws on the subject, and contrasted them with the provisions of the bill. He thought the latter were inconsistent with the principles of liberty, and had a direct and efficient agency to promote the traffic which had been carried on to a great extent of seizing free blacks and selling them for slaves. He contended that it was not competent to violate the principles of civil liberty merely because some districts had sustained injury, as had been expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MOORE.)

Mr. WRIGHT believed that the bill was sufficiently guarded for the protection of civil liberty—expressed his devotion to its cause, and to the principles of the constitution, and his wish that the gentleman from New York (Mr. COLDEX) would unite in guarding the bill from encroachments upon that instrument, if he feared it was about to be impaired. Mr. W. referred to cases that had occurred in Maryland and elsewhere, which called imperiously for the passage of the bill.

After some further remarks by Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, against the motion, and by Mr. CHAMBERS in support of it, Mr. WOODCOCK moved that the committee rise and report progress, which was agreed to, and leave was given to the committee to sit again.

THURSDAY, March 28.

Vaccination.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution of this House, requiring that committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the law of 1818, on the subject of vaccination, moved that the said committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. BURTON said that it was a matter of much more importance than those not immediately interested believed it to be. Ten of our fellow-creatures, he said, had lost their lives—and by whom? By the act of a man who styled himself the agent of the United States, and a law of the United States had placed it in his power to do this irreparable injury. If this subject was not to be inquired into, what would be the impression on the public mind? Would not the boasted protection of life, liberty, and property, be considered a solemn farce, if the lives of our fellow-citizens were to be taken, and passed over with the same indifference as if there had been so many cattle slaughtered? My object, said Mr. B., is to repeal the law, or place the institution on a more respectable footing, and make the agent in some way responsible, that the same accident may not again occur. He further said, he believed he could prove, to the satisfaction of any impartial mind, that the present agency was not only a nuisance, but a nuisance of the most dangerous kind.

Mr. B. then moved that the subject should be referred to a select committee.

Messrs. BURTON, HALL, WHIFFLE, HOLCOMBE, and DARLINGTON, were appointed said select committee.

South American Governments.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, recommending the recognition of the independence of the South American provinces, and proposing an appropriation to carry the same into effect.

The resolutions with which the report concludes are as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives concur in the opinion expressed by the President, in his Message of the 8th of March, 1822, that the American provinces of Spain, which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognized by the United States as independent nations.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill appropriating a sum, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, to enable the President of the United States to give due effect to such recognition.

Mr. TRIMBLE said, that as he had, some weeks past, offered a resolution requesting the President to acknowledge the independence of all the South American Governments, and as the proposition before the committee was in accordance with his feelings and his wishes, it might be expected here, as he was sure it would elsewhere, that he should say something on the occasion. When he offered the resolution referred to, it was his intention to discuss the subject freely and at large. He would have entered upon that discussion with much zeal he was sure, but, he feared, without much ability. Happily, the Message and documents had given a new face to the whole subject, and saved the people the unpleasant necessity of expressing an opinion against the course of policy which their fears had prepared them to expect. Had the President failed to recommend the recognition of those Governments, impartial history—if men may look dimly into futurity—would have torn from his temples the garland which a grateful country had placed there, as a reward for his public and revolutionary services. But he has not failed. Faithful to the principles which gave birth to our own revolution, and regardless of the voice and wishes of his country, he has recommended an acknowledgment of all the nations of America. It was a Message of good tidings to twenty millions of freemen. It fills up the measure of his fame, and now he may go down to the grave, with his patriot compeers, ripe in age, and full of honor and renown.

Mr. T. congratulated the President and the country, and the friends of freedom every where, upon the great political event just struggling into birth. The friends of America, he said, are not called upon now, as formerly, to show that its Governments are independent. The President affirms the fact, and none will question his veracity. The letters of Mr. Torres prove all that is material to know, and the Message admits his statements to be true. They are known to be so by all Europe and America. Those letters, said Mr. T., do honor to the heart and head that wrote them. They equal in merit the finest State papers of the age. Colombia may claim the writer and the facts as hers, but the papers are the property of nations. Free governments will preserve them as invaluable treasures. Such a man is an ornament to his country, as his country is an ornament to others. Every thing, he said, from that Republic fills us with admiration. The valor of its armies—the patriotism of the people—their devotion to the cause of independence, entitle them to our profound regard. But, above all, their constitution, similar in all its important features to our own, is most flattering to our pride, and most consoling to our hopes. We have the best authority for believing that Buenos Ayres, Chili, and Peru, are advancing in the science of self-government; and, although we know but little of the internal affairs of Mexico, yet what we do know gives assurances that it also has a Bolivar. Much, it would seem, is in the power of Iturbide. Let us hope that he will not sacrifice his country on the altar of ambition, and that Mexico, like Colombia, will have its Washington.

He did not intend, he said, to trouble the committee with a history of the rise and progress of the Revolution; nor to array before them the great events which had conducted the Spanish colonies to independence. He would omit a summary of sieges; "of battles lost and won;" of invading armies, and the means and measures taken to conquer or expel them; nor would he digress into statistical estimates or geographical details, especially as all these were better known to a member near him, (Mr. POINSETT,) who, he hoped, would assist the committee with his information; and also to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NELSON,) both of whom, he was sure, would be listened to with much pleasure by the House.

One fact, said Mr. T., is clear: All the Spanish nations of America are free. They have all thrown off the yoke of Spain, "holding her as they do the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends." Each has declared itself independent, and all enjoy the rights of self-government, under the guarantee of written constitutions, adopted or preparing for adoption. Hitherto we have maintained a strict neutrality between the two Spains. We shall do the same in future, but there is a period beyond which nations cannot safely refuse to acknowledge the independence of each other. No statesman has asserted, or will assert, unless he intends to invite the execrations of his country, that we ought always to refuse a recognition. All agree that we must, at some time or other, act upon the subject. The President informs us that the time has come, and there ought to be but one opinion about the manner of making the acknowledgment. The respect which free Governments owe to themselves, and to each other, ought to decide the question. It was the known usage, he said, among crowned heads, to send ambassadors of the highest rank to each other, and ministers of the lowest grades to republics; and for that very reason, republics ought to send ambassadors of the highest rank to each other, and ministers of the lowest grade to crowned heads. This ought to be decisive, in extraordinary cases like the present. He would not advance an opinion as to the number of ministers that ought to be sent out, but he felt himself bound to say, in justice to the country, that ambassadors extraordinary ought to be sent to Colombia and Mexico; and if ever the best talent in the nation ought to be selected for a mission, this was surely the occasion. If a free people ought at any period to appear in all their weight of character and talent, arrayed in all the pride of plain republican simplicity, this was the time. He was much mistaken if the country would tolerate any selection, made from among citizens of second rate capacity.

Mr. T. said the nations of America had suffered more from the severity of commercial interdictions and colonial monopoly, than they had from the cruelty of arbitrary power—that commercial vassalage had been more oppressive to them than political dependence; and that they are as deeply interested in the establishment of free trade as they are of free government—that the radical change made in their political condition would necessarily be attended with a corresponding change in their commercial intercourse and maritime relations—that their case, in all its aspects, was similar to that of the United States, and would terminate in similar results—that the entire emancipation of the new from the old continent could only be effected by two great revolutions: the one political, the other commercial—that both had commenced in the United States under the most favorable auspices, and were progressing southward in the "full tide of successful experiment"—that these revolutions had been preceded by a "wide-spread range" of moral reformation—that the new hemisphere had produced a new catalogue of civil maxims—a new family of political institutions—a new code of commercial regulations—that all civilized nations were under the dominion of two great social systems, differing widely from each other—that one was established in the Occidental, the other in the Oriental world—that the spirit of the age was against the European system—that the American system had invaded Europe, and spread alarm and consternation everywhere among its kings and emperors—that a coalition of crowned heads was created to oppose it, and two millions of armed men embodied to expel it from that continent. And what, said he, are these systems? What is the American system? Why is it that it agitates two worlds? Why should kings shudder at it, while their subjects bid it welcome? Of what is it composed? What is the element that thus, when unresisted, operates unseen, but, when opposed, launches its thunderbolts at diadems, and shakes the nations like an earthquake? It has two aspects, two essential principles—one political, the other commercial. The first is known and distinguished by written constitutions, representative government, religious toleration, freedom of opinion, of speech, and of the press. The second, by sailors' rights, free trade, and freedom of the seas. Contrast it with the European system. The political character of that system is aristocracy, monarchy, imperial government, arbitrary power, passive obedience, and unconditional submission. Its commercial character is prohibition, restriction, interdiction, impressment, colonial monopoly, and maritime domination. These systems, said he, are the antipodes of each other. They are sworn enemies, and cannot harmonize.

The American system is free government and free trade; monarchy and monopoly is that of Europe. But the European system is artificial, and will perish with the spurious causes that produced it. The American system is natural, and, therefore, durable—natural, because it springs from public opinion—from the embodied will of nations acting freely for themselves; durable, because it reposes upon written constitutions. Its first appearance struck the despots with dismay. Our Revolution gave it birth. Its nativity was cast among these States. It grows with their growth, and strengthens with their strength. The impulse of the age accelerates its motion. Nothing can impede its march, because it moves in the majesty of national opinion, and public opinion is a power that cannot be resisted. From every zone we hear of Congresses, elected by the people, assembled and assembling to establish written constitutions. The system spreads like light—its rays fall everywhere. The nations hail it as the harbinger of peace and happiness. They act wisely in laboring to adopt it, seeing that the people of this Union have prospered under it beyond all former parallel. He said that the tendency of the American system was manifest to every statesman. That its political progress and extension could be seen by every observer, and time would develop its maritime results. A single instance would explain its commercial operation. The continent is free; not so, the islands. Europe, as to them, will continue its system of colonial monopoly—its system of interdictions, prohibitions, and restrictions. These will act and re-act upon all the Americas, but more especially upon Colombia, Mexico, and the United States. Those powers will retaliate, and unite in their retaliation. The common injury will find a common remedy. They will adopt the counter-check of navigation laws, and, by simultaneously protecting regulations, exclude all foreign tonnage from their ports and harbors. A blow like that, he said, would be decisive. It would forever prostrate the colonial system, and open a free trade to all the islands. The measure, when adopted, would finish the commercial revolution. It would subvert the whole system of maritime domination, and restore the freedom of the seas. And thus the Americas, by the reaction of internal laws and regulations, well concerted and well directed, may enforce their system of free trade. Thus, without the waste of blood or treasure, they may sustain the general system, and vindicate the rights and honor of the continent. Hitherto, he said, the American system of free trade had been struggling, single-handed, with the European system of colonial monopoly, and had maintained itself against the fearful odds. Hereafter, all the Americas will co-operate. The subject ought to have their prompt attention. It required a careful examination, because the course of policy to be adopted by them would settle, finally and forever, whether the American system shall prevail, or that of Europe triumph over it.

Mr. T. was anxious to show, for various reasons, that the great interests of the West India Islands were in unison with the interests of the continent, and for that purpose went at some length into an explanation of their present condition, and their future prospects. It was his opinion that they would soon throw off the yoke of Europe, and declare their independence. Perhaps they would form a league, and Cuba, in that event, would be the head. Perhaps they would claim a guarantee, and become dependencies of the American nations. In any event, he said, they would adopt the American system, because their interests are all American, and their moral feelings and social habits are acclimating themselves, and every day becoming anti-European.

If, said he, we consider this subject in reference to ourselves, and our relations, foreign and domestic, we shall find no solid reasons for delay. If we consult the great political and commercial interests of the Americas, we shall find inducements to hasten the acknowledgment. It is agreed, he said, that those nations are able to maintain their independence. That their means of defence are superior to any armament with which the mother country can assail them. That they exercise all the various powers of self-government, legislative, executive, and judicial; the powers of peace and war; of protection and defence. That they make and administer domestic laws, and regulate all intercourse with foreign nations, and enforce these regulations. In this situation we must either recognize them as free and independent, or put them in abeyance, by a denial of their rights, and thereby incur all the injuries which might justly be inflicted on our commerce with them. No nation has a right to ask another to do itself a voluntary injury—the laws of neutrality do not involve such dangerous and onerous consequences—Governments, like men, owe duties to each other, and a failure to perform them is often punished by national compunction, and forfeiture of reputation. The first duty of one people to another is to declare who shall be respected as members of the great family of nations—the power and the right to do so, exists in every government, no matter what may be its form. There is no other mode, save that of military force, by which the peace and harmony of nations can be kept in preservation. And shall the people of this continent forego the advantages of free and friendly intercourse, to indulge the mother country in her love of dominion? Shall we, as a nation, stifle all our sympathies in favor of free governments, to gratify the vain-glorious pride of Spain? If we do, we shall betray the rights and interests of republics. Heaven, in giving freedom to us first, made it our primal eldest duty to go forth first, and acknowledge it in others. Honor and duty call alike upon us to perform the rightful obligation. The same Providence that gave us succor in the perils of our Revolutionary struggle, is conducting the other nations of America, through bloody wars, to peace and independence. Our approbation may inspire them with fresh confidence, and stimulate their love of liberty. If there are any who have fears that the proposed acknowledgment will produce a war with Spain, let them remember that Cuba is a hostage for her peace. The moment she fires a gun at us, we shall occupy that island, and her dominion over it will cease forever. And England, in aiding Spain, would only hasten the downfall of her favorite colonial system—a coalition between Colombia, Mexico, and the United States, would convince her of her folly. It would be better for us if our statesmen would look less eastward, and more southward than they do at present.

Some statesmen hold, he said, that nations, whose political principles and opinions have been formed in the school of despotism, must undergo long periods of probationary preparation, before they can be qualified to manage the affairs of self-government. This is but a modification of the exploded maxim, "that the people know not how to govern,"—that kings must save them from their worst enemies, themselves. Such opinions, if true, form no argument against the policy or justice of acknowledging the nations of America. If true, in former ages, and on the old continent, they are more than doubtful in modern times, and in the new hemisphere. The fact is, that the present and past ages are alike in nothing. The whole civilized world is under the dominion of a different mind. Men and nations are shaking off their mental imbecilities, and preparing themselves to regulate their own affairs. It was necessary that moral regeneration should precede political reform; and thus it has happened. A great moral revolution has occurred, and is occurring. The spirit of the age is busy—reformation is everywhere at work, and upon all subjects. We see the beginning, not the end of revolutions. No statesman, no nation, should mistake the character and fashion of the times. Every thing, in fifty years, has changed, and every thing is changing. "Nothing of the future will resemble what is past." We live in the crisis of all ages. The whole civilized world is laboring in a crisis—a great moral crisis—a great political crisis—a great commercial crisis. Nations have changed their moral characters, and political opinions and Governments must change their form and purpose. Formerly, the sword was umpire of the world; and then the maxim grew, that nations were incapable of self-command. Now, public opinion is the great chancellor of nations. All tongues and kindreds own its jurisdiction, and kings and subjects are submissive to its rule; none dare oppose its high authority—none with impunity resist its just decrees. Wars were fought formerly, for families, and dynasties; for the rights of thrones, and prerogatives of crowns; and then, the people were assuredly their own worst enemies. Now, men fight for written constitutions; for the rights of man and prerogatives of nations; and fighting, learn to govern for themselves. The contest now is not between dynasties and diadema, but between creeds, and principles, and institutions. Nations formerly had no volition; kings thought and acted for them, rudely pretending that their subjects had no capacity for affairs of State. But now, the will of nations has supremacy of rank, and speaks by delegation in assembled Congresses; and now, we find more talent—more patriotic feeling—more public virtue—more every thing, that strengthens and improves the social system. Time was, when kings held power by arrogation, and used it at their pleasure and discretion; and then the people were denounced as "a many-headed monster." The people now reclaim all power as inherent in themselves, and delegate it only as a trust; and now nations are more peaceful, more prosperous, more happy, and more just, than formerly. History speaks only of alliances, or wars, between contemporary despots—now, nothing is talked of but Congresses, and Constitutions, and Representative Governments; and do we find things changing for the worse! The spirit of the age is, peace and moderation. It is the spirit of free government and written constitutions. Its conservative principles are—wide-spread knowledge, equality of rights, freedom of opinion, and frequent and free elections. The spirit of past ages was war and domination. The trade of man, of all the sons of men, was war—from the first conqueror down to '76. It was the storm of empires. It raged unspent and unabated. It swept along the field of time, and all was desolation that was left. It had no limits but the margin of the world. Its stream of blood flowed on from age to age; its sources, like the Nile, unknown, lost in the desert of forgotten years; but still, the stream rolled on, increasing with a thousand tributary torrents, and spreading far and wide its overwhelming floods. Such was the history, he said, of past times, and of the olden world. Our continent, on the contrary, is the chosen land of liberty—vineyard of the God of peace; and we, its husbandmen, selected by the unseen will of Providence to till the soil, and feed the famished nations with the food of independence. Let us perform the sacred trust impartially. It is our duty, as a free people, not to sanction, but refute the heresies that nations are incapable of managing their own concerns. They have disabused themselves by illustrious examples, and we should be careful not to weaken their effect.

It was the will of Providence, he said, that this continent should be the arena of successive revolutions—of moral, and political, and commercial revolutions—the theatre of man's political regeneration—the hemisphere in which nations should be reinstated in their rights, and reinvested of their “long-lost liberty.” On the 4th of July, 1776, the Congress of the thirteen States declared their independence. On this day, (28th March, 1822,) the assembled Congress of the Union will announce the independence of all the nations of America. These are glorious epochs. Let history commemorate them as co-essential in the works of reformation. Freemen are this day called upon to fraternize with freemen; nations to fraternize with nations. All the Americas are summoned to embrace as friends and equals, and make a lasting covenant of peace. It is not the flight of a false prophet, or the foundation of a city; the birthday of a petty chieftain, or an heir-apparent, that we are assembled here to celebrate. No; a continent has disenchained itself, and stands unfettered and erect. It is the birthday of a hemisphere redeemed. It is the jubilee of nations. Let the world rejoice.

If experience and long-suffering can create the faculties of self-government, then the people of America are prepared to manage and control their own affairs. For three long centuries they “clanked the chains” of lawless power; for three long lingering ages they felt the “keen lash” and galling yoke of despotism—each generation leaving its manacles to posterity as their only heritage. Continued agonies had worn away the memory of better times. The light of hope had left the Children of the Sun, and dark despair, like soporific drugs, had stupefied the powers of will and faculties of life. They slept to mitigate their pain; for nations sleep and never die. But the day of their deliverance was at hand. The Spirit of God was abroad in the sky. It called, and the slumbering nations awoke. It breathed the electric fire of freedom on the air, and a whole continent ran simultaneously to arms! One great, one godlike purpose animated all—it was death or independence! Like us, they pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, to live as freemen, or die in its defence. They fought from field to field. A thousand battles left the cause in doubt; a thousand passions mingled in the fray; and all that history has told of savage cruelty, ferocious vengeance, rapine, plunder, treachery, cold-blooded massacre, and every violence and every crime that shocks humanity, was perpetrated over and over again upon all ages, sexes, and conditions. But the God of Battles fought on freedom's side, and, sickening at the scene of carnage and of desolation, and hastening to end it, he took a Bolívar and consecrated him a Washington, and putting in his hand a flaming sword, commanded him to go forth to the uttermost ends of the continent, conquering and to conquer, until oppression should surcease, and man learn tyranny no more. And behold the work is finished, and Colombia is free, and all the Americas are free—free as ourselves; for there all power is acknowledged in the people, and vassalage abolished and unknown; for there all officers are elective, and held by the tenure of the law and the constitution; for there, free in their property, their persons, and religion—

“They own no Lord but him in heaven,
No power but what consent has given.”

Mr. POINSETT addressed the chair as follows:

I shall offer, said Mr. P., no apology to the committee for addressing them on this occasion. I have resided so long in the countries we are now called upon to place in the rank of nations—am so intimately acquainted with the causes and character of the revolution they have undergone, that I feel it to be my duty to convey to the committee, as briefly as I can, the information I possess on this subject.

Sir, if ever there was an occasion that justified a revolution, that called upon a people to recur to first principles, and to seek relief from the abuse of power by an appeal to arms, this was one. The revolution of the Spanish colonies did not arise from a mere question of abstract right, but from actual suffering and grievous oppression; from causes radical and certain, though gradual in their operations; causes that would have inevitably produced the revolution without the violent crisis to which the mother country was exposed, and which only accelerated that event. It was felt in their Government, in the administration of justice, in their agriculture, in their commerce, and in their pursuits of happiness. Governed by viceroys responsible in name, but, in fact, as arbitrary as the King of Spain himself, who commanded not only the military governors and intendants of provinces, but presided over the tribunals of justice, and let any one imagine what government the miserable colonist must have enjoyed under European Spaniards vested with such powers, and who had nothing to dread but an examination of their conduct before a tribunal, two thousand leagues from the theatre of their injustice. The colonist could not even enjoy the natural advantages by which he was surrounded.

The eyes of a jealous and suspicious Government constantly watched the progress of his industry. No sooner did a settlement betray symptoms of prosperity, than it became the subject of oppressive legislation, and was overwhelmed by a swarm of officers, who, like locusts, destroyed the fair prospects of the harvest. The trade was not only confined to certain specified articles, but to a few favored towns. Rich as these favored regions are, and capable of bringing forth the productions of every climate, possessing great facilities of internal and of foreign commerce, they were reduced to indolence and penury by absurd and oppressive restrictions on their industry, on their trade, and on their private enjoyments. Without a market for their produce, it rotted on the ground. I have seen the most fertile districts of that fine country barren and desolate—I have seen the inhabitants, surrounded by all the bounties of nature, destitute of the ordinary comforts of civilized society. To those who have followed the progress of this revolution, and compared it with our own, the difference must appear striking, and from the civil dissensions that have agitated those countries, it has been argued by some that the Spanish Creoles were incapable of enjoying the blessings of liberty—were unfit for self-government. In making this comparison between the two countries, it ought never to be forgotten that our civil and political institutions, our habits, our customs, our laws, our rights of property, scarcely suffered any alteration by the transition from a colonial to an independent state. The principles of free government, republican principles, had deep root in this country before our Revolution; and if they have grown with our growth, and strengthened with our strength, they were as well understood then as now. The Spanish colonies had never been intrusted, as we had, with any part of the internal administration, and were ignorant and unpractised in government. The means of education, I mean of a liberal and enlightened education, were withheld from the Creole; printing presses were to be found only in a few of the larger cities, where, under a rigid inspection, a gazette and an almanac were permitted to be published. The policy of Spain repressed the advancement of knowledge in her colonies—ignorance and superstition were the powerful means employed to keep them in subjection. The despot is aware that those who possess knowledge will struggle for freedom, and will achieve it; for knowledge is power. Dread of religious toleration, and of what was worse, of spoliation, excited the clergy to oppose the revolution. The influence they exercised over the minds of the people was unbounded; and, had not a few virtuous, well-enlightened priests espoused the cause of liberty, the colonies would still have been dependent. The aristocracy formed another and a powerful obstacle to the progress of this revolution—a class that abhor every constitution founded on an equality of rights—a class that would rather be deprived of those rights, than see all participate in them; that prefer any state of suffering, rather than see power exercised by their inferiors. I speak now of the mass of the titled men in the colonies. Some few were distinguished for their zeal in the cause of independence.

Another and very essential difference between the two countries, consisted in the number of Europeans, who had distinct privileges from the Creoles, for oppression did not there fall equally on all. They were, to be sure, the smaller party, but the wealth and power they possessed, their union, their influence, the habitual respect in which they were held, their ideas of their own superiority, rendered them a very formidable body. They were aware that their proud pretensions had roused against them a feeling of indignation; that the oppressive measures they had promoted against the interests of the land, had produced hatred and an eager thirst for revenge; and common interest and common danger united them against the Creoles. They could not suppress the revolution, but they retarded its progress, and procrastinated the contest. If, therefore, we regard the little advancement of these countries, their ignorance of the principles of government, their civil dissensions, and the procrastinated struggle for liberty after all opposition had ceased on the part of Spain, it impresses us more strongly with the urgent necessity that existed of shaking off the colonial Government. It was the Government that placed obstructions in the way of agriculture and commerce. It was the Government, that, forgetful of its primary obligations, suffered, nay, encouraged the daily violation of the rights and properties of its subjects. It was the Government, in short, that sought to keep the people in the profoundest ignorance, as the means of keeping them in subjection. A revolution proceeding from such causes, was not to be prevented by empty declarations of abstract rights, such as were made by the mother country when struggling for her own existence. The decrees of the different Governments established in Spain during that period, were magnificent in promise. The colonies were told they had the same rights as the mother country, but were treated as if they had none. They were deluded with hopes that were never realized, and were mocked with the semblance of a representation. Deputies assigned them, not elected by them. At no time was there more peculation, violence, and oppression, than during the interval between the invasion of Spain and the insurrection of the colonies. These causes operated alike on all, and the revolution commenced without previous concert, almost at the same moment in every part of this vast continent. It has triumphed not only over the opposition of the mother country, but over civil dissensions, and the storms of party. In Caraccas, where the revolution first commenced, its success was retarded by one of the most awful events recorded in history. The city was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake, on the anniversary of their revolutionary movement. The clergy availed themselves of this event, and, assisted by the superstition of the people, re-established, for a short time, the royal authority. The brave and patriotic Bolivar kept up the spirit of the revolution. His active exertions renewed the struggle for liberty; and his zeal and perseverance restored his country to freedom. By his conduct and valor, the most formidable armament ever sent across the Atlantic, has been destroyed. His efforts have united Caraccas and New Granada, into one Republic, and he has spread the principles of independence and of free government to the shores of the Pacific.

Buenos Ayres has triumphed over the repeated and formidable efforts of the mother country to subdue them. They have had, besides, to contend against a powerful party of royalists in the interior provinces. The wealthy Creoles of that country could not be easily roused to take an active part in a contest, the issue of which was uncertain. No doubt they preferred a national government, and freedom of commerce, but that was not strong enough to vanquish their love of repose and indolent habits; to urge them, in short, to long and painful sacrifices. The royalists are still in possession of some of the finest provinces of La Plata. The interior provinces of the viceroyalty of Lima are still in the hands of the royalists; were, I should have said, for it is reasonable to expect that the example of the capital will be followed by the provinces. Chili, agitated for some time by civil dissensions, and overrun by the army of the royalists, has at length established tranquillity at home; and not only driven out the invaders, but carried the war successfully into their stronghold. The revolution in Lima is due to the efforts of this brave people. Mexico, where the revolution commenced at an early period, and where, after a desperate struggle, it appeared to be quelled, is now independent. The spirit of the revolution continued to exist among the people. Hidalgo, and the gallant men who fell in the first revolutionary movement, did not perish in vain.

To prove the utter inability of Spain to recover possession of these countries, it is only necessary to take a view of their vast extent, of their population and resources, and to compare them with those of Spain, agitated as she now is, by intestine commotions, and, for many years past, regarded as the country of Europe the most destitute of industry, of commerce, and of enterprise. The mere recital of the names which distinguish the Spanish colonies in America, extending over 79 degrees of latitude, with a space of at least 1,900 leagues, interposed between its most distant settlements; the vast extent of their mountains, their magnificent rivers, the varied productions of the soil, the riches of their mines, impress us at once with the magnitude of their resources. Buenos Ayres, comprising the finest provinces of Peru, the rich mines of Potosi, and the fertile province of Cochabamba, with a population of one million and a half; coining annually upwards of five millions of dollars, exporting ten millions, and importing about the same amount. Chili, the garden of the world, possessing the most fertile soil, productive of all the fruits of Europe and of the tropics, equally rich in the precious and in the useful metals, with a population of more than one million, coining three millions of dollars annually, exporting four millions, and importing more than three millions. Lima, I mean the viceroyalty of Lima, including Cusco, the ancient capital of the Incas, with a population of 1,200,000 souls, coining annually five millions of dollars, importing ten millions, and exporting thirteen millions. New Granada, containing not less than two millions of inhabitants, with a trade of more than six millions of imports, coining annually three millions of dollars. Caraccas, with a million of inhabitants, and about the same resources as New Granada. These two countries have since been united under one Government, the Republic of Colombia. Guatemala, the country which comprises Costa Rica and Nicaragua, and bounds on New Granada, a fertile and well-cultivated country, containing one million and a half of souls. New Spain, or Mexico, contained, in 1808, a population of five millions nine hundred thousand, a population not likely to have been diminished since that period. Coining at that time twenty-three millions of dollars annually, importing twenty millions, and exporting between twenty and thirty millions. The detached governments contained nearly a million of inhabitants, making an aggregate of fifteen millions.

I will not detain the committee by going into an examination of the resources of each particular State. It will be sufficient for my purposes to particularize those of Mexico. The whole annual agricultural product of Mexico was estimated at twenty-nine millions of dollars; the annual product of the precious metals at twenty-three millions; the annual product of the manufactures at eight millions; the exports at twenty-two millions; the imports at twenty millions; the revenue of Mexico, for customs and taxes, amounted to not less than twenty millions.

If, says Baron Humboldt, the political strength of a nation depended only upon the extent of country and number of inhabitants, New Spain might rank with the United States. Such was the state of these countries under all the disadvantages of the colonial system, for I have purposely taken the statement previous to the revolution. Thus we see that the total population of the Spanish colonies exceeded fifteen millions; the imports were never less than sixty millions, and the exports seventy.

The estimated population of those countries is more likely to fall short of the truth, than to exceed it. The census was taken for the purposes of taxation, which induced the inhabitants to conceal their real numbers. And here let me remark, that this population is more effective, and the proportion of whites greater than has been generally supposed. The most favorable statement ever published of the population of Spain, previous to the late wars, made it amount to 10,409,879. A population much thinned by wars, and pestilence, and famine, within the last ten years. The exports of Spain amounted to about sixteen millions of dollars, and the imports to between fourteen and fifteen millions. Let me ask, then, whether it is probable that Spain, with not quite two-thirds the population, with inferior resources at all times, and those much diminished by this defection, can reconquer countries at a distance, some of them of two thousand leagues, and none less than one thousand? The history of Spain herself is an answer to this question. With a courage and energy that a determination to be free alone could give, Spain repelled the hosts of France that invaded her territory; weak in numbers and resources when compared to France, they successfully resisted the utmost efforts of that power to subdue them. One word, sir, on this subject. It is too much our custom to speak contemptuously of this brave and high-minded people; they were long bowed down by an iron despotism. But other days have dawned on that fair country; after resisting, with unexampled resolution, foreign usurpation, they have resolved to be free. Their sufferings from the vices and defects of long servitude, ought to excite our sympathies, and their efforts to establish free and liberal institutions, entitle them to our respect.

It has been supposed by some, that the independence of these colonies would injure the prosperity of the United States; possessing a more fertile soil, and raising the same productions, they would drive us from the markets of Europe. It has been said that colonies are safer neighbors than free States, and that so long as they were bound down by the oppressive restrictions of Spain, they would neither be dangerous rivals nor formidable competitors. It is unwise, therefore, in us to offer them any encouragement. Not only the best feelings of the heart revolt at such a conclusion, but it is manifestly false; it is our interest that they should be free. With an extensive line of coast, with numerous navigable rivers, facilitating their internal trade, with a population of more than fifteen millions, almost without manufactures, with a demand for one hundred millions of dollars, and without the means of carrying on their foreign commerce, these countries present a market for the skill and industry of our merchants, which promises the greatest advantages. Let any one look back and observe how the demand has everywhere increased with the increasing produce.

The wars and revolutions which have lately afflicted Europe, are known now only by their beneficial effects. Effects to be seen in the amelioration and extension of their agriculture, in the increase of their towns and villages, in the augmentation of manufactures, in the benefits of education, the desire of freedom, and in the general welfare and prosperity of the country. It is impossible to pass through any part of Europe, at present, without being struck with the improved condition of the people. An improvement which, as it advances, will augment the demand for all the productions of the West. The intercourse of the provinces of Spanish America with these countries, will augment their means of information, and will enlighten them on the subject of government, on public welfare and private happiness. With the increase of knowledge, will arise free and well-organized institutions, the refinements and various wants of civilization. This cannot fail to produce a demand for all the manufactures of this country, and for all the objects of trade. I had intended to have entered fully into the importance of our political relations with these countries. I fear, however, that I should exhaust the patience of the committee, were I to attempt it; and I feel that I should exhaust my own strength. I am compelled, therefore, however reluctantly, to waive this part of the subject. The question for the consideration of the committee is, whether we shall now adopt a measure called for by every motive of feeling and of policy, at a moment when it may give us weight and influence in those countries; a measure by which we shall at once assume the station that becomes our character, among the great republics of this hemisphere; or whether we shall wait the slow and unwilling consent of Spain, or the uncertain policy of the other powers of Europe.

The latter have refused to co-operate with us. It does not accord with their avowed principles to countenance any resistance against the abuse of power, however flagrant and unjust. In all ages, Spain has been slow to acknowledge the independence of those countries which have been driven to rebellion by her oppression. It is not probable that she will pursue a different policy with regard to her colonies in America. In this particular, and in this alone, I differ from the report now under consideration. It proves incontestably the right and the expediency of adopting the measure recommended by these resolutions. It is a clear and convincing argument, highly honorable to the committee, and, as I entertain great deference for their opinion, it is with reluctance I differ with them in this particular. The committee think it manifest, from the report of the Committee of the Cortes, "that Spain had not only renounced the feelings of an enemy towards the colonies, but had been prepared, a year ago, to consent to their independence, but for particular occurrences." They are led to this conclusion from the terms in which the committee speak of "the measure demanded by the crisis, as one indicative of a new and glorious resolution; that it was demanded by America and by the true interests of the Peninsula; that, from it Spain might reap advantages, which otherwise she could never expect; and that the ties of kindred and the uniformity of religion, with commercial relations and those emanating from free institutions, would be the surest pledge of mutual harmony and close union."

I agree with the committee, "that no measure short of a full recognition of unconditional independence, could have deserved the character nor been capable of producing the effects ascribed to it." But, sir, what say the documents on your table? The American deputies, disappointed in their expectations, presented propositions, in substance, Mr. Brent tells us, the same as those that at first met the approbation of ministers, and which would have been adopted, but for particular occurrences. These propositions contain no demand for an acknowledgment of independence; but merely for permission to establish an internal administration, dependent upon the mother country, freedom of commerce and equal rights with European Spaniards. This was, in substance, the measure first proposed by the committee of Cortes, and which was subsequently rejected by the king, "as a violation of the constitution; that public opinion was not prepared for it, that it was against the interests of Spain and of America." Something less favorable must be intended by the king, when he says "his Government, urged by the Cortes, to propose the measures they may think most proper for their welfare, or a consideration of the state of these countries, they will do so immediately, and with the utmost generosity." No, sir. The recognition of the independence of the Spanish colonies would be opposed both by the interests and by the prejudices of the Spanish nation. Independently of the revenue derived by the Crown from those countries—a revenue of more than eight millions of dollars—the patronage they afforded was immense. Places in Spanish America were the reward of services and the means of corruption. The aristocracy, who profited by those places, and who regarded them as the means of maintaining their splendid establishments in Europe, will abandon, with reluctance, the prospect of wealth America presented. The clergy will exert their influence to prevent it. America was to them a source of ambition and of profit. The possession of America extended their spiritual dominion and augmented their temporal wealth. The merchants, who, by a code of laws framed in the spirit of restriction and oppression, monopolized the trade of the colonies, will oppose their recognition; and the people generally will not consent to relinquish, without a desperate struggle, the dominion over the colonies, connected, as it is, with their most pleasing recollections of national honor and glory.

It is in vain to say that they are really independent. The Spaniards will not abandon all hope of recovering possession of them until they are recognized by the powers of Europe. It is well known that there are many of the former inhabitants of St. Domingo, now in France, who still cherish the hope of being restored to their estates in that island.

These motives will operate powerfully upon the Spanish nation, and, it is to be feared, will not only prevent their recognition of the independence of these countries, but lead them to view this measure, on our part, as an unfriendly, perhaps as a hostile act. They certainly have no right to do so according to the laws and usages of nations. But the resentment of wounded pride is not always restrained by considerations of national law.

But, sir, this risk, even if it were less remote, ought not to deter us from adopting the resolutions on your table. It is a measure called for both by justice and policy. The conduct of the Government, in relation to this contest, has given the best evidence of our respect for the rights of Spain. "So long as that nation made an effort to recover her dominion over her colonies, the United States abstained from recognizing their independence. But now, when all opposition has ceased on the part of Spain; now that those countries are free from the intestine commotions which divided them into factions, and rendered it difficult to distinguish which was the legitimate government, it would be unjust to withhold it.

I hope, therefore, the committee will adopt the resolutions now under consideration. It is due to the rights of the free and independent Governments that expect it at our hands, and due to our own character and station.

After some further conversation, in which Messrs. WOOD, WRIGHT, RHEA, TUCKER, and H. NELSON, bore part, Mr. TUCKER varied his motion so as to make the resolve read, "the late American provinces of Spain;" which amendment was agreed to.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on agreeing to the said first resolution; and the yeas and nays thereupon stood—yeas 167, nays 1, as follows:

Gradual Increase of the Navy.

[MARCH, 1822.]

So the first resolve passed unanimously, with the exception of a single vota.

The question was then put upon the second resolution, and carried unanimously.

And then, on motion of Mr. H. NELSON, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 29.

Title to the Fortification Site in the Delaware River, called the Pea Patch.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 1st instant, requesting "the President to communicate such information as he may possess relative to any private claim against the piece of land in the Delaware River, known by the name of the Pea Patch, and to state, if any, and what, process has been instituted on behalf of such claim," I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of War, furnishing the information required.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 8, 1822.

The Message and report were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Gradual Increase of the Navy.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were instructed, by resolution, "to inquire into the expediency of modifying the act, entitled 'An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States,' so as to require a part of the annual appropriation to be expended in the construction of vessels of an inferior force to those now authorized by said law to be built," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, also reported a bill to fix and render permanent the Naval Peace Establishment of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The report is as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th instant, instructing them to inquire into the expediency of modifying the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States," so as to require a part of the annual appropriation to be expended in the construction of vessels of an inferior force to those now authorized by said law to be built, make the following report:

That, by the act above referred to, passed the 29th April, 1816, the sum of one million of dollars per annum was appropriated for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States; and the President of the United States was authorized to cause to be built nine ships, to rate not less than 74 guns each; and twelve ships, to rate not less than 44 guns each, including one 74 and three 44 gun ships, authorized by a previous law. The President was also authorized to procure steam engines, and all the imperishable materials necessary for building and equipping three steam batteries; and by the 4th section of the act, it was provided that "the moneys appropriated by this act shall not be transferred to any other object of expenditure." By the act of 3d March, 1821, instead of the appropriation contained in the original act, the sum of $500,000 per annum, for six years, was appropriated to carry into effect the purposes of the said act; and that the whole of this sum will be required to complete the objects contemplated by these acts. That, pursuant to the instructions and objects of these laws, there has been built and equipped one ship-of-the-line, viz: the Columbus; and that there has been built and launched three ships-of-the-line, viz: the Ohio, the North Carolina, and the Delaware, and one frigate at Washington, the Potomac; that there is now on the stocks, built and ready to launch, one ship-of-the-line at Boston—that there are now on the stocks, nearly finished, one ship-of-the-line at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, one frigate at Philadelphia, and one frigate at New York—that there is on the stocks, about half finished, one ship-of-the-line at Gosport, Virginia—that preparations have, for some time past, been making, for putting on the stocks one ship-of-the-line at Boston, one frigate at New York, one frigate at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and one frigate at Washington, and that the frames, and nearly all the timber, and other materials, have been provided for building one ship-of-the-line at Philadelphia, one frigate at Washington, one frigate at Boston, and one frigate at Norfolk—that the live oak frames, and nearly all the other timber, and two steam engines, have been provided for two steam batteries at New York, and one steam battery at Washington. The committee further report that the articles on hand, and those contracted for, could not be advantageously applied to the building of vessels of a smaller class than those for which they were provided and designed. "The frames of our ships-of-the-line are all got to moulds; each particular piece has its appropriate place in the frame," and the labor of reducing them to a size suitable to smaller vessels would be nearly, if not quite, equal to the expense of a new frame. The copper provided, too, is generally heavier than is used for aloops of war.

In the opinion of the committee, the frames being cut to moulds, which, being the cheaper and better plan, the commissioners of the navy, with a due regard to the before-recited acts, were authorized to direct, there would be great risk of losing them entirely, by their warping out of place, if they are not put together.

The committee are of opinion, also, that the funds appropriated for the gradual increase of the navy, cannot be diverted to any other objects, consistently with good faith, or the real interests of the nation.

The policy was adopted upon great consideration, and with a view to the defence of our seacoast, and in a well-founded conviction that it was wise and prudent gradually to increase our naval force in time of peace, and to render it efficient in the exigencies to which the country must be always more or less exposed. It is believed that the best defence for this country, and that on which it must principally rely, not only for the protection of our commerce, but to prevent the actual invasion of the soil, is the naval force. The act for the gradual increase of the navy was founded on this presumption, and designed by gradual means, in a manner least oppressive to the country, to lay the foundation of an efficient naval power, and to prepare, in time of peace, that description force, which could not be easily raised up in time of war, but which would be indispensable in such a crisis. It requires much time and great care to prepare the materials, and construct the vessels of the class provided for in the acts, and the experience of the late war has fully demonstrated the necessity of such a force; by teaching us the facility with which the enemy could blockade a large portion of our coast with a single ship-of-the-line.

The committee are of opinion that it would be unwise to change this system, founded upon so many important considerations, without some urgent necessity, and in their opinion, none such exists; on the contrary, there seems to be even stronger reasons for adhering to the policy, and cherishing the growth of our naval power, now that foreign nations are modelling their naval architecture after our improvements, and at a moment when our foreign relations are about to be extended, upon a scale which should, at least, admonish us against any diminution of, or an indifference to the means of national defence.

The committee are aware of the importance of ships of war, as a class of naval force, indispensable both in time of peace and war; but they are a class which may be provided in a shorter time, and with considerable advantage, even after the exigency has arisen, and, though they would be useful in time of peace for many services, and especially for the discipline of our officers, and the more effectual suppression of the piratical marauders upon our commerce, the committee believe it would be unwise to break in upon the fund for the gradual increase of the navy, even for such objects; and, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to modify the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States," so as to require a part of the annual appropriation to be expended in the construction of vessels of an inferior force to those now authorized by the said law to be built.

Inspection of Land Offices.

Mr. McLANE, from a select committee, delivered in the following report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

[This report, which was the result of an inquiry expected to criminate a Senator, and the Secretary of the Treasury, concluded thus:]

On the whole, the committee have seen nothing in the case submitted to them, which can lead to the presumption, that either of the individuals concerned had any intention either to violate the provisions of the law, or to abuse or disregard the spirit and policy of our institutions.

They are of opinion that the employment of Mr. Thomas to examine the land offices originated in a desire honestly to discharge an important public duty; that the peculiar importance of the trust at the time, and the character and elevation of the individual employed, were calculated rather to invite than forbid the selection. Nor have the committee any reason to believe that the duty has not been faithfully performed, and in a manner conducive to the public good.

Under these circumstances, and with such impression, the committee do not deem it necessary to single out this case for particular animadversion, or to pronounce upon the comprehensiveness or precise import of the act of 1808. They content themselves with referring to the construction which it has uniformly received in practice, and to the conviction that the public good, and not any sinister or improper purpose, was intended; and they therefore recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. Cook stated, that it was due to himself and to the committee to say, that the committee were not unanimous in agreeing to the report, and to express the views which he personally had of this subject, which he considered, in some points of view, as of great importance, he offered a counter-resolution, which he requested might accompany the report, and be laid on the table with it.

Mr. McLANE said he was sorry that, on the present occasion, the gentleman from Illinois had thought it proper to deviate from the usual practice on making reports, in stating, as he had done, that there was a division in the committee on the subject of the report. An obvious objection to such a proceeding was, that each member of the committee might feel himself called upon to say how he had voted, if any one of the committee did so. He believed, he said, that he should be authorized in saying that the honorable gentleman himself was the only one of the committee who disagreed to the resolution now on the table. Mr. McLANE did not think this course to be the proper one to be pursued. It would be an encroachment on propriety to suffer a committee to make a report, and accompany it with another report, which might possibly be of a very different tendency. The object of the gentleman, besides, could be as well attained by moving his proposition in the shape of a separate and distinct resolution, as in the way he proposed.

The SPEAKER, deprecating the debates growing out of incidental questions, uselessly consuming the time of the House, pronounced his decision, that nothing can be received as the act of a committee but what is the report of a committee, and that a committee can make but one report. Nothing, therefore, but the report of the committee was now under consideration. He adverted to the famous case of the Seminole war, in which a counter report had been offered by one of the committee, and received by the House, but he considered it an erroneous proceeding, and not to be drawn into precedent.

Mr. MERCER concurred in the view which the Speaker had taken of this point, and added that, in the case of the Seminole war, the counter report had not been received until after considerable debate, and it was afterwards a subject of general regret that it had been received at all.

Mr. Cook said he was not sure he had understood the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) correctly—but repeating what he had said when before up, Mr. C. now justified it. It was no new thing for it to be announced, on the presentation of a report, that the committee was divided in relation to it. He quoted the example of the case of the report at the last session on the admission of Missouri into the Union. He did not know whether the member from Delaware meant to intimate that he had made an incorrect statement or taken any undue advantage. He would rather abandon his seat—he would rather never have set foot in this House, than do a dishonorable act, or even an act of unkindness to any of his fellow-members. He deemed it a matter of importance even to the persons about whom, on this subject, so much had been said, to frankly present to the House his views, that no man should be taken by surprise in voting on a question deeply connected with the purity of the legislative body—

The SPEAKER here arrested the debate, as going improperly into the main subject, on a question merely incidental.

Mr. MOLANE disclaimed any intention, in what he had said, to alarm the feelings of the gentleman from Illinois, or impeach his motives. He considered it an act of justice to himself and to the committee to state the facts of the case, and he had done no more.

The question was taken on laying the report on the table, as moved by Mr. COOK, and carried.

Mr. COOK then submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the employment of members of Congress by the Executive, or any Executive officer of the United States, in the performance of any public service, during the continuance of their membership, for which they receive compensation out of the public Treasury, is inconsistent with the independence of Congress, and in derogation of the rights of the people, and, if it be not already, ought to be prohibited.

Mr. CANNON required the question of consideration of the resolution; and, that question being taken, the House agreed to consider the same.

Mr. COOK moved for a reconsideration of the vote taken upon the disposal of the resolution reported by the committee; on the ground that his object was to offer the last resolution as an amendment, or rather as a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee.

A question of order occurred, in which Messrs. COOK, H. NELSON, CANNON, and TAYLOR, took part, when the proceedings ended in deciding to lay Mr. COOK's resolution on the table, in the same manner as the report had been; and both were ordered to be printed.

Fugitive Slaves.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory.

The question was, on the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. F. JOHNSON was willing to legislate on the subject, but he thought this bill was calculated to introduce new and unknown rules in relation to property. Its operation was not confined to the slaveholding States, and he thought its tendency would be injurious to society, and the administration of justice. He was also opposed to it on the ground that it authorized a suspension of the right of the writ of habeas corpus. He hoped that the bill would be laid on the table, or recommitted, in order that these objections may be removed; and with that view, he proposed that the committee rise and report; which motion was put and carried, ayes 55, noes 43.

In the House, leave to sit again was refused to the committee; and

Mr. F. JOHNSON moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, which was agreed to; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Mr. COLDEN, Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. NELSON of Virginia, and Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, were appointed said committee.

Horses Lost in the Seminole War.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, claiming payment for horses lost in the Seminole campaign.

Mr. F. JONES moved to amend the report of the committee by striking out the word "not," so as to give it an affirmative character.

The motion was supported by the mover, and by Mr. ALLEN, of Tennessee.

Mr. ALLEN said: This claim presents itself very differently from most others which we are called upon to decide. It rests upon a positive contract between the soldier and his Government. We find the Commander of the Southern division of the Army of the United States, inviting mounted volunteers to enter the service, under a promise to pay them forty cents per day for their horses, and furnish them with forage and subsistence, at a time when a law existed to pay the soldiers, who had just returned from service, for their horses that had been lost on account of a failure on the part of the Government to forage them. The inspection roll of the army proves that these men entered the service, and performed their duty faithfully, and were honorably discharged. It is admitted that, during a long and rapid march through a wilderness, no forage whatever was furnished. What was the consequence? Death to the horse and loss to the owner, but a gain to the Government of all that forage and transportation would have cost. If that has been done in violation of the contract with the soldier, is it not reasonable to pay the damages that accrued to the soldier who performed his part of the covenant? His claim would be sustainable in law, were the Government suable; and, because it is not, are we to reject it? I hope not; I will not agree to do so without stronger reasons than are to be found in the report of the Committee of Claims. I cannot see how the soldier's demand for his horse is at all impaired by any thing paid him for his services. He performed the duties required of him, and only received the wages promised for doing so; yet this ingenious report tells us that that payment exceeded the average value of the horses, and infers, from it, that the soldier is already overpaid. Agreeably to this mode of reasoning, if one of these soldiers had served six months longer, the Government would have had a claim against him equal to the value of another horse. If he is to be charged with his wages when he receives credit for his horse, it is evident that the longer he served the greater would be the balance against him. This may be good argument, but, in my opinion, very poor pay. There is a laboring, throughout this report, to draw the mind off from the merits of the claim, and fix it upon charges and expenditures that attended the campaign, for which the soldier is not at all accountable. After all the trouble of searching every department in the War Office, it is discovered that, out of the arms put in the hands of the volunteers, forty-nine muskets were never returned. This, I think, might easily be accounted for by looking at the number of men that never returned. The killed and wounded could not be expected to return their arms, and certainly their comrades are not to be made accountable for them. Is it believed that we are never to want another army? If we do, does any one think we will get soldiers, if they are to be made accountable for all the expenses? Was that the course adopted during the last war? No; the mounted men then engaged, were paid for their services and their losses. These troops only ask the same measure of justice all others received. If the policy even is doubtful, is it just to change it now, and exclude a few that have been deceived by confiding in it? Certainly not. If you want the confidence of the people, remember that, next to their liberty, they claim from their Government equal justice. I hope it will not be denied to these meritorious men—soldiers, I would say, if I was not well aware that the very name of soldier sounds an alarm here, not for their valor, but for our money. Sir, these soldiers are too proud to beg. Give them justice or give them nothing.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the committee rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again, which was granted.

SATURDAY, March 30.

South American Governments.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter, which, by unanimous consent, was ordered to be entered on the Journals of the House.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1822.

To the Honorable, the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: Severe indisposition prevented me from attending the House on Thursday, and recording my vote in favor of the Independence of the South American Governments; the same cause prevented me from attending the House yesterday; nor was it until the hour of adjournment that I was informed that the members who were absent when the above vote was taken, were yesterday permitted, by universal consent, to have their votes entered on the Journal. Thus circumstanced, I shall feel highly honored by the House if they will permit my name to be recorded in the affirmative on that question, by placing it with the yeas; or if that cannot be done, by placing this letter on the Journal. I have the honor to be, &c.

PHILIP REID.

Mr. GARNETT asked if it was in order to make a motion; he said he wished to make one on the subject of the vote he had given on Thursday last, on the recognition of the late South American Provinces. That it has been his misfortune, not only to differ with all his colleagues, but with the whole House on this subject; that he did not wish to recall his vote, for he was fully prepared for all the consequences that could arise from it, when he gave it; but there was one view of the subject which occasioned regret; the event of her recognition would necessarily be announced to the world, and his vote would be probably misinterpreted by the public, who might believe that he was unfriendly to the independence of the South Americas; and that he did not wish it to be believed, that there could be an American Legislator in the 19th century, who could be unfriendly to civil liberty, and the rights of man, anywhere. That he felt great gratification in common with the rest of his countrymen, in the success in which the struggle of the South Americans had eventuated; and that he refrained from voting to recognize them, from considerations of policy, which he wished to make known, by spreading them upon the Journal of the House, the only permanent and authentic record. This was partly a national, and partly a personal motive; but there was a secondary motive, which was entirely personal. He wished it to be known that he had not voted entirely without reflection, or from caprice or prejudice, by making known his reasons, which, whether well or ill-founded, would show that he had bestowed some consideration on the subject. With this view he offered the following declaration, and moved to have it inserted in the Journal:

I voted against the recognition of the late American Provinces of Spain, not because I am opposed to their independence, on the contrary, I rejoice in its accomplishment, and believe that it would be even better for them to be independent with a worse form of government, than to be dependent with a better; but I voted against it because I am of opinion,

That recognition must be either the mere formal declaration of a fact which will be inoperative, and therefore useless, or it must be substantial, and propose some advantage to one or both of the parties—that, if it be substantial, it must be intended either to impart to the party recognized the physical means, or the moral force, necessary to accomplish their revolution, or to establish relations for the mutual benefit of both the parties concerned—that the idea of assistance, to consummate a revolution, concedes that it is not completed, and is incompatible with the neutral obligations to the country claiming jurisdiction; and that the second alternative of mutual benefit reduces it to a question of policy, in which it is only necessary to balance the good with the evil:

That we have no right to recognize nations because they have adopted forms of government congenial with our own, if our recognition would not otherwise be proper; and, to maintain this doctrine, would be to assert the odious principle of legitimacy, that nations have a right to interfere with the internal concerns of each other, which must be beneficial or injurious, accordingly as free principles or despotism happens to prevail in the world; and that, for this reason also, the present is a question of policy, not of principle:

That, the period having past when our recognition of the independent Governments of South America could be of any substantial benefit to them; their independence being already firmly established; it is impolitic in us, for the sake of any advantages which either party is likely to derive from an intercourse at this time, to risk those we already possess:

That, if Spain only, through mistaken pride, resents our act, though perhaps too feeble to carry on a war with us, she may interdict our commerce with her remaining colonies, and thus deprive us of a trade more valuable than any we can expect to substitute, for a long time, with the independent provinces:

That, if the importance of this trade to those colonies should induce them to revolt, or our recognition itself should produce in them revolutionary movements, the island of Cuba, the most valuable to us, will either fall under the dominion of the colored population, or of our jealous and ambitious rival, England, or we must occupy it ourselves, at the expense of a war with that rival, who will certainly seek to prevent that occupation at the same cost:

That the elements of new revolutions still exist in Mexico, in consequence of the power and influence of the priesthood and the landed aristocracy, who gave their aid to the late revolution, under the belief that they were to have an imperial government, which secures to them their property—which probably cannot be carried into operation, and which, if attempted, it is said, will be resisted by the Republic of Colombia—and that these commotions will still farther retard the return of their productive labor to domestic industry.

That the situation of Mexico is somewhat equivocal in relation to its claim to recognition, as it appears by the letter of the American Chargé d'Affaires near the Court of Madrid, that the authorized agents of that Government, after the revolt of Iturbide, and the adoption of articles of government, was known to them, still contemplated the integrity of the Spanish Empire, as it concerns this province.

And, finally, that circumstances do not warrant precipitancy—that the great interests of both parties will be endangered without any adequate motive for the risk; and that the temporary éclat which priority of recognition may obtain for us, is not to be put in opposition to the great permanent interests of both countries, which will be best promoted by adhering, on their part, to the sage monitions inculcated in the language of one of their most distinguished patriots, Rivadavia, who declared, as late as September last, "that they did not seek the recognition of other nations, because it must operate, if unsuccessful, to the humiliation of the provinces, and if successful, to mislead the people, by persuading them that such recognition was all sufficient to their political existence and happiness; that the most efficacious system would be to establish order and wise institutions of government throughout the provinces, and to show themselves worthy of the fraternity of other nations, when it would be voluntarily offered;"* and, on our part, by abstaining to propose that fraternity, until the elements of their political society, purified from the crimes and corruption engendered by former oppression, have settled down into order, and they have fully demonstrated their capacity for self-government, and until we are mutually in a condition to derive advantages from a free intercourse, which will overbalance the considerations of the evil, which immediate recognition presents, without a prospect of good.

ROBERT S. GARNETT,

A member from Virginia.

The question being taken upon entering the said written declaration on the Journals of the House, it was negatived, ayes 49, noes 51.

Exchange of Stocks.

An engrossed bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange certain stocks bearing an interest of five per cent. for certain stocks bearing an interest of six and seven per cent., was read a third time.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, called for the yeas and nays on the final passage of the bill; which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. F. JOHNSON said he should not again have troubled the House upon the subject, but for the very singular course which had marked the progress of the bill, and but for the utter repugnance he felt for the measure—a loan bill of twenty-six millions in profound peace; that he considered the subject, as the friends of it had said, of "vital importance" in its consequences, and as a precedent. He said that the bill, as now amended, was more objectionable than at first; that it now allowed the payment of the public debt of 1814 and 1815, as well as 1812 and 1813, to be postponed and put further off. It was now a proposition to create a loan of twenty-six millions to discharge so much of the public debt which falls redeemable in 1825, '26, '27, '28, and to postpone the payment thereof until a more distant period,—taxing the community, in the mean time, and for all that time, with an interest on the debt, and which interest, as mentioned on a former day, was upwards of five millions seven hundred thousand dollars annually; that the friends of the bill had urged several grounds for its passage: first, that it was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury; secondly, that we shall not be able to discharge the debt when it falls redeemable; and, foreseeing that event, now was the golden moment, now the accepted time, to make a good bargain out of the money brokers, and, by so doing, to save to the nation

Exchange of Stocks.

the payment of 6 and 7 per cent. interest on the public debt, and to substitute in lieu thereof 5 per cent. These arguments, he said, had been answered, and that satisfactorily, in his opinion, by his honorable friends from New York, (Mr. TRACY,) from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) and from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SEEGRAST.) It had been demonstrated over and over again, that the stockholders will not accept the exchange you propose, unless it shall be more advantageous to them than the contract they now hold on you, and consequently more disadvantageous to the Government; so that it is to make a bargain in any event, if we bargain at all; and he said they had, moreover, shown that there was no good reason to apprehend that the credit of the Government would fall, unless uncompromitted by some such measure as the bill. But, he said, yielding to the friends of the bill, the truth of both the facts they had assumed, namely, that we shall not be able to pay the debt of 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, when it falls redeemable, and that money will be more in demand and the interest higher; yet he contended the propriety of the measure was not established; he said, the argument which goes to show we shall not be able to pay off the public debt, presupposes and assumes for its basis, that there is to be no material increase in the revenue, nor any material change in the economy of the affairs of the nation; and he begged gentlemen to say, whether the same arguments, if admitted to be correct, did not go conclusively to show that we never should be able to pay the public debt. He said, if the increase of the revenue, and the reduction of public expenditure, will not enable the Government to pay off a good portion of the debt in two, three, four, five, and six years, he should like to know what was to happen after that period to enable them to pay the debt; and, said he, I pray gentlemen, who rely so much more on their predictions for our inability to pay the debt, than on exertions to pay it, to open to us the events of futurity, and give us a view, if it be but a faint one, of the prosperity which is after that time to advance our revenue and resources so as to enable us to pay this debt, with an accumulation of fifty-five per cent. on it, that we may have faith, and, having faith, we may live in hopes, that, without any exertion but the mere process of creating new loans to pay off old ones, we shall some day relieve the country of this enormous debt. And if they would be kind enough, he said, to develop the process by which men or nations could get out of debt by borrowing, it would be a most acceptable invention in these times. The argument, he said, which was advanced to show that the interest on money would increase in a year or two, and hence the conclusion that we ought to borrow while interest is low and before it rises, was founded upon the assertion that the capital in the country, which was now unemployed, would in a short time be employed in a profitable commerce; that commerce was increasing, and would increase, and would employ the capital of the country. So be it, said he; and what does it prove?

If commerce increases and flourishes, does it not inevitably advance, in the proportion of its increase, the revenue of the nation? Most assuredly it does. And, if the revenue thus increases, it gives the means directly and inevitably to pay off the debt. For, in the same extent, you admit the argument contended for, he said, that the capital of the country would be employed in profitable commerce, and therefore could not be obtained on loan, but at a higher interest than now, also proved with it a like proportion in the increase of the revenue, and an increase of the revenue gave the means of paying the debt; and the argument thus urged, he said, in favor of the bill, was most clearly against it. So, he said, to him, it was perfectly clear, that, take the argument either or both ways in which it had been contended for, that it was against the policy and propriety of the measure. But, said he, we are told that two millions of dollars are to be saved to the nation by this bill, and several hundred thousand every year. Astonishing result, he said, to be produced by borrowing money. It was vain delusion to talk of saving millions, while you plunged the nation deeper and deeper in debt; while you increased and extended the amount of interest, and gave it a sort of perpetuity on posterity that seems without end, it is vain delusion to talk of saving; it was a sort of political sophism in which he did not believe; the fact, he said, was not so; unless gentlemen meant to make the debt perpetual, to adopt the old maxim—a public debt a public blessing—then, to be sure, it would be some temporary relief to the finances to pay one per cent. less on the debt. How stood the facts, he asked, in this case? Say a part of the debt is proposed not to be redeemed until the end of eleven years, and you agree, in the mean time, to pay five per cent. per annum, quarterly, on the debt, is it not an agreement to pay fifty-five per cent. on the money loaned, before you return it, you being allowed eleven years credit for the principal, by paying, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, quarterly, out of the Treasury? On a loan of twenty millions of dollars, for twenty years, at this rate, you pay in all forty millions, and the twenty millions of interest, quarter yearly; whereas the same loan of twenty millions, continued but five years at six per cent., will only amount to twenty-six millions; the difference, therefore, in favor of six per cent. for a few years, is more favorable to the nation than paying five per cent. for a great number of years; five per cent. for eleven years makes an aggregate of interest, on any given sum, fifty-five per cent.; an interest of six per cent., for nine years, makes an aggregate of interest, on the same sum, but fifty-four per cent.; hence, he said, it was most clear that the actual saving to the nation was in the same proportion as the debt was extinguished within nine years, beyond what it would be to continue and put off the payment of any part until the end of eleven years. So much, he said, he had thought proper to say in addition to what had been heretofore said on the dollar and cent part of the argument.

But, he said, there were other points of view in which this subject might be profitably received and considered. Loans or a national debt, under a certain administration, was once considered a national blessing, but it had been long since admitted, on all hands, that a national debt was a nation's curse; we then deprecated a national debt, and we still continue to view it as a national evil; but it would seem, he said, that times change, and we change with the times. That very system which, under a former Administration, was opposed, abused, and cried down, as tending directly to the oppression of the people, and the destruction of the Government, we now propose to adopt and speak of with as much indifference and unconcern as if it was of but momentary consequence; that very system of loans and public debt was one of the levers that overthrew that administration, and established in its stead an administration of economy and retrenchment—an administration which consulted the interests of the people, and studied the perpetuation of American liberty—an administration which arrested the career to consolidation and profusion, and restored correct principles and economy—an administration that, with less capital and wealth in the nation; with less population; with fewer resources than we now possess; yes, with the remains of means of the preceding administration, extinguished about sixty-five millions of the public debt. And how was it done? It was effected, he said, by the then Executive of the nation turning its attention to the deranged finances of the country, correcting the faults, errors, and profusions, that had crept into the various Departments of the Government, and by husbanding the resources of the nation, and which had been esteemed, in the preceding administration, so inadequate to the annual ordinary expenses of the Government, that direct and internal taxes had been levied with a liberal hand, on the people, to supply the alleged deficits in the revenue, derived from imports and tonnage, &c. All these obnoxious and oppressive laws were repealed, and, notwithstanding the clamorous predictions of ruin and devastation which was to overtake the nation, by reason of the new organization of things which were everywhere uttered by the enemies of that administration, the sage of Monticello, to the utter astonishment and confusion of his enemies, not only kept the Government in operation and in peace, but with the remains of means extinguished about sixty-five millions of public debt.

He said, he appealed to the gentlemen of the House to say, whether it was scarcely possible for the members, however industrious and persevering, if they perform the duties of the House and those on committees, to become well acquainted, even in the course of several sessions, with the expenditures in the different departments, and the labor, and service, and nature of service required, so as to be able to suggest and point to reform in every one, and to ascertain what, if any, had been disbursed without the authority of law—he said, so numerous and complicated are its concerns, that it is almost wholly impracticable, and hence, said he, we have to confine our efforts to the more prominent establishments of the country, the Army and the Navy, and attempts at the Civil department. The Army, said he, we reduced last session, and that department had introduced and was approaching, a degree of economy not observed, it was believed, in any other. And is there, he said, no necessity for attention to this subject? He said that something like five millions a year was appropriated by Congress in the nature of its expenditure, more or less contingent—some of it altogether contingent, the residue depending on the discretion of various persons in its administration and disbursement. He did not say that abuses had taken place, and if there was not, he said, it was right upon principle to investigate and to understand, but that, from the manner of reporting the accounts of the various expenditures to the House, but little or no information is afforded; they are chiefly reported in sundries—so much for sundries, &c., and he could not any better judge after such accounts came in than before, as to the propriety of the expenditure, but he supposed it was owing to the manner in which the auditors kept their accounts; he supposed they just sent extracts from their ledgers. He said he observed some items, however, that he could find no authority for, but he would not now trouble the House with the mention of them upon this occasion, but he just observed that in an appropriation of $30,000 for an Indian treaty, he saw ten thousand dollars set down as so much given away, for which there was no other evidence than the word or certificate of the givers of the money; $10,000 paid in part for the cession obtained, the residue absorbed in expenses and wages. Look at the contingent expenses upon almost any subject, and see if there is not something of the same want of attention to the public interest; this he mentioned as a small circumstance that had just crossed his mind; it was small compared to other appropriations—he knew of no authority for giving away the public money, and none for admitting credits and disbursements without evidence; it might, he said, be right, but it was certainly a dangerous sort of principle to sanction—irresponsibility for the expenditure of public money; indeed, he said it would seem there was somehow or other too much indifference about the expenditure of public money. The Ghent commissioners are, he said, a singular evidence upon the subject; these commissioners have been for five or six years drawing immense sums of money out of the Treasury, and a great part of the time about their own business; some excuse or other is offered for not completing the business, but the money goes, if the business stands; and they are retained on wages. Captain Cook or Sir W. Raleigh, he said, would have sailed round the world two or three times while these commissioners have been engaged in running a line upon a very small part of its surface. He had taken occasion to refer to these subjects, as most likely not to have escaped the eye, yet nothing is said; and he would suggest, these items were in his opinion neither the most flagrant nor most numerous. Look at various reports and judge for yourselves.

Mr. BUCHANAN observed, that, although the bill before the House, even as it had been amended, did not please him in all its details, yet, imperfect as it was in his estimation, he deemed it in principle to be a measure so advantageous to the country that it should receive his decided support. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) has complained that the friends of retrenchment, of whom he professed to be one of the most zealous, were denounced as radicals and enemies of the present Administration. Mr. B. was utterly at a loss to know what application such remarks had to the subject under consideration. If they had any, for one he could observe, that denunciations of this kind would have no terrors for him. He neither desired nor expected any favor from the Administration; and he trusted that whilst he held the high and honorable station of a Representative of the people, he should neither wish nor ask for any other distinction. He was, therefore, alike indifferent whether he was called a radical or an ultra.

Mr. B. said that the present amount of the national debt might be stated, for the sake of even numbers, at $93,000,000. $68,000,000 of this sum is the balance of the war loans yet remaining unpaid, and bearing an interest of six and of seven per cent. per annum. This balance will be redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, in the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828. The measure proposed by the present bill is an exchange of $26,000,000 of this stock, upon which the Government now pay an interest of six and seven per cent. for stock to that amount; bearing an interest of five per cent. and not redeemable until 1830, 1831, 1832, and 1833. This exchange, in all human probability, can now be effected. The only question, therefore, to be decided, is the policy of the measure.

It is said by its enemies that this bill should not pass, because it will deprive the Government of the power of redeeming $26,000,000 of the public debt, during the years in which it will become due. If the slightest prospect existed that we should be able to pay the $68,000,000 during those years, then, said Mr. B., I admit this would be a conclusive objection to the bill.

Unquestionably we should not deprive ourselves of the opportunity of discharging our debts, whenever we shall have the ability. But does any gentleman, however sanguine he may be in his calculations, really believe that our revenue, during the years 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, will be sufficient to defray the current expenses of the Government, to pay the interest of the whole of the national debt, and sink $68,000,000 of the principal? During each of the two last years our debt has been increased upwards of $2,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, has informed us that until 1825, the year when the first of the war loans may be redeemed, he does not calculate that our ordinary receipts will enable him to do more than meet the ordinary expenses of Government, the interest of the national debt, and the payment to the public creditors of the small balance yet unpaid of the deferred six per cent. stock. That officer, we are informed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, now believes, from the late improvement in the revenue, that the $2,000,000 of six per cent. stock owned by the Bank of the United States, may also be discharged during the intermediate years. This, however, is the utmost extent, beyond which our most sanguine expectations have not carried us.

If you should delay making such a provision as that contemplated by this bill until 1825, what will then be your situation? During that and the three subsequent years, you will either have a debt of $65,000,000 to discharge, or you will be compelled to pay for it an interest of six per cent. If you pay the amount, you must provide the means, by resorting to loans; and your necessities will then compel you to borrow so much at once, that the value of money will be raised in the market, and you will not be able to obtain it at so cheap a rate as it can now be procured. Is it not, therefore, infinitely more politic to make the contemplated exchange of $26,000,000 at the present time, when it can be done upon advantageous terms, than, under existing circumstances, to trust to the future?

Should this exchange be effected to its full extent, there will remain still $37,000,000, which we may pay in 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828; upwards of $9,000,000 each year. This sum so greatly exceeds that portion of the Sinking Fund applicable to the payment of the principal of the debt during those years, even should it be in operation to the full extent at present contemplated by law, that we shall then be obliged to borrow large sums of money. This bill is calculated to divide the pressure. Let us now make an exchange of a part upon good terms; and by doing so, we shall secure to ourselves infinitely better terms for the balance in 1825, 1826, 1827, and 1828, than we could otherwise expect.

Mr. B. said he believed this to be the auspicious moment for making the exchange. Trade is reviving, and the demand for money becoming consequently greater. Should we realize the commercial advantages which we expect from our declaration, that the South American provinces are free and independent, new avenues will be opened for mercantile enterprise, and for the employment of that capital which now remains idle. The interest of money must rise as the demand for it increases. On the other hand, if Spain should, in violation of the principles of justice and of the laws of nations, declare war against us for recognizing the independence of her colonies, or even threaten it, the necessary result must be a depression in the price of your stocks. The experience of every country in a state of actual or probable war, proves the truth of this position. This, then, appears to be the favorable time which, if we suffer to pass away, may never again return.

The immediate effect of this exchange will be an annual saving of $260,000. My friend from Kentucky, said Mr B., who is so laudably desirous of introducing economy in the expenditure of public money, should have included this item in his calculations.

The present bill, we have been informed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, is a financial measure of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, although the opinion of that officer, even in matters of finance, should not be authority; yet, from his character and official station, it is entitled to much weight. When there is doubt—when the judgment is nearly balanced, it should at least turn the scale. If Congress reject this measure, thus recommended, and if we shall be compelled to accept much worse terms in 1825 than the bill proposes, our constituents would have a just right to complain of our conduct.

Mr. B. concluded, by expressing his decided opinion that, in whatever view this bill could be presented, it would be beneficial to the country, and, therefore, he hoped it might pass.

Mr. FULLER expressed his sentiments against the bill, and, among other objections, he urged that it provided for giving to one class of the public creditors an advantage over another, by permitting the holders of stocks of different loans and value to come in and avail themselves of a common privilege. He remarked, that if the state of the stock market should be the same two years hence as at present, this would be a losing bargain, and he thought the chances of its favorable fluctuation was not such as to authorize the calculations of the friends of the bill.

Mr. WOODSON, of Kentucky, observed that he rose to address the House at this stage of the bill, not with a view of trespassing long on its patience in the discussion of a subject which he had hoped a few days since was finally disposed of, and the reconsideration of which was not to be anticipated. However, in the vicissitude of events, it has so happened that it is again presented; and a sense of imperious duty compelled him to solicit their indulgence, whilst he briefly expressed his own, and, he believed, the sentiments of those by whose confidence he was honored with a seat in this House.

This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, on behalf of the Government, to propose to a specific class of its creditors an exchange of $26,000,000 of stock, bearing an interest of 8 per cent. for a like amount of 6 and 7 per cent. stock; and the only inducement held out to present selected stockholders, is the extension of the term of redemption some four or five years.

A single moment's reflection on the character of the measure, produces the conviction that it is nothing more or less than a loan in disguise, and that, too, by anticipation.

The people, whose will he is bound to obey, judging from lessons of experience, condemn the habit of resorting to loans in times of profound peace to sustain the operations of Government, or any measure calculated to rivet upon them or their posterity an immense debt, which they are not as yet prepared to admit is a national blessing. In the hour of war and difficulty, it is true, their patriotism and devotion create an inexhaustible fund, upon which their representatives may draw, with confidence, unlimited bills of credit. But, when the tempest has subsided, and serenity succeeds, they in return require that prudence and economy should be observed, and aid in relieving them from accumulated pressure. They will not be satisfied with empty professions; they act when necessary, and we, as their faithful representatives, ought to follow their example.

A Government is justly assimilated by them to an individual, and the same results relied on from the same causes. What would public sentiment pronounce, then, of an individual who managed his private concerns in a manner requiring a habitual resort to bank accommodations or loans to defray his ordinary expenses, or discharge his debts? To say the least, it would negative the idea of his prudence, and calculate with certainty on his ultimate embarrassment and humiliation.

This system of measures, he contended, created and confirmed a moneyed aristocracy in the country, distinct and separate in their feelings and interest from the great mass of the community—influencing, as he feared, at this moment, and hereafter destined to give tone and character to all our national measures; to cause luxury, extravagance, and idleness, to supplant the virtuous republican manners, the economy, the active enterprise, and hardy labor of our ancestors—sap the public virtue, and ultimately demolish the Government of the people. Should they stop short of those dreadful results, they will at least paralyze the public enterprise and retard its prosperity, by diverting the capital of the country from permanent establishments, requiring labor, care, and ingenuity, and yielding but a moderate though sure profit, into funded debt. Wealth is power—money is said to be the sinew of war. Place the purse or the credit of the nation in the hands of a privileged few, or of foreigners, and sooner or later the sword will accompany it. These may be considered by some as groundless speculations—idle fears. They are such as were entertained by the founders of our Republic, and the experience of other countries has too frequently witnessed their sad reality. Can the nation tolerate the humiliating idea of being the debtors, and consequently subject to the supercilious interference and control of a foreign nation jealous of our rising greatness? If not, let me entreat this House to pause before they adopt this measure; for I venture to predict, if the exchange is effected, by far the greater portion of the stock will be exported to, and disposed of, in a foreign country—remitted, in other and more specific language, to England.

Exchange of Stocks.

If this event be not only possible, but highly probable, from the unfavorable rate of exchange against us, and we should hereafter come in collision with that power, and it becomes necessary to vindicate our insulted honor, or maintain our rights, can we resort to war? Indeed, can we assume, in any respect, the proud and elevated attitude of an independent, high-minded nation? No. That same honor would suspend the arm of vengeance until the debt was paid.

But, some gentlemen have said that the Government would acquire additional strength and security; that your enemy would be interested in preserving peace, to prevent a confiscation of their debts. This is by no means a novel idea; experience has long since proved its fallacy.

Their influence will be exerted to depress the public spirit, and obtain from us dishonorable concessions. They know full well that the sacredness of public debt has been settled by universal consent, and that no nation dare to violate it.

It is unnecessary to dwell on consequences so obvious and awful.

What is the pressing emergency, the dire necessity, requiring such despatch—this sudden risk of public credit?

Why this reversal of the pleasing prospects of our increasing commerce and prosperous condition of our revenue—the fond hope of the speedy and actual payment of our national debt, presented and received with so much eclat at the commencement of our session? Were they designed to be delusive? It would be uncharitable to believe so. If not, why is it that our Government is now represented as a vessel in a dead calm, and an experienced helmsman warning the crew of a distant speck in the horizon, the harbinger of an approaching storm? I cannot perceive. But, if the present side of the picture be the real one, let us profit by experience; haul in our sails; make the vessel tight and snug, and she will still ride the waves in safety. Do not the pride and dignity of the Government revolt at the idea of being placed at the mercy of brokers, bankmen, usurers, stockjobbers, and money dealers of every character, some of whom, I suppose it would be admitted, were governed exclusively by their views of profit and loss, or ambition, and with whom patriotism will be but as a feather in the balance?

When was the real money-lender's heart known to soften at distress, or his demands lowered by the extent of your necessities? How often does a candid acknowledgment of your inability to pay enable you to obtain more favorable terms on the solicited renewal of your bond? Let those who have experienced the blessings of bank accommodations, or the indulgences of the most polite creditors, respond.

Mr. McDUFFIE said, that it was not a matter of surprise that a very great diversity of opinion should prevail in relation to the proposition before the House; nor, was it a matter of surprise that, on a financial question of some novelty, involving the consideration of millions of the public debt, the House should not only feel a deep interest, but considerable doubts and difficulties. But, he said, he was much surprised when he saw the two gentlemen from Kentucky (Mr. F. JOHNSON and Mr. WOODSON) adding to the intrinsic difficulties of the question by the introduction of topics foreign to its merits. One of those gentlemen (Mr. WOODSON) had boldly disclaimed all regard to financial calculations, and in doing so, had distinctly disclaimed all regard to the only considerations that ought to have any weight with the House. And he confessed that, after this broad disclaimer on the part of that gentleman, he was not surprised at the wide and excursive range which he had taken in the debate. But, sir, said he, this is essentially a financial question, and I cannot conceive how we can determine whether or not it is expedient to adopt it, if we do not descend to the business of calculation. We must inquire, What is the amount of the public debt? When will it be redeemable at the pleasure of the Government? And what then will be the probable capacity of the Government to effect the redemption? Now it is admitted on all hands, and, if it were not admitted, it is apparent from the official documents before us, that during the years 1825, '6, '7, and '8, sixty-three millions of the public debt, bearing an interest of six and seven per cent., will become redeemable. It is equally apparent, that the surplus which shall remain of the ordinary revenue, after defraying the current expenses of the Government, and discharging the interest of the national debt, will not be sufficient to redeem within fifty millions of the sum that will be thus redeemable. Sir, when these two propositions are granted, which no gentleman has denied or can deny, it requires no great powers of logic to deduce the consequences. They are clear and inevitable. We must either raise a revenue of fifty millions of dollars by direct taxation, between this time and the year 1828, or we must procrastinate the period fixed for the redemption of the public debt.

The former alternative is quite out of the question. No gentleman would seriously recommend so enormous a tax for such an object, at a time when we are but just recovering from the most overwhelming pecuniary embarrassment that ever befell a prosperous nation—an embarrassment, too, which we must trace to that very war in which this debt was contracted. Indeed one, or perhaps both of the gentlemen from Kentucky, took occasion to deprecate a resort to direct taxes, in the very act of opposing, upon the broadest principles, the only measure by which such taxes can be avoided. This seemed to involve an inconsistency which he thought it would be difficult to explain. But, said he, as it is granted that a direct tax is not contemplated, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that we must procrastinate the period at which the public debt shall be redeemable; and it only remains to be determined how this can be effected on terms most advantageous to the Government. It may be reasonably estimated, as already intimated, that there will be fifty millions of the public debt, bearing an interest of six and seven per cent., which will be redeemable at or before the year 1828, and which the Government cannot then redeem. In this state of things the public creditors ask it as a favor that we should not pay them the principal of their debt, and tell us that, if we will throw forward the period of redemption, they will take five per cent. instead of six and seven. In other words, they will exchange their six and seven per cent. stock, redeemable four or five years hence, for five per cent. stock, redeemable ten or twelve years hence. And shall we not accede to this proposition? Is it not better that we should pay five per cent. than six and seven per cent.?

But an honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. TOMLINSON,) had on a former day, used a very plausible and imposing argument on this point—an argument which had made a strong impression upon the House, and which, for the moment, Mr. McD. said, made a similar impression upon him. But he was prepared to show that the gentleman's argument, when pushed to its full extent, would lead to a result different from that which he had supposed. He understood the gentleman to contend that we ought to wait until the six and seven per cent. stocks become redeemable, and then open a new loan to raise the money to redeem them. And, said the gentleman, as the six and seven per cents. will, of course, be at par, it will follow that, if the five per cents. remain as at present, nine or ten per cent. above par, we shall gain, by postponing the operation, a sum equal to the aggregate amount that the five per cents. will produce above their par value. But, he said, the fallacy of this argument consisted in the supposition that the value of the five per cent. stock will not be diminished by increasing the quantity in market. The price of stocks, like that of every other article, depends upon the relation subsisting between the supply and demand. Indeed, the gentleman himself very justly ascribed the present high price of the five per cents. to the smallness of the amount in market. And when he told us we should depress their price by the proposed exchange, which will substantially throw twenty-six millions into the market, it is strange that he did not extend his view a little further. If he had done so, he would, doubtless, have seen that a much greater depression would be produced by suddenly throwing into the market fifty millions five or six years hence. What, said Mr. McD., would be the situation of the Government, and what the interest of the public creditors? The Government would come into the market to obtain a loan for so large an amount, with a declaration of insolvency, as the only inducement it could offer the public creditors to subscribe to the new loan. What would be the conduct of the creditors? They would use every effort and resort to every combination to prevent the Government from obtaining favorable loans. For, as they would be the holders of six and seven per cent. stock, which the Government could redeem only by loans, they would have a deep interest in preventing a loan at a lower rate of interest, whereby they would, in effect, lose their stock, or have the interest proportionably reduced. Mr. McD. appealed to those who were familiar with the vicissitudes of the money market, and the operations of borrowing and lending, to say how great would be the effect which the holders of fifty millions of stock might produce on the price of stock. Suppose, said he, the Government should propose to effect a loan to that amount by the issue of five per cent. stock. The very fact that the holders of the six and seven per cents. should refuse to subscribe to the new stock, would so far diminish the demand and the competition, that its price would be greatly depressed. And he would venture to predict that, if this bill should not pass, the five per cent. stocks, for which we can now obtain the six and seven per cents., (thereby saving in interest between one and two millions of dollars,) will, at the end of four or five years, be at par, if not lower.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, remarked that he had no feeling on this subject; he viewed the proposed exchange of stocks merely as a prudent financial measure, and had therefore always been in favor of the bill. And as the gentleman from Kentucky, who spoke first, (Mr. JOHNSON,) had, by a sort of general challenge, called upon its friends to point out those future changes in the circumstances of the country, on which they justified the measure, he would briefly state the considerations which influenced him. Mr. T. said he was friendly to the bill, under the persuasion that the interest of money would rise in this country; consequently, that stocks would fall; for he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. FULLER,) that we should gain or lose by the exchange, according to the price which our five per cent. stock may bear in the market, when the six and seven per cents. become redeemable. Thus, if, in 1826, our five per cent. stock should bring six per cent. above par, then, as we save by the exchange two per cent. per annum, for three years, in the payment of interest, it comes to nearly the same thing; and if our five per cents. should be higher, then we should lose. But he thought there was much greater probability of their falling.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

Mr. T. said that there were two very different causes for the fall in the interest of money—one was the gradual accumulation of large capitals in the hands of individuals, during a long course of prosperity, such as existed in England and Holland, when interest had gradually declined from ten per cent. to eight, to six, to four, and, he believed that, in Amsterdam, large sums may be now borrowed as low as three per cent. He said, the same cause operated in this country, and in every period of twenty or thirty years, by the accumulation of private wealth, interest may be expected to fall. But, he said, there was another cause, which was the sudden change in the circumstances of a country, by which that capital which had been actively employed, had become idle and redundant; and he contended that the last was the cause of the low rate of interest in this country; that it was the effect of comparative adversity, rather than prosperity; that we had now lost much of that extensive and gainful commerce we had lately enjoyed, which had made more capital in the country than could immediately find profitable investment. But, whenever interest is low from this cause, it cannot be permanent. If our commerce should revive, of which there were some present symptoms and encouraging prospects, then much of the money, now vested in the funds, will be demanded for mercantile pursuits, by which, of course, the natural interest of money will rise, and stock will fall. But if, on the other hand, the present stagnation of commerce should continue, then the present redundancy of capital is constantly diminishing. In the natural course of things, it will seek other investments; it will find employment in manufactures, or in the purchase of Western lands. It will be subdivided among children, or will melt away and be consumed. The present low rate of interest, less than five per cent., is not its natural state in this country, which has so many modes of absorbing capital, as fast as it can be created, it cannot last; and whether our commerce improves or falls off, or continues as it is, the natural interest of money must shortly rise from what it now is.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, commented at length, in an able and lucid manner, upon the observations that had been made by the gentlemen who had severally expressed their sentiments against the bill. Finally the question was taken on its passage, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 55, as follows:

Fugitives from Service.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, from the Select Committee to which was committed the bill to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory, reported the same with amendments, and the bill and amendments were ordered to lie on the table.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress the translation of two letters from the Minister of France to the Secretary of State, relating to the claim of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais upon this Government, with the documents therewith enclosed, recommending them to the favorable consideration of Congress.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 29, 1822.

The Baron de Newville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, February 26, 1822.

SIR: I have been instructed by my Court to call the attention of the Federal Government to the claim of the heirs of Beaumarchais. His Majesty's Government indulges a hope that their legitimate and well-founded rights will cease at least to be disputed, and that prejudices will yield at length to the influence of indisputable facts, especially when those prejudices are totally ungrounded, and have been abandoned by all those who have maturely examined the case.

The Beaumarchais claim was first produced in 1778.

The French Government has never ceased to support it with that interest which every Government owes to the just claims of its citizens. It has been earnestly recommended to Congress by Presidents Madison and Monroe.

Mr. Madison, in his Message of the 81st of January, 1817, expresses himself in the following terms:

"Considering that the sum of which the million of livres in question made a part, was a gratuitous grant from the French Government to the United States, and the declaration of that Government that that part of the grant was put in the hands of M. de Beaumarchais as its agent, not as the agent of the United States, and was duly accounted for by him to the French Government; considering also the concurring opinions of two Attorney-Generals of the United States, that the said debt was not legally sustainable on behalf of the United States, I recommend the case to the favorable attention of the Legislature, whose authority alone can finally decide on it."

Mr. Monroe says, in his Message of January, 1818, "The claim of the representatives of the late Caron de Beaumarchais having been recommended to the favorable consideration of the Legislature by my predecessor in his Message to Congress of the 81st of January last, and concurring in the sentiments therein expressed, I now transmit copies of a new representation relative to it."

Mr. Gallatin, in his letter of the 2d of December, 1816, to the Duc de Richelieu, owns that a simple but explicit negative declaration on the part of His Majesty's Government, that the said million was not applied to the purchase of supplies furnished by M. de Beaumarchais to the United States, would have removed the doubts entertained by the officers at the head of the Treasury Department when the account was settled there.

The Duc de Richelieu, whose veracity and loyalty are so well known, made the following answer to Mr. Gallatin on the 20th of December:

"I am therefore warranted, sir, after a fresh examination of the facts, in persisting in the declaration above stated, and in considering as a matter of certainty, that the million paid on the 10th of June was not applied to the purchase of the shipments made to the United States at that period by M. de Beaumarchais." And, finally, the select committee charged with the examination of the business, and with reporting to Congress on the subject acknowledge the rights of the heirs of Beaumarchais in the most solemn manner. "The committee" (says the reporter) "have devoted much time, and made a laborious examination of the merits of this case; they have been able to discover no reason why the uniform declarations of the French Government should not be credited. There is no fact to contradict them."

"They fully agree with our great Revolutionary financier, Robert Morris, 'that, if any thing is due M. de Beaumarchais, the reputation of the country will be compromised until it is paid; that the payments of debts may be expensive, but that it is infinitely more expensive to withhold the payment.

The former is an expense of money, when money may be commanded to defray it; but the latter involves the destruction of that source from which money can be derived when all other sources fail. That source, abundant, nay, almost inexhaustible, is public credit. The country in which it may with greatest ease be established and preserved, is America; and America is the country which most stands in need of it.' In conclusion, the committee will remark that, in every point in which the case can be viewed by them, they are fully of opinion that the heirs of Beaumarchais are creditors of the United States."

To such an expose His Majesty's Government have nothing to add when they appeal to the equity of this Republic.

I have the honor to be, &c.

G. H. DE NEUVILLE.

The Baron de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1822.

SIR: I forgot to add to my letter of yesterday relative to the heirs of Beaumarchais—

1. The memoir or recital of the affair to 1817.
2. The President's Message of the 16th of January, 1818.

These pieces, which I have the honor to transmit to you, form, with the report of the committee of the House of Representatives of the 24th of February, 1818, the whole of the necessary documents. If they be not judged sufficient, if a careful examination of them do not produce deep conviction, it must be admitted, sir, that there are some prejudices which can never be overcome.

I dare say that truth never appeared more evident than in this unfortunate and interminable affair; why then does it meet with so much opposition?

Moreover, the heirs of Beaumarchais know that they will not in vain appeal to the justice of their judges: prejudice will never be able to overcome justice in their hearts; they, therefore, confine themselves to request of them a strict, a very strict examination of their claim: they only say to them, "We are ruined, because our father rendered services to the Republic, and our right is forgotten. Be pleased to read very attentively, and your justice will proclaim our right."

Accept, sir, the renewed assurance of my high consideration.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

The Baron Hyde de Neuville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1822.

SIR: A report was put into circulation about two years since, that the heirs of Beaumarchais were no longer proprietors of their claim, and that it had been sold to a third party.

Even if this were true, it would not in any degree invalidate their title; but I can attest, in the most positive manner, that the report is perfectly ridiculous. The claim still remains the property of M. de Beaumarchais's daughter. I will add, that it is the hope; indeed, the only remaining hope of that interesting lady and of her family. Why should she cease to rely upon a title so perfectly legitimate? This would argue a want of confidence in the equity of a whole nation.

South American Governments.

[H. OF R.]

The daughter of M. de Beaumarchais must therefore hope that justice will at last be done to her, and that, after suffering many privations, she will at last be able to hand down to her children the inheritance of her father.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

G. HYDE DE NEUVILLE.

The Message and documents were ordered to lie on the table.

South American Governments.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved a reconsideration of the vote taken on Saturday, by which permission was refused to the member from Virginia, (Mr. GARNETT,) to spread upon the Journals his reasons for voting against the resolutions of this House to recognize the independence of the South American Governments. After a few explanatory observations by Mr. GARNETT, the motion to reconsider was supported by Messrs. MEEBOKER, WRIGHT, MOORE, of Alabama, and WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, when the question was taken thereon and carried.

Mr. TAYLOR called for the yeas and nays, which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. T. thought it would be a precedent of a dangerous nature for the House to authorize a practice of this kind. If a member has a right to record his reasons for voting in the negative, it would be equally the right of those who voted in the affirmative, to spread their reasons on the record. The only case to be found, of reasons for a vote being spread upon the Journal, was that of Mr. Poindexter, then a Delegate from the Territory of Mississippi, having no right to vote, and whose motion respecting his own opinions was to be found on record. But that case was altogether different from the present, though the Delegate was not in that permitted formally to record his opinion. In the present case the member has voted; yet even that case admitted of much controversy and question. The vote of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GARNETT,) was doubtless an independent and honest one, but he thought it impudent and improper to encumber the Journals with the speeches of members in support of their respective opinions.

Mr. MEEBOKER thought the permission that had been granted to the gentleman to vote the next day after this question had been decided, was affording a worse precedent than that which was now proposed.

Mr. FULLER remarked that this ought never to be a matter of courtesy, but should be either admitted or refused, as a matter of right at all times; and believing, as he did, that such a practice would be improper and inconvenient, he was opposed to its adoption.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, was in favor of the motion, and believed that no danger was to be apprehended from the precedent, for questions of such grand magnitude very seldom occur.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, regarded the case of Mr. Poindexter to be a precedent of authority. So also was that of General Reid, who, on this very question, had been permitted virtually to record his vote, even when absent from the House. And should it be said by a majority—if you will go with us, we will go to any length in assisting you to accomplish your wishes, but, if you have independence enough to vote in opposition to the sentiments of the House and the nation, we will withhold that privilege? Such a picture, he thought, ought not to be exhibited.

Mr. WARFIELD thought there could be no danger of the case being drawn into a precedent, for few questions occurred of so great importance as this, and it would always be in the power of the House to limit the privilege, if, in its operation, it should be found inconvenient. It was not now claimed on the ground of right, but of courtesy, and that courtesy had been accorded to several members of the House, in permitting them to vote after the time allowed by the rule.

Mr. TOMLINSON had made up his mind to vote in favor of the motion, but he would enter his protest against it as a precedent. He felt himself pressed to vote for it, on the ground that similar indulgences had been granted to others on this question, but he regarded it as a principle, which, if allowed to acquire the authority of precedent, would be attended with very inconvenient consequences.

Mr. TAYLOR made a few remarks in reply, and was followed by Mr. COLDEN against the motion, and by Mr. GILMER in favor of it, when the question was taken thereon, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 71, as follows:

Mr. GARNETT then submitted his declaration, which he had reduced to an abbreviated substitute for that proposed by him on Saturday, to be entered on the Journal, which was as follows:

I, ROBERT S. GARNETT, a member from Virginia, make the following declaration: That I voted against the recognition of the independence of the late American provinces of Spain, because, considering it a question of policy, not of principle, I believed that no immediate advantage could grow out of it to either country, whilst many considerations, affecting the interest of both, rendered it at this time inexpedient. I am not opposed to the independence of the late provinces; on the contrary, in common with the rest of my countrymen, I heartily rejoice in its accomplishment, and in the prospects of freedom and happiness which it opens to them.

WEDNESDAY, April 3.

Public Defaulters.

Mr. KIRKLAND submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the punishment of such officers of the United States as are intrusted with public moneys by virtue of their office, who shall apply the same to any purpose or purposes incompatible with the duties of their office, whereby the United States shall sustain a loss.

In introducing the resolution—

Mr. KIRKLAND observed that, as the resolution contemplated introducing a provision into our laws of an unusual character, it might not be deemed improper for him to assign, briefly, a few of the reasons which have induced him to present it. I find, said Mr. K., 'from an examination of our statute book, that there is no provision for the punishment of public defaulters, and that they are not subject to any penalty for the misapplication and embezzlement of the public moneys intrusted to their care; and they are responsible only in a pecuniary point of view; that there is no remedy but a civil suit; pursued in the usual course between debtor and creditor, for the recovery of the money which has been misapplied by the officer; that there is no punishment, no penalty, but such as exists between debtor and creditor in the ordinary course of business in society. It is true, said Mr. K., that in some cases, security is required of the officer, for the faithful performance of his duties, but in most cases, perhaps nine out of ten, where the principal is insolvent, the security will be found unable to respond to the public; and if it should sometimes fortunately happen that the security is solvent, what follows? A petition from the bail and his friends, setting forth, in strong language, the utter ruin of himself and family, if he is compelled to pay the money, and making a forcible, and frequently a successful, appeal to the sympathies of the House for relief. The consequence is, that, after great expenses incurred in the prosecution of both principal and security, we discharge the one, and cancel the bond of the other. It is not believed that there is enough collected from the public defaulters to pay the aggregate of the expenses incurred by the different prosecutions against the officers who have embezzled the public money.

It may be said, Mr. K. remarked, that you have the integrity of the officer; but this is found, in too many instances, a poor security indeed. The documents upon your table show most abundantly that little, very little trust, is to be placed in the integrity of many of your officers who are intrusted with the public money. Here you find defaulters for thousands and tens of thousands, amounting in the aggregate to millions. These documents, and the daily information we have in relation to the loss of our public money, furnish lamentable proof of the entire want of moral principles in many of the public officers, and a most shameful disregard of their public trusts. Your public defaulters are to be found, not only in the Army and Navy, but in the civil department—your collectors of the revenue, marshals, district attorneys, clerks of district and circuit courts, receivers of public moneys for the sale of lands, Indian agents, and those employed to pay the pensions given to Revolutionary soldiers. We have now, upon our tables evidence of one pension agent who has misapplied (if the report of our officer is true) ten thousand dollars of moneys placed in his hands to pay the veteran soldiers of the Revolution—an act that should brand him with perpetual infamy. The present laws are wholly inadequate to secure the Treasury from loss by the misconduct of the public officers. There is no provision adequate to effect this object. And while we are, upon one hand, busily engaged in devising ways and means to fill our Treasury; and while some of our most able, distinguished, and industrious members, are engaged unremittingly upon the subject of retrenchment in the public expenditures; and different committees are inquiring minutely, and with great vigilance, into the expenditures in the various departments of the Government—there is an imperious necessity for making some provision which shall more effectually guard the Treasury against loss by the embezzlement and misapplication of public moneys by those to whom they are intrusted. It would not upon this occasion, said Mr. K., become me to go minutely into the details of a law making the necessary provisions to guard our public Treasury, and to secure fidelity to the public officers. This would be the peculiar province of the highly respectable committee whose duty it will be by the resolution to make the inquiry, and to report a bill; but he could not forbear offering a few ideas upon the provisions which it may be found necessary to insert in the law. The officer intrusted with public moneys should consider the trust a sacred one; no temptation, however strong, should induce him to violate it. He ought to consider his obligation to the public paramount to every other. No other relation in society can have such strong claims upon him as the people for whose benefit the moneys are committed to his care; and he who will knowingly and deliberately violate a trust so sacred should be held infamous, and no longer be admitted into the society of the honest and virtuous part of the community. I would render him, said Mr. K., ineligible to any public office of honor, profit, or trust. I would immediately cause him to be dismissed from public employ. I would leave it discretionary with the court before whom he was tried, upon his conviction, to cause him to be fined, or imprisoned, or both, at the discretion of the court. Nay, sir, I would go somewhat further—I would leave it in the discretion of the court, in very enormous cases, to sentence the culprit to the penitentiary. I would place him beside the felon who counterfeits your coin, who alters your public records, and who forges your bank paper. This would not be too severe a punishment for him, who, in his wild speculations, has used your money to the amount of tens and hundreds of thousands—who has applied it to the aggrandizement of his family; and who has for years rioted upon the fruits of his iniquity, in living in splendor and show; and who, when he is called on to account, laughs at your public officer, and treats his calls for the public moneys with neglect and contempt.

As the law now stands, this very defaulter is eligible to public office; and it is not, if he (Mr. K.) was rightly informed, a very uncommon occurrence, that the defaulter and his friends are seen petitioning the Executive for public employ, and sometimes, he feared, with success. Public defaulters are now considered merely in the light of unfortunate debtors; as those who, in the course of their business, have, from events beyond their control, been rendered insolvent, and who are justly entitled to the sympathies, both of the public and of individuals. It is a shame, said Mr. K., that a public defaulter should, in the view of the laws, and in that of society, be placed upon an equal footing with an honest and unfortunate debtor, in whose behalf the whole community sympathize. It is time, high time, that the laws should speak a different language. If a provision had been inserted in your statute book, said Mr. K., at the commencement of the Government, similar in its provisions to the one contemplated by the resolution now presented, it would, in all probability, have saved to the nation many millions of the public money. Mr. K. anticipated from the adoption of the resolution (if the committee should report in conformity to it) very salutary effects. The people of this country have a high sense of integrity. We boast, said Mr. K., of our public and private virtue; and it is time that we should, from our statute book, speak a strong and decisive language to all those who embezzle the public money. They should learn that they can no longer violate the sacred trust committed to their charge with impunity. Mr. K. concluded by observing, that he anticipated a unanimous vote of the House in the adoption of the resolution, and he hoped that the committee to whom it would be referred would find time to report a bill at the present session.

Mr. BASSETT was in favor of the resolution, but wished to extend it to those who had the public property in keeping, and he proposed a modification to that effect, by inserting in the body of the resolve the words "or with the safe keeping of public property;" which modification was assented to by the mover.

Mr. HARDIN was apprehensive that the punishment which seemed to be contemplated by the gentleman from New York (Mr. KIRKLAND) would be found too severe; and, in such cases, a law if too severe for public sentiment to sustain, would become a dead letter. Mr. H. did not think public sentiment was such as to brand the public defaulter with infamy. On the contrary, the proceeds of his defalcation support him, and enable him to drink his wine and give his dinners; nor would it be possible to put a man in the penitentiary merely for being a defaulter. Mr. H. adverted particularly to the case of the district attorneys, and thought the only course in relation to them would be to make them give bond for the faithful performance of their duties, and also to require, if they fail to account, that that failure should vacate their offices.

Mr. CONDIOT moved to strike out the words "by which the United States shall sustain a loss." Mr. C. was disposed to repress all speculation by the holders of the public moneys. The public moneys should be kept separate and sacred for the public service, and he would not suffer the public agents to use them for any other purpose, however well able they might be to replace them when called for.

Mr. KIRKLAND was not inclined to carry his prohibition so far. If the officers and agents of the Government can and do respond according to law, that, he thought, was all that need be required of them.

Mr. CONDIOT replied. Mr. F. JOHNSON also made a few remarks in favor of the proposed amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, also expressed himself in favor of the amendment. Looking over the document which had been referred to, (the list of unsettled balances,) he thought its contents were a disgrace to the Government—a libel on the country. Until he saw that document, he did not think that the country was capable of producing such a one.

Finally, Mr. KIRKLAND assented to the modification proposed by Mr. CONDIOT.

Mr. COOK proposed to add to the resolution the following sentence: "And also, into the expediency of requiring all such officers to be dismissed from office upon failure faithfully to account for the money or property so confided to them." This proposition was agreed to by the House, and the resolution, as modified, was thereupon adopted.

THURSDAY, April 4.

Allowance of Pensions.

On motion of Mr. LONG, the House then took into consideration the bill to revive and continue in force certain acts concerning allowances for pensions upon a relinquishment of bounty lands.

Mr. LONG was in hopes that the bill would not meet with much opposition. If it ever was right (which he believed it was) to pass the law, it was right that all should equally have the benefit of it as intended. To this end it would become necessary to revive the law, as it had now expired, before they all had applied. If, however, gentlemen felt any disposition to vote against the bill, he hoped they would reflect, and see the situation of those poor widows and children as it would be if the House refuses to pass the bill. Congress, said he, has heretofore passed a law which held out to them some relief. We may naturally suppose that they have applied as soon as they knew there was a law for their relief; but, to apply effectually, it not only required some time, but was attended with considerable expense in getting their papers in due form, which was done generally by professional men; a class of men who are in the habit of being well paid for their services. In some cases the expense was more than those applicants were able to bear—and, after they had expended every cent they were worth in setting forth their claim, they are informed that the law has expired, and that they are not entitled to what was intended for them, merely because they have not applied within a certain day. It cannot be expected, said Mr. L., that a poor woman and children, settled down on some remote corner of the earth, constantly engaged at home in procuring bread, could know anything about the operation or existence of the laws of Congress. He hoped, therefore, that the circumstance of their not applying before the law expired, would not be urged as an objection to the passage of the bill, and that we should not be found ready to snap at this little advantage that may be here taken of the poor and ignorant. He was as much opposed to an improper expenditure of public money as any member of this House, and would go as far as any gentleman in his opinion ought to go to bring our expenditures within the amount of our revenue, which he conceived to be the indispensable duty of this House; but he could not consent to begin here, and withhold this pitiful sum from the widow and fatherless, who have lost him who ought to have been their protector, whilst engaged in the service of his country and protection of our lives and liberties.

The bill was thereupon ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

FRIDAY, April 5.

General Appropriation Bill—Minister to Portugal.

Mr. MALLARY suggested that he was not satisfied that it was necessary to send a Minister to Lisbon, and that a Chargé des Affaires would perhaps be sufficient. He therefore called for information on the subject from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, in reply to the inquiries of Mr. MALLARY, reviewed at considerable length the political and commercial relations which, for a long period, have subsisted between this country and Portugal. We had long exported, he said, vast quantities of flour to that country; but at length the Government laid a duty of $2 per barrel on all the flour imported into that kingdom, from this country, and gave privileges and held out inducements to the nobility to erect mills, which was done, and they were in a great measure supplied with wheat from Poland. Our people exported no wheat. They manufactured it themselves; but the duty, which was intended as a prohibition, was severely felt, and our Government sent a minister to that Court to obtain a repeal of the duty. Ministers, however, are not always the best negotiators in mercantile concerns; and the object was not effected. But it was afterwards accomplished by a Consul General, who was thoroughly acquainted with commercial subjects, and the duty was taken off. Subsequently, the Court was removed to the Brazils, from which it has recently returned to Europe. But the duty of $2 per barrel has been renewed for the purpose of encouraging agriculture, and of giving it a new direction, instead of cultivating almost exclusively the vine. The Government of that country has thought us to be hostile—particularly from the greater duties we have imposed upon the wines of Madeira and Fayal, than upon the wines of other countries. Large quantities of corn are sent from this country to Madeira; and they are understood to be about petitioning the Cortes to impose restrictions upon the importation of our corn; and the consequence may be, that we may be wholly deprived of the benefits of that trade. All attempts to reduce our enormous duties upon these wines have hitherto been ineffectual, because they are drank by the rich, without seeming to regard the importance of the trade. Mr. S. further observed, that he thought it expedient not to withhold the appropriation, inasmuch as the President had recommended the measure; and, should we refuse, the consequences and the responsibility of that refusal will rest upon us.

Mr. MALLARY remarked, that the object of sending Ministers abroad was for the purpose, either of policy or commerce. In relation to the policy, he thought a Minister was not necessary. The Government of Portugal was not formidable, either at sea or on land. With respect to commerce, it was evident, from the statement of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) that a commercial object, which a Minister could not effect, a Consul General was competent to accomplish. Mr. M. therefore thought a Charge des Affaires was adequate to the object. There were twenty places in Europe where we send no Minister, of more commercial importance to this country than Lisbon. Mr. M. adverted to a statistic report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to show the superiority of the trade of other countries; and he particularly referred to Holland, Denmark, and Sweden. The latter nation was certainly at least equal in dignity, and superior in strength to Portugal, and was as well entitled to expect a Minister from us as the latter Government; and with respect to the Brazils, he believed they would emancipate themselves from the control of the parent country, whenever they thought proper to dissolve the connection and assume their independence. Mr. MALLARY concluded by moving to transpose the word Lisbon, so as to provide for a Chargé des Affaires in that country instead of a Minister.

Mr. SMITH replied, by referring to the Message of the President of the United States at the opening of the session. He observed that Portugal had expressed a sincere desire to renew a friendly intercourse, and, he understood, had actually appointed a Minister to this country. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. MALLARY) had said that the trade with Portugal was unimportant. He (Mr. S.) admitted it, and it was to restore it to importance that the mission was proposed. A Chargé des Affaires might be adequate if, as in the case of Sweden, a treaty was already subsisting; but we want a Minister to make a treaty, and a Chargé des Affaires may afterwards be sufficient.

The motion of Mr. MALLARY was further supported by Messrs. GILMER, HADIN, and ROSS, and opposed by Messrs. WRIGHT, POINSETT, BALDWIN, WOOD, RHEA, AROHER, FARRELLY, WOODSON, MERCER, and SMITH; when the question was taken, and the motion was negatived—

The question for expenses of carrying into effect the fifth, sixth, and seventh articles of the Treaty of Ghent, being under consideration—

Mr. COCKE observed, that he should be opposed to making any further appropriation for that object, until he was informed that those commissioners had settled their accounts. They had heretofore been called on, but only one class of them, to his knowledge, had obeyed the call; and among the charges it included, was to be found expenses incurred for fish-hooks, and fishing nets, and bacon, hams, and other like items, that did not seem to be a proper expenditure for the nation. The business had been already protracted eight years, almost as long as it took to destroy Troy; and if we go on, said he, appropriating from session to session, it will become a life estate to those concerned. He was averse to placing any more money in their hands, until they had accounted for what they had already received; and he moved to fill the blank with the sum of twelve thousand five hundred dollars.

M. F. JOHNSON adverted to the law of the last session that limits their allowance to a specific salary in lieu of all other expenses.

Mr. BALDWIN believed there had been too lavish an expenditure of the public money; nor would he now vote for the appropriation, did he not fear the public service might suffer from the delay a refusal of it might occasion. It was a business connected with a foreign power, and he wished the concern might be closed.

Mr. COCKE said we were told that the line could not be run in the winter, because the climate is too cold; and in the summer the commissioners, he understood, were frolicking at Ballston Springs. He thought it was high time that Congress should interpose, and prevent this waste of the public treasure.

Mr. WILLIAMSON remarked, that the people of Maine were as much dissatisfied with the progress of the commissioners as the people of the United States could be. He observed that, in a reply to a call which had been made on the Executive at this session, on the aspect of the fifth article, we had been assured that it would be concluded in the course of the ensuing spring. He thought, therefore, the most expedient course would be to make the appropriation called for, so as to have the business concluded without further delay.

The question was then taken on filling the blank with the sum of $25,000, and negatived; and the blank was filled with the sum of $12,500.

Boundary Line between the United States and Mexico under the Florida Treaty with Spain.

Mr. J. S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana, said, as far as this appropriation is intended to cover the expense of running the boundary line established by the treaty with Spain between the United States and Mexico, it was unnecessary. This House, he said, had determined to recognize the independence of Mexico; it would involve an absurdity now to recognize the right of Spain to fix with us the limits of a country, over which all authority has ceased; to define the limits after she has ceased to exercise any other sovereignty there. This is a right utterly incompatible with the public rights of the independent Government that now reigns over it. If a commissioner was appointed by Spain as it is stated, he was named before the new state of things existed, and his powers would be recalled by Spain herself, as soon as it was known that she had no longer any interest in the question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) had stated that the treaty was binding on Mexico, as Spain exercised sovereignty over it at the date of the treaty. That may be true, (said Mr. J.,) and Mexico will carry it into effect in good faith. There is no danger of her refusal to accept a treaty, which relinquishes our right to her territory, and gives her six hundred miles of seaboard. She has very little objection to Spain giving us Florida, and leaving her the province of Texas. We claimed their country to the Rio Grande—by the treaty we have surrendered it. They do not claim our territory—we have relinquished our right to Texas. We have made the sacrifice, not they; all the country west of the Sabine is now a part of Mexico. Besides, said he, can we send agents to run and mark her limits, against her consent, without insulting her sovereignty, and violating her territory? What! send armed troops (as was intimated) into a foreign country, in defiance of the law of nations. This must now be a subject of arrangement with the Government of Mexico. It is better to leave it open; we have now nothing to lose; we have already lost all in that quarter.

A discussion of some length ensued, in which Messrs. COCKE, MILNOR, WALWORTH, BUCHANAN, SMITH of Maryland, WARFIELD, COOK, RHEA, and EDWARDS of Connecticut, took part; when the question was taken, and the modification adopted—ayes 78.

The question was then put on filling the blank with the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, and carried; when, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, April 6.

Appropriation bill—Repair of the Cumberland Road.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the unfinished business of yesterday—the General Appropriation bill.

The clause to provide for repairing the Cumberland road being under consideration—

Mr. CONDIOT moved to strike out the clause. He said the United States had already expended enormous sums in the construction of this road, and he could not consent to impose on his constituents any further expense in repairing it.

Mr. BROKENRIDGE had not expected the opposition which the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. CONDIOT) had made to the bill, and the manner was as unexpected as the matter. He has said that he is unwilling to tax his constituents for this object. Does not that gentleman recollect that the people of the West have been from time to time heavily taxed, to build fortifications on the seaboard, and support navies, in which they have no special interest? What would that gentleman say, if we should avow that we would pay no more for these objects, and urge for reason that we are far enough out of the way of an enemy, and therefore are not disposed to contribute to the common defence? This was a magnificent plan of connecting the Eastern with the Western States. It was creditable to the munificence and policy of the Government; and he would not ask whether it was expedient to suffer this valuable road to go to decay and ruin, rather than appropriate this trifling sum to an object so important. It was the common property of the nation, and it could not be conformable to the interests of the country to break the chain that binds the Eastern and Western States together.

Mr. FARRELLY regretted that the gentleman last up should have introduced local considerations into this discussion. He did not understand in what way this appropriation found its way into the bill. He objected to the manner in which it had been brought forward, and thought it should be done by way of bill, as was done in the case of payment for horses destroyed in the Seminole campaign. Nor did he see how the repair of this road could come within the constitutional provision for the support of the Government. Mr. F. was willing to go as far on this subject as the compact required. The act of Congress on this subject, provided for the construction but not for the repair of the road. If this appropriation was made, it would be followed by similar calls from year to year to keep it in repair.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, explained the manner in which this provision had been introduced into the appropriation bill, which was in consequence of a resolution of the House, directing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of applying the unexpended balance of former appropriations for this purpose. That committee had obeyed the direction of the House, and they thought themselves justified in that course, when they knew that $1,000,000 had been expended by the United States in constructing the Cumberland road, and that it was now in a state of dilapidation. All the items of that amount had been made, from time to time, in the appropriation bills. The committee thought that sum would be well applied in repairing and protecting what it had cost so large a sum to construct. The superintendent had been consulted, and it appeared, from his statements, that the road, owing to the torrents, &c., in that mountainous country, will soon be impassable, unless the necessary repairs are made. The question, therefore, is, whether you will throw away what you have already done, rather than be at a little expense to sustain it.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, thought the same reasons that had induced the Government to build the road, would now influence them to preserve it. He had recently travelled it, and he found that the first part made, wanted but little repair. That portion of it which was more recently constructed, naturally required attention. The hills slide down, and the road is filled up, so that repairs are necessary. Mr. C. contended that the road was valuable to the United States, inasmuch as it rendered the public lands more accessible; and the people of the West had a right to expect this small appropriation for such an object. If a large appropriation was asked for, it would be, perhaps, expedient to pause. But the small sum of $9,000 is all that is now required, and probably not even so large a sum as that will be necessary in future years, after the road shall have been thoroughly completed.

Mr. MALLARY was also opposed to the motion to strike out this clause of the section. The facts, he observed, were familiar to the House. The Government had expended $1,800,000 on this road, and the policy of this expenditure had been repeatedly confirmed. It was now out of repair, and there were no means provided to maintain it. The first question, then, was, whether it was an object of sufficient consideration to authorize this appropriation? It was admitted to be the great chain to bind the East and West together, and for the accomplishment of that object much depended on the facility of communication. The House had been called on in this very bill to appropriate the sum of $6,000 to pay John Trumbull for a national painting. They had done it. And was it not an object at least as national and important to preserve the great avenue to the West? We annually appropriate thousands, said Mr. M., for the completion of this stupendous pile, the Capitol. And is not the Cumberland road as valuable a monument of national policy and munificence? When we appropriate so much to construct the road, he thought it worth while to contribute a pittance to save it. The people in that region, Mr. M. contended, had calculated, and prudently calculated, that the Government would not be at so much expense to construct the road, and then abandon it. He thought it was now ungenerous, if not unjust, to disappoint their expectations. The road from Philadelphia to Pittsburg was a great thoroughfare for the State of Pennsylvania; and it was not surprising, therefore, that the people of that State should not view the road with an eye of complacency. It was correct. It was natural for them to regard primarily their own interests. But the nation had decided in favor of the Cumberland road, and he thought it was expedient that Congress should not now depart from that decision.

Mr. STEWART rose to disclose some facts that were within his personal knowledge and observation. This road he observed, was completed the last Summer. Every Congress, for the last ten or twelve years, influenced by a liberal and enlightened policy, had appropriated money for its construction. It was now asked, merely to apply to the reparation of the road an unexpended balance which had previously been appropriated for its completion, and a trifling sum to erect a bridge. It was not expected, with this sum, to make durable repairs of stone, but to remove obstructions, and put it in passable repair, until Congress should make some permanent provision on the subject. In some places the hills had slipped and filled the road; in others, the road has given way and precipitated so as to become almost impassable. The consequence has been, that the public travel and the public mail have been seriously obstructed. It had been said by his colleague, (Mr. FARREL-LY,) that the people living on the road should repair it. But it would be recollected that this road was made over a mountainous, and, to a considerable extent, an uninhabited country. A considerable part of it passes through Pennsylvania, which, as a State, is known to be hostile to it. The gentleman (Mr. F.) has stated that it is destructive to Pennsylvania; she has $600,000 of stock in her own road, running from Philadelphia to Pittsburg; yet he says that, if the road could not support itself it ought to be given back to the State of Pennsylvania; this, by the gentleman's showing, would be to give the lamb to the keeping of the wolf. Such a course could not be required nor justified. This was a national road. It was built for a national purpose, and in a spirit of national munificence. And the important question before us now is, whether the whole object for which the expense was incurred shall be lost, for want of a trifle to repair and preserve it. We have been told, however, said Mr. S., that the money heretofore appropriated has been improperly expended. For the sake of argument, be it so; and what then? Is that a reason for abandoning the road? Large sums, also, have been appropriated for the erection of the spacious building in which we sit. But shall we stop the work because it may be suggested that some of the agents employed had been unfaithful to their trust? Should we relinquish the completion of this stupendous fabric, and leave it roofless, merely because there may have been extravagance and want of economy in the application of the public moneys?

Mr. BALDWIN remarked that, when it was stated that two counties had produced 871,000 barrels of flour and 28,000 barrels of whiskey in a year for market, he thought it was too much to say that they were so poor that they could not repair the slip of hill that had fallen into the road. When a particular object was to be carried, it was not uncommon to excite a clamor, in order that the real question might be lost sight of. The cry of mad dog was raised, the better to elude inquiry. The gentleman in favor of the appropriation had talked much of this as a national road and a national object, and of the illiberal, local views of those who oppose it. But gentlemen should recollect that there is a wide difference between the victims and the favorites of the Government. This road had gone far to desolate ninety miles of the mountainous part of Pennsylvania. Was it then to be expected that it could be viewed by that State with indifference? Even the worm that is trod on has the right to groan. When the last appropriation was made for the Cumberland road, a pledge was given that no more should be asked for. But now it is openly avowed by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. CAMPBELL,) that this is to be followed by future appropriations, and to be sustained by the nation as a perpetual charity. And why should this be done? If it is so valuable, why can it not support itself? Where the Cumberland road passes over the mountains, the country is not more barren than the corresponding country where the Pennsylvania road crosses them. But we are told that this is a connecting chain that binds together the East and the West. It is a singular chain, indeed, that is broken in the middle. What is the situation of the road between Hagerstown and Boonsborough? Little better than a mud hole or a swamp. This is a part of the chain. And where are the chains to connect the other parts of the country? By what national road are the North and the South connected? What national road runs to the East? Is this the only national object which the Government is authorized to foster? The House are now to decide an important question—Whether a part of the country that lives upon and grows rich by this road, shall be exempted from the expense of keeping it in repair?

The motion to strike out was further supported by Mr. WOODCOCK, of New York, and opposed by Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. WARFIELD, when the question was taken thereon, and carried—ayes 70.

MONDAY, April 8.

Territory of Florida—The Temporary Act for its Government—President's Understanding of the Act, which was to continue the Existing Spanish Government, administered by our Officers, until Congress had time to Provide Territorial Government more Congenial to our own Institutions.

A Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, received on Saturday last, was read, and is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate herewith to the House a report from the Secretary of War, containing information requested by their resolution of the 5th ultimo.

It may be proper further to add, that the secretaries of both the Territories have occasionally required and received the aid of the military force of the United States, stationed within them, respectively, to carry into effect the acts of their authority.

The government of East and West Florida was, under the Spanish dominion, almost exclusively military; the governors of both were military officers, and united in their persons the chief authority, both civil and military.

The principle upon which the act of Congress, of the last session, providing for the temporary government of the newly ceded provinces, was carried into execution, has been communicated to Congress in my Message at the opening of the session. It was to leave the authorities of the country, as they were found existing at the time of the session, to be exercised until the meeting of Congress, when it was known that the introduction of a system, more congenial to our own institutions, would be one of the earliest and most important subjects of their deliberations. From this, among other obvious considerations, military officers were appointed to take possession of both provinces. But, as the military command of General Jackson was to cease on the 1st of June, General Gaines, the officer next in command, then here, who was first designated to take possession of East Florida, received from me a verbal direction to give such effect to any requisition from the Governor for military aid, to enforce his authority, as the circumstances might require. It was not foreseen that the command in both the provinces would, before further legislation by Congress on that subject, devolve upon the secretaries of the Territories, but, had it been foreseen, the same direction would have been given as applicable to them.

No authority has been given to either of the secretaries to issue commands to that portion of the Army which is in Florida; and whenever the aid of the military has been required by them, it has been by written requisitions to the officers commanding the troops, who have yielded compliance thereto, doubtless under the directions received from General Gaines, as understood by him to be authorized.

Shortly before the meeting of Congress, a letter was received at the War Department from Colonel Brooke, the officer commanding at Pensacola, requesting instructions how far he was to consider these requisitions as authoritative; but the assurance that a new organization of the government was immediately to be authorized by Congress, was a motive for superseding any specific decision upon the inquiry.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, April 5, 1822.

Commissioner of Public Buildings.

Mr. BLACKLEDGE from the Committee on the Public Buildings, who were instructed "to inquire into the expediency of transferring the duties heretofore performed by the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to the principal architect," made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill fixing the compensation of the said commissioner; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Public Buildings, to whom was referred a resolution of the 2d of April instant, directing an inquiry to be made "into the expediency of transferring the duties heretofore performed by the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to the principal architect," report:

That, by an act of Congress, passed on the 16th day of July, 1790, the President of the United States was authorized to appoint, and keep in appointment so long as might be necessary, three commissioners, whose duty, among other things, it was made by the said act, (according to such plans as the President should approve,) to provide suitable buildings for the accommodation of Congress, and of the President, and for the public offices of the Government of the United States. The office of the commissioners, created by the above-mentioned act, was abolished by an act of Congress passed on the first day of May, A. D. 1802; and the affairs of the city of Washington, which had been under the care and superintendence of the commissioners, were placed under the direction of a superintendent, appointed by and acting under the control of the President of the United States. The superintendent was invested with all the powers, and charged with the performance of all the duties of the commissioners, by or in virtue of any act of Congress, or any act of the General Ad sembly of Maryland, or any deed or deeds of trust from the original proprietors of the lots in the said city, or in any other manner whatever. The salary of the superintendent was fixed by the act of the 8d of March, 1803, at twelve hundred dollars per annum, besides contingent expenses.

By the act of April 29th, 1806, the office of superintendent was abolished, and the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate, was required to appoint one commissioner, who shall hold no other office under the authority of the United States; who is allowed a salary of two thousand dollars, and who shall perform all the duties with which the three commissioners were charged, and the duties of the superintendent. It is the duty of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings to select and appoint the architect and all other agents engaged in the public buildings, to fix their compensation, to determine the number and description of workmen to be employed, and their pay, to provide and purchase materials, to inspect the plans and execution of the work, and to have the general regulation and superintendence of the whole. It is his duty to make all the disbursements of money, either on account of labor or materials, to procure regular vouchers for the same, and to account at the Treasury for all sums appropriated to objects within his department. It is also his duty, as superintendent of the city of Washington, to see that the plan and regulations are observed, to attend to the sale of public lots, to collect and account for the proceeds thereof, to make, under certain circumstances, streets through, and footways in front of the public grounds, and to have the care and management of those grounds. It is also understood, that the United States are parties to the several suits now pending to try the right to the property in the city of Washington, of a considerable amount, the care and management of which suits appertain to the Commissioner of the Public Buildings. It may not be thought irrelevant here to refer to a report made by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, to the House of Representatives, during the present session, in relation to the public lands in the city of Washington, by which it appears, "that of the building lots there remain unsold about the number of 5,150, the reservations, containing together 541 acres, 1 rood and 29 perches, or 23,584,745 square feet, equal to 4,479½ standard lots; that the average price of the public lots heretofore sold is $180 per lot, and at this valuation the whole of the grounds belonging to the United States in the city of Washington, amount to one million seven hundred and thirty-three thousand three hundred and ten dollars." There is no such officer created by law as an architect of the public buildings, but it is the duty of the Commissioner of Public Buildings to employ an architect, when necessary, as it is his duty likewise to employ all other necessary agents; and when the public buildings shall be completed, the services of an architect may be dispensed with. From the view which the committee have taken of the duties of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, taking into consideration the quantity and value of the public property subject to his care and management, they cannot resist the impression that the office is a necessary one, that its duties are important, and that it is inexpedient to transfer them, as proposed by the resolution. The committee, however, being anxious to retrench the expenditure of the public money, where it may be done without sacrifice of the public interest, and believing that the duties of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings are less arduous than they formerly were, in consequence of the progress made towards the completion of the buildings, recommend a reduction of the salary of the commissioner to the sum of fifteen hundred dollars per annum, and for that purpose have directed that a bill be reported.

Monument to Baron De Kalb.

Mr. WRIGHT, pursuant to notice, asked leave to introduce a bill to erect a monument to the memory of the late Baron De Kalb. Mr. W. produced the proceedings of Congress of 1780, as follows:

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of the late Major General Baron De Kalb, in the city of Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, with the following inscription:

Sacred to the Memory of the Baron De Kalb,
Knight of the Royal Order of Military Merit,
Brigadier of the Armies of France, and

Major General in the Service of the United States of America.

Having served, with honor and reputation, for three years,

He gave a last and glorious proof of his attachment to the liberties of mankind and the cause of America,
In the action near Camden, in the State of S. Carolina,
On the 16th April, 1780.

When, leading on the troops of the Maryland and Delaware Lines against superior numbers,

And animating them by his example,
to deeds of valor,

He was pierced with many wounds, and on the 19th following expired,
in the 48th year of his age.

The Congress of the United States of America,
In gratitude to his zeal, services, and merit, have decreed
This Monument.

Having read this resolution, Mr. W. said he believed it to be his duty, as a Representative of the State of Maryland, to fulfil the engagement of those patriots of the Revolution who achieved our independence, in a case like this, where they intended to honor a hero of a foreign clime, who shed his blood for the liberties of America; especially as, in doing this, they perpetuate the services of the Maryland and Delaware lines, who distinguished themselves on that occasion. The small sum requisite to do this business, he was sure; would not influence any member of the House against carrying into effect the grateful intentions of those patriots who declared us independent.

[The House refused to consider Mr. W.'s motion—ayes 26.]

Appropriation Bill—Stoppage of Pay to Defaulters.

Mr. COOK submitted the following as a proviso to the bill:

"Provided, however, That no money appropriated by this act shall be paid to any person for his compensation, who is in arrears to the United States, until such person shall have accounted for, and paid into the Treasury, all sums for which he may be liable."

The question being taken on this proviso it was carried without a division.

The committee, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, then rose and reported the bill as amended.

TUESDAY, April 9.

Prohibition of Advances, unless in Extraordinary Cases, and Prompt Settlement of Public Accounts.

Mr. BASSETT submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in all future transactions of the Government, either where services are to be rendered, or supplies furnished, no money shall be advanced by the Government, or payments made, but in exact proportion to work done, or services rendered, or supplies furnished, before such payment.

Resolved, That when any officer, or other agent of the Government, shall fail to settle his accounts within the period prescribed therefor, it shall be the duty of the Secretary, or the head of the Department in which it shall occur, to dismiss such officer immediately, and in those cases where the power to dismiss is not in the head of the Department, it is hereby made his duty to report such case to the President, whose duty it shall be to dismiss such officer or agent from the service of the Government.

Resolved, That the President may, for the payment of pensions, military pay, and supplies, order such advances to be made as the public service may imperiously require, and shall have like power to order such necessary advances as the public good may imperiously require in the remoter points of the United States, or without the United States, but no such advances shall be made on contracts hereafter to be made with the Government; all advances made under this authority shall be accounted for within the period prescribed, and shall, on failure, be subject to the penalties prescribed in other cases.

Resolved, That all officers, agents, or contractors, of the Government, shall, if within two hundred miles of the seat of Government, settle their accounts once in every quarter; if within four hundred miles, in four months; if within five hundred, five months; if within the United States, six months. And all such officers or agents of the Government, to whom it may be necessary to advance money without the United States, shall be held to make settlement in three months after their return to the United States.

Resolved, That the President and heads of Departments apply these principles, in an equitable manner, to all persons now indebted to the United States.

Mr. B. explained briefly his views in offering the resolutions, and concluded by moving that the same be laid on the table; which was agreed to.

Appropriation Bill.

The House then agreed to resume the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1822; and the immediate question was, upon a concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the appropriation for the repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. F. JONES concluded his speech of yesterday, and called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were thereupon ordered.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he should make no apology for rising to address the House upon the present occasion. The character of Pennsylvania, he said, had been attacked, and her views had been misrepresented, by honorable gentlemen upon this floor; and he should feel himself utterly unworthy of the trust reposed in him, as one of her representatives, if, after what had been said, he were not to stand forth in her defence.

As it often happened, said Mr. B., that men are most afflicted by imaginary diseases, so it occurs that they most dread imaginary dangers. This has been the case with the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES.) He has been grappling with the State of Pennsylvania, as though she stood ready to hurl the mountain into the Cumberland road, described by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. BAYLY,) and he were the Atlas who could sustain it upon his shoulders, and thus make the attempt unavailing. This fancy of the gentleman has produced an excellent speech. Indeed, without much imagination and ardor of feeling there can be but little eloquence. Let me, however, assure that gentleman and this House, that neither Pennsylvania nor her representatives dream of the destruction of the Cumberland road.

The gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES) and the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARRISON,) have ingeniously attempted to connect the grant of this appropriation with the preservation or destruction of this road. They have asked us if we will now destroy that great national work—if we will close the avenues which keep the intercourse open between the East and the West. I answer, we will not. We all admit that the road should be preserved. The question now to be determined by this House, is not whether the road shall be destroyed, but by whom shall it be repaired? whether by the United States, or by the people who use, and for whose benefit it was constructed. The National Government have made the road at an expense of $1,000,000. Notwithstanding all that has been said by gentlemen about the existence of a compact for that purpose, it now appears that five-sixths of this enormous expenditure has been pure bounty. It has been stated, and not contradicted, that the two per cent. upon the whole amount of the sales of lands of Ohio, which was the sum pledged for the purpose of making a road, does not exceed $300,000. The United States then, in the construction of the Cumberland road, have been actuated by the most liberal policy towards the people of the West.

What has been the principal argument urged by gentlemen friendly to this appropriation, to induce us to keep the road in repair? In my opinion it is one of the most wonderful which has ever been presented to this House. Say they, because you have made the road, you should, therefore, be at the expense of supporting it. Is not this a conclusion directly the reverse of one which would naturally flow from the premises? If we have been so generous as to make a road for you, ought you not, at least, to keep it in repair? If tolls could not be collected upon it sufficient for its preservation, there would be some force in the argument. This, however, is not pretended. Indeed, we should be almost induced to believe, from the representations of its friends, if we did not know to the contrary, that it was the only road which connects the West with the East.

APRIL, 1822.]

Appropriation Bill.

In what estimation would an individual be held who had received as a free gift a valuable farm, if, when, in the lapse of time, it needed repairs, he should demand from his benefactor the sum which they might cost, and assign his generosity in conferring the original bounty, as a reason why he was bound to satisfy this new claim? The present is a case precisely parallel with the one now before the House, so far as it goes. The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. HARDIN,) and the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. JONES), have gone still further, and have attributed not only to my colleagues who have heretofore addressed you on this subject, but to the State of Pennsylvania generally, a selfish and illiberal policy, because they have resisted this unreasonable demand. With what justice the charge has been made remains for this House to determine.

Gentlemen have instituted comparisons between the amount of public money expended for the benefit of the people in the East and in the West. As a present consolation for the disparity in this respect, which the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. HARDIN) supposes to exist in favor of the East, he has predicted that the day will ere long arrive when the weight of power shall be transferred to the West. It is because my feelings are all friendly to that portion of our Union, that I dislike to hear such sentiments from sources so respectable. Gentlemen, without intending it I am convinced, have been thus endeavoring to excite jealousies between people, whose feelings and whose common interests are both precisely the same.

With what justice has it been contended by gentlemen, that the money expended in the construction of a navy, has been exclusively for the benefit of the Eastern section of the Union? Although it is now generally admitted that a navy is the best defence for all parts of the Union, yet it is peculiarly the bulwark of the country west of the Alleghany mountains. The extent of coast upon the Atlantic, would render it impracticable for any hostile naval force altogether to prevent us from sending a portion of our produce to market; but let the mouth of the Mississippi be blockaded by a force of that description, superior to our own, and, I ask, what will become of all the surplus agricultural productions of the vast and fertile valley watered by that river and its tributary streams? The truth is, we are all so connected together by our interest, as to place us in a state of mutual dependence upon each other, and to make that which is for the interest of any one member of the federal family beneficial, in most instances, to all the rest. We never can be divided without first being guilty of political suicide. The prosperity of all the States depends as much upon their Union as the human life depends upon that of the soul and the body.

The State of Pennsylvania, about the illiberality of whose views on this subject so much has been said, never has acted towards you in the manner those interested in the Cumberland road have done. Had you advanced us the money to construct a road which would have been advantageous to our citizens generally, you should never afterwards have been asked to advance money to keep it in repair. We should have considered such a request both ungrateful and unjust. The citizens of that State, with the aid which she has liberally bestowed, have already completed eighteen hundred and seven miles of turnpike road, of which about twelve hundred and fifty are of solid stone. Laws have been passed for the construction of seven hundred and fourteen miles more. The State has expended upon these objects $1,361,542, and individuals, $4,158,847. One of these roads runs nearly parallel with the Cumberland road, and connects the city of Philadelphia with that of Pittsburgh. The gentleman from Tennessee, two years ago, found this road to be a bad one. The temper of mind with which people travel has a wonderful effect upon their judgment of the road, and I fear this cause has operated, in no small degree, upon the mind of my honorable friend.

It is expected that this road, as well as all others of the same kind in Pennsylvania, shall not only support itself, but yield some small dividend upon the stock subscribed for its construction. I ask, then, with what justice towards that State can you repair the Cumberland road out of the Treasury, and make it perfectly free? Even after you shall have placed toll gates upon it, there will be no fair competition. No more toll will be collected upon it than will be necessary for its preservation, whilst our road, in addition to that amount, must pay an interest to the State, and to the stockholders. With what propriety, then, can Pennsylvania be censured for maintaining the principle, that those who travel upon the Cumberland road, and are most interested in its preservation, should keep it in repair. She does not deserve, at your hands, that you should give a premium out of the public treasury, for the purpose of diverting travellers away from her road, and inducing them to use another which is in no respect superior. It will not be denied but that, in times of trial, she has both fought and paid with as much alacrity as any other State in the Union.

Notwithstanding all that has been said, I believe, as firmly as I do in my existence, that the friends of this road might with safety retrocede it to Pennsylvania. It would not be delivering up the lamb to the wolf, to use the expression of an honorable gentleman. Pennsylvania is now no more governed by a selfish policy, than when she ceded to the United States the soil over which the road passes. She then understood her true interest as well as now. There certainly has been nothing in her conduct since, which could induce a rational belief that she would destroy this great public work, if it were placed in her power. In that case she would do nothing more than impose a toll upon it, sufficient to create a fair competition between it and her own road; and then leave the public to decide which they would use. We do not, however, ask for a retrocession; all we desire is, that the road may hereafter support itself, and not be a perpetual drain upon the public treasury.

The existence of this road, I can assure gentlemen, is not a subject of such alarm to the State of Pennsylvania, nor to her metropolis, as they suppose. Whilst Philadelphia shall deserve the character which she has so justly acquired for commercial integrity, she will always find customers in the West, no matter over what road they may travel. Her experience has already proved the truth of this assertion. It is devoutly to be wished, both for the sake of her merchants and those of the West, that, hereafter, the latter may be able to comply with their contracts better than they have done heretofore. In making this observation, I have not the most remote intention of giving offence, because I know that the pecuniary embarrassments of people of the West arose from causes, the operation of which they did not at first foresee, and could not afterwards control.

We have all, then, arrived at this conclusion, that the road shall not be suffered to go to ruin. Whatever doubts may at present be entertained, either of the policy of its original construction or location, about which I have my own opinion, we must not now allow it to be destroyed. Before toll can with justice be demanded from travellers, it must be repaired. The mountain, which it is said has slid down into it, must be removed. From motives of generosity to people of the West, and not of justice, I am, therefore, free to acknowledge, that I am willing a provision shall be introduced into the bill for the collection of tolls, appropriating to the road this unexpended balance of $9,194 25. After, however, we shall have given them that amount and our blessing, it should be explicitly understood that we shall never again hear any more demands for money from that quarter on the same account.

Mr. BAXLY, of Maryland, said: Mr. Speaker, I have not heretofore occupied as much of your time upon the floor as some other gentlemen have done, but shall, upon this question, give you a little of my slang. I consider this road a great national object. Some gentlemen take the liberty of talking a great deal without knowing much of the subject, and some of the newspapers have styled this the wisest Congress we have ever had; and, if being dilatory in action is a mark of wisdom, it is eminently entitled to that appellation—in truth, we are a talking people, and take a long time to consider upon the most trifling appropriation. What is this $9,000, compared with its object? Let us give it to them to make a good road, which will facilitate the intercourse between the East and the West, and diffuse knowledge. Some of our brothers in the West must stand in need of intelligence, otherwise they would not oppose the completion of this road. If we have not the means of communication, we shall in time become divided, and think we have separate and distinct interests. The Union cannot be preserved, except by commercial intercourse, and a free and easy commerce will always keep us united. Why was Alexander called “Alexander the Great?” Not solely because he conquered the world, but because he connected together all parts of the world, in a grand commercial system—he built Alexandria, and associated his name with the great system of international knowledge and profit, of which he was the author. That is the true reason he has been universally called the Great. Nations whose interests are not united by commerce, become prejudiced, and despise and kill each other.

Pennsylvania, from her opposition, would seem more willing to put a mountain in the middle of the Cumberland road, than to repair it. A large portion of that State does not, nor never did, like this road; that is, the Pittsburg interest does not, because it does not pass through that town. Is this road exclusively advantageous to that part of Pennsylvania and Philadelphia? That is the question with them. I am myself perfectly disinterested, living upon the Atlantic, having never been on this road, and perhaps never shall, for I have no intention as yet of becoming an emigrant, and regret that, at present, such a mania prevails in the Atlantic States, of sinking fortunes in the western wilds; but I have no doubt that, in time, the tide will change, and these emigrants will see their error, and wish to return to the delightful land of their fathers, and then let them have a good road and bridges to facilitate their return. The distinctions of Northern, Eastern, and Western, or men of the woods, should be deprecated. We should be but one people, Americans—and this desirable object is to be attained and preserved only by keeping up an easy and comfortable communication, and reciprocating benefits and favors to one another, and then we shall find that we think, feel, and speak alike. Ecod! then we shall be very good friends. Mr. Chairman, I only speak in the language of our brethren from the West. This is a great national object, and connected with the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, which can be easily effected, will unite, by an easy passage, the Western country with the whole Atlantic coast. New York is cutting a magnificent canal, for which she is entitled to great credit, but some of her great men here think that it goes round the world, and that no other national improvement is worthy consideration. Her politics seem to be bounded by De Witt Clinton and Daniel D. Tompkins, and all public improvements to end with this canal. She has wise men too, wiser, no doubt, than she has sent here for these two or three years. However, that State is great in resources, but she has received a little help in making her canal by her salt, and Saratoga waters, and tax upon travellers in steamboats. But this has not much to do with the subject. This road ought to be repaired, and then kept up by a toll. There should likewise be a good bridge over the Monongahela; and, instead of forty thousand dollars to build a wooden one, there should be one hundred and forty thousand to make a good substantial stone bridge—a good road, bridges, and canals, connecting the East with the West, will enable all parts of the country to lend speedy aid and assistance to each other, when they shall stand in need in the hour of battle.

The objection against making this appropriation upon constitutional ground, comes too late; the road and bridges are nearly finished, and the appropriations heretofore made have been sanctioned by Presidents Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, and by many Congresses. There is, however, now, rarely an appropriation that can be thought of, but some gentleman has constitutional scruples, and one would suppose that, in Virginia, from the nice scruples manifested by some of her members, that it is there thought to be unconstitutional to have or to travel upon a good road. Mr. B. said, that he had merely risen to assist his Western brethren, that he had not any personal interest in the business, and that he believed that the gentleman from Richmond here, (who sat before him,) was in the same situation, and that he hoped that he would lay aside his constitutional scruples, and lend his assistance.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Ohio, observed, that he regretted much to rise at that period of the debate, and swell the list of speakers on the subject before the House, but, lest he should be thought indifferent to the fate of the present question, he felt it a duty to offer a few remarks against a concurrence with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the appropriation for repairing the Cumberland road. He was the more induced so to do, from observing so great an opposition in many parts of the House to granting this pittance, which, although deemed of immense importance in promoting the views and interests of the people of the West, was so small as scarcely to be worth contending for. We do not claim this appropriation as a matter of absolute right, but appeal to the liberality of the representatives of this nation for a small share of the general benefits. He hoped that, independent of constitutional objections, which he would not now argue, the present state and condition of the road, and the necessity of a prompt repair, which could be timeously effected in no other way, would be sufficient to induce the liberal and enlightened representatives of this nation to maintain this work, heretofore generally considered as of a national character.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, stated that he should have given a silent vote, had not the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. JONES) challenged those who were opposed to this appropriation to give the reasons for their opposition.

He had constitutional scruples as to the power of Congress to make the appropriation; the advocates of the appropriation had obviously confounded the power of the State and General Governments, as well as the constitutionality and policy of the measure.

Mr. W. observed, that the subject-matter of the present discussion was a branch of the general subject of internal improvements; that these were physical or moral; that the first head comprehended roads, bridges, and canals; and the second, literary institutions, religious and scientific establishments, corporations for mechanical, manufacturing, charitable, and other purposes, calculated to enlighten the public mind, improve the morals, invigorate the industry, and ameliorate the condition of society.

The real question, therefore, before the committee was, have Congress the power to legislate upon the subject of internal improvements within the States?

Mr. W. concluded by saying that what he had stated was in justification of the vote he should give on the question before the committee; it was not the amount of the appropriation, but the constitutional principle that would be violated, that rendered it important—that he had barely suggested the outline of an argument without detail or illustration—that, to save the time of the House, he forbore to enter further into the subject. He repeated that these were his views of the constitution, which he was bound to support, and that the advocates of the appropriation must either remove his objections or excuse his vote.

Messrs. PLUMER of New Hampshire, REID, RHEA, MILNOR, and SERGEANT, expressed their opinions in favor of the concurrence; and Messrs. ROSS, WRIGHT, HARDIN, NELSON of Maryland, STEWART, and SMITH of Maryland, against it; when the question was taken thereon, and decided in favor of the concurrence—yeas 105, nays 58, as follows:

Prohibition upon Members of Congress to receive Office, Contract, or Employment, from the Federal Government.

Mr. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, submitted the following preamble and resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Whereas an act, passed on the 2d day of April, 1808, entitled "An act concerning public contracts," has been so construed as to sanction the appointment of members of Congress to divers public employments, agencies, or trust, by the authority of Executive officers of the United States; and whereas, on the purity of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and their freedom from Executive influence, depend the liberties of the people, and the durability, soundness, and integrity of the Federal Constitution:

Resolved, therefore, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to report a bill for the purpose of preventing any member of Congress, while he continues as such, from executing or holding any employment, agency, or trust, in behalf of, or on anywise concerning, the Government, either political, legal, or professional, to which the said member may be appointed, by any Executive officer of the United States.

SATURDAY, April 13.

Public Accounts.

The House, on motion of Mr. RICH, went into consideration of the bill entitled an act, in addition to an act entitled an act providing for the prompt settlement of public accounts; when Mr. RICH proposed the following amendment to the bill:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, whenever, in the settlement of the accounts before mentioned, a difference of opinion shall arise between accounting officers, as to the extent of the credits to be allowed, under or by virtue of this act, such case shall be referred to the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be conclusive. And it is hereby made the duty of the said Secretary, to cause to be communicated to Congress at the commencement of each session, a statement, comprising the names of the persons whose accounts shall have been settled the preceding year, agreeably to the provisions of this act, together with the amount which shall have been passed to the credit of each, under the several heads of expenditures, and upon other evidence than such as is prescribed by pre-existing laws and regulations.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, if any person shall swear, or affirm, falsely, touching the expenditure of public money, or in support of any claim against the United States, he, or she, shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury.

Mr. COOKE moved that the bill, together with the amendments, be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RICH opposed the motion; to whom Mr. COOKE replied.

Mr. MCCOY opposed the motion, and incidentally supported the bill, and Mr. NEWTON gave the bill his decided approbation.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the bill was then ordered to be laid on the table, and the amendments submitted by Mr. RICH, ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the House went into consideration of a bill further to amend the several acts relative to the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments, and, after a few remarks by Mr. H. NELSON, and Mr. SUMMERS, of Maryland, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.
